The acting is of course, equally magnificent. As the hypnotist, Derek Jacobi is instantly likable and just a little slimy. Robin Williams has a wonderful minor role as Cozy Carlisle, psychiatrist turned grocery store owner who is just a tad crazy. But Branagh and Thompson steal the show. They work wonderfully off each other; Branagh's Roman Strauss is charming and intense, while Thompson's Margaret is outgoing and independent. Branagh plays Church as irreverent but kind. He is worried about Grace but originally thinks the idea of a past life is nonsense... he doesn't care who she was; he wants to help her now. Grace, however, has been consumed by the events of the past even before she was consciously aware of it. She grows more frightened daily, and it is to Thompson's credit that Grace never appears anything but perfectly sane. Thompson makes Grace's terror very real.

This movie is Hitchcockian in every sense of the word, so be prepared to be surprised. In fact, the movie is so much fun because it is so surprising. Trying to figure out the plot or anticipate what will happen next defeats the purpose. So turn off your mind and just enjoy. If you do insist on trying to remain one step ahead of the movie, any hints or clues you need are given to you, but beware of red herrings, and prepare to be shocked. "Dead Again" will surprise you.

Sacred Cows Play Zeta Dance

by Cindy Young

Just knowing that their name comes from a "Get Smart" episide tells you that the Sacred Cows are far from your average band. Those attending the Zeta dance tonight will get a close look at the band, which consists of Bruce Hamilton on lead vocals and guitar, Josh "Hammer" Buckman on guitar, Eric "Bull" Forste on bass guitar, and drummer Chris "Fatman" Goldenberg. The band encourages everyone to come, especially faculty. As Josh Buckman said, "We expect the Trouts to be there doing the Jitterbug."

make, but we had to make it."

"There are not enough hours in the day for one man to do all this!" said Tracy Peel. "I thought a small school listens to what you have to say, but this one doesn't. They have no concern for the players, it's like we're not a part of the problem. I feel sorry for Coach Finnegan because he is making quite an effort, but this just isn't fair to us."

Miriam Dittman added, "Before we had two people with the time to do these jobs. Now we have two overworked coaches."

Rachel Rice felt that "The seniors want to see the program thrive with the younger people. Now these guys have lost their opportunity because recruiting won't be the same."

Alberto Diaz said, "Our voices were silenced. No one cared how we felt about the decision. They treated us like we were a bunch of 20 year old pests!"

A talk with Coach Finnegan revealed nothing but concern for his alma mater, and a man determined to help it to the utmost of his abilities. He also sympathized with the player's feelings.

"I'm very sympathetic to the player's situations. I hope the people who have made tennis respectable and important part of WC remain a part of it, if not in the fall than in spring. I have total respect for their decisions not to play if they think they're right. I'm simply here to provide the best alternative solution. My concern is for the school more than me personally. I was requested by Geoff Miller and President Trout to take these positions because I am the most qualified person on the staff. I am doing this for WC because I love the school. I will do the best that I can, and put as much into all my positions as possible. Beyond that there is not much more that I can do with the total workload I have to accomodate."

Coach Finnegan also added his relief in having two excellent basketball assistants (Steve Johnson and Mike Hart) and a very credible tennis assistant in Todd Helbling to help with recruiting and other coaching sibilities.

Athletic Director Geoff Miller gave words of encouragement for the new coach. "We wouldn't have done this if we didn't think he could do it," he said. Then he added,"We see it as two coaches assigned instead of one, whereas the student athletes are perceiving it as just one. I hope they think long and hard before they make the decision not to play. I'd hate to think in five years they look back and conclude they made a rash decision. These are fine young people and I hope they will play. We want them to play."

Field Hockey Shows Promise

by Kristin Phalen

Over Labor Day Weekend the Shorewomen's field hockey team travelled to Georgetown University to compete in the first scrimmage of their regular season.

Although the Shorewomen lost the game 2-0, there was reason to be optimistic afterwards. The team got off to a slow start falling behind 2-0 after the first period. But once the Shorewomen got used to playing on the astroturf, excellent teamwork, good ball-handling, and fine defensive play enabled the team to hold the Division I Hoyas scoreless for the remainder of the game.

The team thought it was an excellent learning experience, which not only prepared the team for its upcoming games, but made all involved eagerly anticipate the regular season.

This weekend the field hockey team hosts their season-opener against Dickinson which is scheduled to be played at 1:00.

Mens' Soccer Team Takes Pre-Season Kicks

by Chris Vaughn

A tough weekend indeed for the Shoremen soccer squad! Two scrimmages, two losses, and only a bunch of sweat ridden shirts to show for it.

Enduring sweltering heat on both Friday and Saturday afternoon, the Shoremen came out to take on Anne Arundel and Harford Community College, respectively. With increased morale and a better sense of direction this year under Todd Helbling's wing, they hoped to come out strong and with an improved sense of team play. They did this and exemplified it well in the first period versus Anne Arundel with complete offensive dominance. Yet they were unable to put one in. This may have led to an eventual mental breakdown on offense as Anne Arundel was able to thwart the Shoremen's drives and pick up momentum of their own to roll by WC. Coach Helbling attributes many of the mistakes to a lazy second period, tactical positioning problems, and a lack of concentration.

Todd commented that the same problems were also seen versus Harford Community College on Saturday. Along with this the team seemed tired and were short on energy, which gave the opening for Harford to again capitalize on several mistakes by the Shoremen. Although this was the second defeat in two days and WC was outscored 9-0 after the two scrimmages, the team was able to keep spirits high and homed in on the things that needed to be worked on. Coach Helbling believes that concentration and a stronger desire to win are two key areas that must be focused on. He has seen a great amount of improvement, but still sees a long road ahead for the team.

The season opener at Wesley was played too late for the Elm deadline, so it will be covered in next week's edition along with the home opener against St. Mary's Tuesday at 4:00 on Kibler field. Come see the Shoremen turn it around in '91.

Shoreboard's Peek at the Pros

New Orleans +6 over KANSAS CITY. Although the Chiefs are at home, they barely won at home last week against Atlanta, who hasn't won on the road since the Braves started doing it this year. Take the points.

Cleveland EVEN over NEW ENGLAND. The Pats can't win again, can they? Take Cleveland.

PHILADELPHIA -6 1/2 over Phoenix. Yeah, I know, Cunningham is out, but Phoenix's quarterback is Tom Tupa. Give the points.

BUFFALO -8 over Pittsburgh. The Bills should win it all this year, provided their field goal kicker doesn't have a stroke before attempting the winning kick again in the Super Bowl. Give the points.

Minnesota +1 over ATLANTA. This game is really hard to pick, but then again a Viking could probably kill a Falcon. I also like Minnesota's helmets better. Take the point.

DETROIT -2 1/2 over Green Bay. Wounded Lions are dangerous. Give the points.

Chicago -3 over TAMPA BAY. Too bad Tampa didn't get a baseball team. Give the points.

L.A. RAIDERS -4 1/2 over Denver. Last week Denver was a mile high and Los Angeles was a mile low. But when the Broncos are on the road, they aren't bully anymore. Give the points.

San Diego +13 over SAN FRANCISCO. Blakey's (John Blakelock's) favorite team is the Chargers. He is 667-3 lifetime in pro picks. Take the points.

Best Bets: MIAMI -8 1/2 over Indianapolis. The city of Baltimore now realizes that instead of being angry of how the team left for Indianapolis in vans, they should have been happy and offered gas money. Give the points.

Washington -2 1/2 over DALLAS. Redskins and Cowboys. Do the words Custer and Battle of Little Big Horn ring a bell? Give the points.

SACRED COWS - $3 over dorm drinking. You can drink anytime. See the best band on campus at 9 at the C-House.

Park Service Seeks Volunteers

by Julie Greene

The Kent County Department of Parks and Recreation offers numerous opportunities for college students to assist in programs and activities.

The Department of Parks and Recreation offers youth, adult, and senior programs that will provide valuable work experience for students. Students need not have experience in parks and recreation; but should have an interest in working with people, a positive attitude, reliability, and interest in sports, games, arts and crafts, foreign languages, drama, and nature.

Students can assist with special event planning and promotion, office work, league action; including coaching, officiating and supervising.

The Department also will use students to supervise special trips, high school dances and senior citizen activities.

If you are interested in valuable employment or volunteer experience, contact Parks and Recreation at 778-1948.

North Parking Lot Finally Open

The North lot by the New Dorms has finally been completed. According to Mr. Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, "He [the contractor] is a varmint and a liar and he didn't show up on time." He was supposed to line the North lot on Friday, but never showed.

Tuesday the lot was finally lined, and other lots on campus will be done Saturday.

The North lot is now open for student parking. It has been expanded to meet the increased need for student parking.

Coeducation Celebration Update

by Karyn Iacangelo

This year marks the centenary of coeducation at Washington College and will be celebrated at various events throughout the coming year. The title of the celebration program is Living Together: Men and Women in America– Past, Present, and Future.

The program opened with Fall Convocation on August 29, when President Trout's keynote speech dealt with "Toward Modernity: Washington College and the Cult of Womanhood." The honored guest was Helen Gibson, a founder of the Washington College Concert Series. Following Convocation, there was an art exhibit with recent sculptures by Maryland artist Allyn Massey. The exhibit was the first in a series of five featuring works of regional artists, and runs until September 30.

On September, 11, there will be an art lecture titled "Regional Women Artists," given by Dr. Leslie King Hammond, Director of Graduate Studies at the Maryland Institute, College of Art. It will be held in the Casey Academic Forum at 7:30.

On September 18, there will be a lecture by Tom Kessinger, President of Haverford College. This is the opening lecture of The William James Forum of Washington College.

Other events in the centennial celebration will be announced at some point in the near future.

Task Force Formed to Investigate Status of Homosexuals on Campus

Several Key Issues Addressed At Faculty Meeting

TASK FORCE ON STATUS OF LESBIANS, GAY MEN

At the Faculty Meeting of September 10, Professor Edward J. Weissman of the Department of Political Sciences introduced the following resolution which was adopted:

Resolved: That a Task Force be set up to study the status of Lesbians and Gay Men at Washington College.

1. This Task Force shall be charged with investigating and making recommendations in regard to the following as they relate to Lesbians and Gay Men as members of the Washington College community:

Legal rights
Civil rights
Rights to personal security
Freedom from Harassment and abuse, both verbal and physical, and 'hate'
Crimes in general
Services provided by the College
Assistance in the coming out process

As well as:

Policies designed to make the Washington College community open and welcoming to all Lesbians and Gay men in the Washington College community.

The provisions of services to the entire College community in the process of recovery from homophobia.

As well as other issues as may prove relevant.

II. The President shall appoint members to this Task Force. All members of the community are invited to make their availability to serve known to the President who may as well co-opt other members of the community to serve. While the Task Force will be welcoming to all regardless of sexual orientation, particular emphasis will be placed on including openly Gay Men or Lebians on the Task Force. In this regard, the chair of the committee shall be a Lesbian or Gay Man.

III. The call for committe members shall go out as soon as this Resolution is passed, and the President shall appoint the members of the Task Force by the First of October, 1991.

The Task Force will be expected, in the ordinary course of events, to present their report by the First of February, 1992.

Members of the community who are interested in being considered for membership on this Task Force are encouraged to so inform the President's Office.

by Sherry Menton

A resolution was passed at the September 10 faculty meeting to create a task force to examine the status of lesbians and gay men on the Washington College campus, with an eye to preventing discrimination against and harassment of homosexuals. Professor Ed Weissman of the Political Science department proposed the resolution, and said in his remarks before the vote, "a number of our students are going through a process made more difficult by the assumption made around here that this is a heterosexual institution. Tolerance, frankly, is not enough."

In other comments to the faculty, President Trout reaffirmed his support of Athletic Director Geoff Miller's coaching consolidations in regards to the tennis team, pointing out that the change "has to be seen in the context of that move [to replace part time coaches with full]." He then read the letter that he received from the Middle Atlantic Division of the NCAA, in which the Commissioner said that he is "satisfied that [WC's] in-house investigation was carried out in an appropriate manner." He further recommended that "students who have refused to cooperate with the investigation should remain ineligible to play at all member institutions," and said that an investigator from the NCAA would be visiting soon to interview all the parties concerned.

In another issue addressed at the meeting, President Trout stated that he is considering forming a student-faculty-administration-alumni committee to advise the Board of Visitors and Governors about the acquisition of a new ceremonial tree. Trout mentioned that the American Liberty Elm is supposed to be disease resistant, and that other possibilities include a white oak or a cherry tree from Mount Vernon, to maintain the connection with George Washington.

President Trout also proposed that the mission statement of Washington College be examined for possible changes. The old statement, which appears on page 2 of the catalog, he called "truncated, wanting, and dated" and expressed his belief that it "needs some changing."

It was announced that Dean McIntyre was added as a member of the Executive Council, thus bringing WC in step with the many colleges and universities who look to the Dean of Students to represent student interests on the Council.

Financial Aid Meets to Prepare Student Seminar

by Karyn Iacangelo

On Wednesday, September 11, there was a financial aid seminar given by Ellyn Taylor, Director of Financial Aid. It was a closed door meeting, providing an opportunity for faculty and staff to ask their questions concerning the problems that the college has faced with financial aid.

On October 8, there will be a Financial Aid forum open to the general student body. The forum will go into more detail about how need is determined and the application process for financial aid.

According to Taylor, financial aid is composed of three sections: scholarships and grants; loans; and employment opportunities comprising work study and on-campus employment. The purpose of financial aid is to provide prospective students access to post-secondary education. Financial aid packages can be customized for each college student based on their academic performance and financial need. In determining "financial need," many factors are taken into consideration, such as the parents' tax returns and the standard Financial Aid Form.

The grant program at WC is varied. The most difficult grant to receive is the Pel Grant because the qualifications are so stringent. This is a federal program and most Pel Grant recipients also receive SCOG, which is another grant for work study that accompanies the Pel Grant. Less than 100 students on the WC campus are eligible for this grant, and they are the most needy. The recipients are chosen by a formula determined by Congress. All the student has to do is present a student aid report to the Financial Aid Office, which will turn the code on the report into a dollar figure. Awards are not at the discretion of Washington College.

WC has many exclusive scholarships such as the George Washington, Frederick Doulgas, and Sophie Kerr Scholarships. The George Washington scholarship can range from $3000-6000 and is need and academically based.

The state of Maryland also gives out a variety of need based scholarships and grants some that are left to the discretion of the person or company awarding the grant or scholarship. Again WC has no discretion in the recipient of these state awards.

Many new students come to WC with scholarship money already, either from their high schools or their parents' employers. The most prominent of these is the Beneficial Hodson. The company awards scholarships to many of their employees' children and covers tuition. There is another kind of Beneficial Hodson award which is strictly academic. The one that just covers tuition comes out of WC's money and Beneficial Hodson cover the academic scholarship.

WC also has a fairly strong work study program; the amount that the student receives is based on need. The money earned through this program is used for current educational expenses. Once granted work study, the financial aid office will send the student a list of campus employment. The salary starts at $4.25 for Freshman and increases by twenty five cents each year after that.

The financial aid office must keep track of what all students receive in terms of donations and scholarships. The college funds 100% of the financial need identified by the FAF, so there is no room to play. The college tries to get the students the most money possible. There is WC money in every scholarship and grant, and roughly 79% of student financial aid is WC money.

Computing Classroom Closed For Lack of Funds

By Karyn Iacangelo

The computing classroom located on the third floor of the Casey Academic Resource Center will not be opened for general student use this semester. The closure is due in part to the 10% budget cut that the college suffered, which resulted in a lack of funding for lab assistants, and students customizing the machines for their own use. Students were also using the instructor's computer in the front of the lab and erasing files that the instructor needed to teach his or her class.

Many alternatives have been explored to help keep the classroom open as a general lab area, but so far the efforts have been futile. The staff at the computing center tried locking certain software to limit access to certain programs, but many students were able to bypass the system to gain access to these files. The staff tried a program called File Guard, but again this was unsuccessful because students were still able to bypass the program.

Paul Bishop, an employee of the computing center was faced with the decision to keep the classroom or the computing center open, and he opted to have the computing center open as a general lab. Bishop said that it would be easier to have the computing center open, so that if any problems occurred with the machines, the computing center staff could easily fix them.

One plan that has been put into effect, is putting computers in residence halls so students can have easy access to computers. Some computers have already been placed in the lounge in Kent House and there are plans to put computers in Wicomico. The RA's of each residence hall need to fill out a form to the Academic Computing Committee to request computers. It would take about a week or so to get the computers installed. Macintosh Plus computers will be installed wherever requested. Another alternative that has been suggested is for the professors who use the computer classroom to set up open lab time for their students.

OPINION/EDITORIAL

CAC Computing Classroom Unavailability a Crock

One of the things that Washington College likes to brag about in promotional literature is its extensive Macintosh campus computing network. The jewel in WC's networking crown was supposed to be the computing classroom in the Casey Academic Resource Center, which would contain state-of-the-art equipment, including Mac IIXs, and would increase the total number of Macs available for student use. As promised, the computing classroom does contain state-of-the-art equipment; however, it has not added to WC's computer pool because the computer classroom, centerpiece of the computing program, is not open for use by either students or faculty.

It is amazing that after so much hype, students would be kept from using the new facilities, but that is the case. Keys to the computer classroom have been given out only to professors who teach classes in the room, which is kept locked at all other times. The Computing Center claims that it does not have the resources to hire lab assistants to keep the classroom open for students. Last year, however, the Computing Center in Ferguson Hall was at times so overstaffed that it had three or sometimes four lab assistants working simultaneously. Currently, two lab assistants are scheduled for each time slot. And while the Computing Center is laboring under a 10% budget cut, as are all departments, unless the total number of lab assistants has decreased dramatically, some of these people could be transferred to the CAC, to keep the computing classroom open at least during the peak evening hours of 7-11.

What makes this whole situation worse is that last year, preparatory to the opening of the CAC, computers were removed from the computing center to make room for a new office for computing center staff. These computers were placed in the CAC instead, because it was believed that more students would be using the new facilities there than would walk out to the old lab in Ferguson. Last spring when the CAC classroom was open it did see moderately heavy usage.

Now that the CAC is unavailable to us, however, those extra computers have not been brought back to Ferguson, or otherwise made available to students. Aside from the few computers scattered in dorms, the only public-access Macs we currently have are the 12 in Miller Library, the 6 in the Computing Center in Ferguson, and the 4 at the Literary House. Additionally, the Elm has decided to make its own 4 computers available to other WC publications on an individually-arranged basis.

We at the Elm think that the current state of campus computing is a travesty. This Sunday Tim Kirk, Assistant Director of the Computing Center, had to come to WC and open the computer center in Ferguson himself because there was no lab assistant available to cover the slot. Until he arrived, the center was closed down, inaccessible. It is obvious that manpower problems do exist. Even if there is no way that lab assistants can keep extra rooms open, there is no excuse for not moving some computers into Miller or somewhere else where students who don't have their own computer can get at one. The status quo is unacceptable. Twenty computers (computers in dorm lounges cannot yet be counted since many are not hooked up to the network) for approximately 800 students is ridiculous. Even assuming that half of the students have their own computer, that is still twenty people who have to share each public access computer. The last inventory showed 272 Macintoshes owned by the school. Counting all the public access computers, and assuming one computer for every faculty member, there are still over 50 computers unaccounted for. Where are they, and why aren't students being allowed to use them?

Students who look at this situation may do well to wonder what is really going on. Is the computing classroom being used as a pawn in some sort of Computing Center power play to wring funds, manpower, attention, or whatever, out of the WC administration? Are the professors who have keys to the CAC classroom limiting access to it deliberately, so they can have their own private computing lab? Is the unreliability of some lab assistants the reason the computing center won't allow the classroom to be opened? Or is the classroom inexplicably low down on the list of priorities?

While the computing center and the administration are making up their minds about what to do and where the necessary additional funds are going to come from, the students are suffering. If you can't get to a computer, you can't type your paper, which means you can't turn it in, which means you stand a good chance of failing a class. We are a high-tech campus; professors expect to see computerized papers. We cannot just be thrown back thirty years to the pen-and-ink era because whoever has the power to act can't decide how best to give students access to the computers they need.

Letter to the Editor

To: The Washington College Community

From: Former members of the men's and women's tennis teams

We, the former members of the Washington College tennis team, are distressed by the rumor and innuendo which have resulted directly from the dismissal of the head men's and women's tennis coaches. We would like to take this opportunity to outline various facts that we feel have been misrepresented, both verbally and in the press.

To begin with, the teams have repeatedly been accused of National Collegiate Athletic Association infractions. Neither the men's nor women's tennis teams has ever been cited for violating any type of NCAA regulation. Although stories to the contrary have been reported as fact, there exists no evidence in support of these statements.

In addition, the athletic director has notified the Washington College community of the filing of a self-report to the NCAA. This report presumably alerts the NCAA to "possible secondary violations" by former members, ourselves included, of the tennis teams. We fail to comprehend how such a report could be filed without once consulting the accused as to their alleged involvement in the matter. Certainly, the College has forsaken the students' basic right to confront one's accusers. We find such blatant disregard of due process simply unacceptable, and especially so in an academic environment.

The contents of the self-report have yet to be made available to the public, and much less, to those of us whom it directly concerns. Unfortunately, we find that we are forced to defend ourselves against accusations which have yet to be revealed in full. Although the athletic director claims that those who have been self-reported are aware of their purported infractions, all of the former members of the tennis teams, ourselves included, have been judged "guilty" in the press with the publication of further allegations. These reports of "possible violations" have been presented in such a slanted manner as to convict both teams before judgement.

In conclusion, we wish to emphasize that as former members of the tennis teams, we have worked in earnest both in the classroom and on the tennis court to uphold Washington College's fine reputation. While the handling of this crisis has certainly affected our performance on the court, the academic, social, and personal consequences have been far more distressful. We fear that our reputation as scholar-athletes has been irreparably tarnished in the eyes of our fellow students and the faculty and staff of the college. We ask the college community to consider this issue with an open mind and support our efforts to obtain a full hearing and a reasonable solution to the problem.

Weekly Absurdity

Isn't it absurd how easily we can ignore matters that will profoundly affect our lives? Right now in Washington, DC, the Senate Judiciary Committee is debating whether or not to approve President Bush's Supreme Court nominee, Federal Appeals Judge Clarence Thomas. His confirmation, or the lack of one, will change the face of the Supreme Court in a time when the Court is increasingly exerting its power over US law and government.

The Senators on the Judiciary Committee are the judges of the judges, so to speak, yet they seem more inclined to nitpick over out-of-context statements made by the nominee years ago, than in finding out what Thomas' convictions are, and how his philosophy of jurisnce will affect the Court if he is confirmed. Senator Robert Kennedy (D-Mass.) at one point questioned Thomas about a statement he made in an interview in 1987, in which Thomas justified the need for government agencies like the Department of Labor because we do not live in a perfect world. That committee questioning could proceed in such a manner is ample proof of that.

Obscure references are not the issues Thomas should be taken to task for. True, his stance on abortion has been repeatedly questioned by the committee, but not questioned often enough, in this writer's opinion, since we still do not know where Thomas does in fact stand on the subject. Thomas seems fond of alluding to his impoverished upbringing, hitting the committee over the head with his ethnicity to the exclusion of answering the straightforward questions put to him.

During the course of the first two days of hearings, Thomas has backed down from or altered his stance on positions he had affirmed earlier in his career. As with anyone who is interviewing for a job, Thomas is trying to tell the committee what he thinks it wants to hear. What we, as American citizens, should hear, however, is how Thomas will vote, or at least what his leanings are, on the key issues that will come before the Court in the 1990's. If he is confirmed, Thomas will be the swing vote on an already conservative Court. He would potentially rule on the legality of abortion, the death penalty, and punishment for drug offenses. These are issues that will affect us, and we cannot afford to ignore the proceedings that will decide if Clarence Thomas will be the one to cast the deciding vote.

CAMPUS VOICES

Campus Buildings Badly Planned

Fix the Old Before Building A New One

There is an old adage which states that "you get what you pay for"; however, at Washington College we see that this is not necessarily true. As students, we have the right to expect to witness the results of our tuition (which is a little over $17,000) in our daily lives. Unfortunately, it seems that we are not getting what we paid for. Take, for example, problems with three major campus buildings. While it is true that the upkeep of buildings is expensive and time consuming, students have the right to be taught in the best facilities available.

The structure and interior of Bill Smith has been allowed to decay over the years. The deterioration has gotten to the point where the building is not only unattractive but is also potentially hazardous. The stone edifice on the front of the building is crumbling away. One can notice large missing pieces of stone as one enters through the front doors. The interior of Bill Smith is an eyesore. In previous years, tour guides have been instructed not to take prospective students and their families inside the building. Not showing prospective students the most important feature - the main classroom facility of WC, must say something about its condition.

The Casey Academic Center (aka. ARC, CARC, or any other suitable acronym), Mrs. Betty Casey's multimillion dollar esteemed gift to Washington College, was opened for use prior to its completion. At first, the elevator was inoperable because it had failed to meet the safety requirements. The electrical wiring for the fixtures in the building remained exposed throughout the majority of the '91 Spring semester.

Poor architectural planning has also been evident in the Casey Academic Center. The acoustics in the Forum carry and enhance every sound made in the building. The walls of the Forum have not been soundproofed - resulting in an echoing effect throughout the room. Not only can students barely hear what is being taught, but it is almost impossible to see anything due to the angle of the sunlight when it passes through the windows. The air conditioning system in this building has been designed under the impression that the heat would be on all year long. As a result, when the heat is turned off the building is freezing.

The other newly completed building, the Dunning/Decker Science Center, also has its share of flaws in its design and construction. In the Biology laboratories on the ground floor, the floors are cement, painted over with light blue, oil based porch paint. This paint comes off when the floors are exposed to excessive moisture. This results in one sticking to the floor when one enters the laboratory.

A related problem with the science building is mold. There is mold growing on the grills in some of the independent air cooling units. Mold is growing on the counter tops in the labs, on the floors, and on the ceiling tiles. High humidity created by excessive air conditioning pro-

Yes, the only convenient parking for the majority of male students is in Kent Circle, but we have only 16 legal parking spaces. Parking behind Reid is also insuficient.

I don't think that parking is the major problem on this campus. The lot behind Tawes is never full. People are just too lazy to walk that far.

The parking situation on campus is not as terrible as everyone thinks it is. For thoe people who have vehicles, and believe the walk from lot to dorm is too far... think again.

I think you shouldn't have to leave your car across campus; parking should be available near where you live. Everyone should be able to keep their car close and secure and not have to worry what will happen when you're walking across campus late at night.

Yes, I've driven around the campus for 15 to 20 minutes with people just to find a parking spot. It's ridiculous. This campus is not that big, but when you have to park there's never any space where you can.

Parking on this campus is a real problem. On some occasions it has taken me 10 to 20 minutes to find a space.

In the World...

Washington, DC

Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas has affirmed his belief in the right to privacy, but will not say whether this includes the right to abortion. The 43 year old federal appeals judge is currently appearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee. In the first day of hearings, Thomas deflected questions several times by referring to his grandfather and his own poverty-stricken upbringing. Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden (D-Del.), after the first half hour of questioning, was "left with more questions than answers." And Senator Howell T. Heflin (D-Ala.) told CNN that "Thomas could have hurt himself terribly or on the other hand he could have helped himself tremendously. It's too early to say."

Also in Washington, Defense Secretary Richard B. Cheney is defending the military spending program he devised to carry the Department of Defense into the late 1990's. Some Congressmen feel that moves should be made to adjust the DoD budget in light of the political changes in the Soviet Union.

Surgeon General Antonia C. Novella has stated that the 21 year old drinking age is "largely a myth" use state enforcement laws on the whole are "riddled with loopholes, laxity, and lip service."

Israel

In an attempt to forestall a breakdown of hostage negotiations, Israel has released 51 Lebanese prisoners and the bodies of nine others. The release was negotiated through the United Nations after the terrorist organization Hezbollah released information to Israel about two of their missing servicemen, both of whom were dead.

Soviet Union

Secretary of State James A. Baker, III, while on a fact-finding mission in the Soviet Union, stated that the US will no longer insist on economic reform as a precondition for an award of aid to the economically-beleaguered nation and its republics. "They don't have to take the steps first, but commit to taking the steps."

Concurrently with the Secretary's visit, Georgian President Zuiad Gamsakhurdia alluded tot he 1939 Nazi-Soviet pact in accusing the United States of a "kind of Molotov-Ribbentrop agreement" to prevent the recognition of the Soviet Republic of Georgia as and independent nation.

China

Chinese communists, in a reaction against the failed coup in the Soviet Union, are tightening their grip at home. Western analysts believe that the aging hard-line rulers, already confused by the events in Eastern Europe, are frightened of the communist loss of control in the Soviet Union, and are increasingly defiant and defensive about their own power. Beijing's official position is that events in the Soviet Union are Moscow's internal affairs.

vided the proper conditions to allow the mold to flourish. This problem has existed ever since the building opened. Some attempts have been made to correct this problem; however, this is still a problem in the building. And surely, this constant exposure to mold is not healthy for students attending classes and labs in the building, not to mention the professors who have offices there.

Throughout the entire building, there are no drains in the floors to drain the water from the emergency showers. If these showers were used it would most likely result in the flooding of the laboratory. In some of the laboratories, there are electrical outlets directly under these showers.

The relatively new heating system does not work properly - after only a few years the system leaks. There have been several place where ceilings have been soaked with water from these pipes. Some of these pipes have been repaired.

Just out of curiosity, why is it that the bathrooms in these new buildings are on different floors? In Dunning/Decker, the men's restroom is on the first floor and the women's restroom is on the second floor. In the Casey building, the men's restroom is on the third floor and the women's restroom is on the second. Should they not be on the same floor?

The administration is planning to renovate Bill Smith, but what about the other "new" academic buildings? Do you not think that it would be a good idea to correct the major problems of the buildings we currently use before building other facilities like a "new" classroom building.

Environmental Organization

New Faces

by Keri Nygaard

The Environmental Organization of Washington College, founded last year as The Ecotopian Society by graduate student Dave Searles, held its first meeting last Thursday, September 5. Thanks to the many new and energetic students who attended that meeting, the official membership has grown to twenty-nine, and it is expected to flourish throughout the academic year.

As a result of the elections, Senior Kris Wallenburg was appointed to be the Vice President, Sophomore William Phipps was elected to be the Treasurer, and Senior Keri Nygaard was chosen to be the Secretary. The President of the organization is Senior Ann Veiga, who was elected at the end of the Spring semester last year. The organization's advisor is Dr. Donald A. Munson, Chair of the Biology Department.

The members individual concerns included recycling, cleaning up and protecting the Chesapeake Bay, and providing local education for the preservation of wildlife, natural resources, and "natural living." As a group, this year's organization will be operating at a grass-roots level, with a "think globally/act locally" focus. Some tentative plans for this year include a campus and community environmental awareness day, and potential "living off the water" and "living off the land" trips. Other ideas are local plantings and increasing the number of recycling outlets around campus.

The executive board will be meeting this week to discuss constitutional issues, including a new name, and to focus on possible events for this semester. Everyone interested in the organization is encouraged to attend the next open meeting. Everyone has a say in the group's name, direction, and the year's events.

Hands Out Helping "Kent Superstars"

by Sherry Menton

Hands Out, WC's volunteer/service organization, is organizing campus teams to take part in the "Kent Superstars" competition sponsored by the Kent County United Way Foundation. The competition is not a fundraiser of any sort, but rather, is intended to promote community unity and involvement.

The competition will be held from Monday, September 16, to Friday, September 20 at various locations around Kent County, with different events being held each day. Teams or individuals will participate in 4 events out of the 15 sports categories. Each individual on a team competes in one event, or an individual competitor may choose to participate in 4 events. The team or individual that wins the most points will be declared the Kent County Superstars.

Students do not have to take part in a sporting event in order to participate in "Kent Superstars." Said sophomore Mary Holmes, "I couldn't find any sports I thought I was good enough at, so I'm volunteering my time to help out at events instead."

There is a fee for entering the competition; however, due to the interest that President and Mrs. Trout have in the competition, the fee for any student teams will be paid by WC.

Kathy Mullan, one of the members of Hands Out, explained, "We believe it is important that WC students get actively involved in the community at the beginning of the year as a promise of our support throughout the year, and to build up some kickoff enthusiasm for future Hands Out projects."

Internship Opportunities

by Melissa Harmeyer

If you are interested in the biological sciences, the Howard Hughes Medical Institute will be awarding 66 Predoctoral Fellowships in the Biological Sciences. The awards are for full-time study for three years, towards a Ph.D. or Sc.D.

The goal of these fellowships is to promote excellence in biomedical research by helping students obtain a high quality graduate education. The fellowships support training - that is, research directed toward understanding various biological processes and disease mechanisms - in the fields of biochemistry, biophysics, biostatistics, cell biology, developmental biology, epidemiology, genetics, immunology, mathematical biology, neuroscience, physiology, structural biology, and virology.

Although this is a three year award, continuation of the award to five years is possible depending on the fellow's academic performance. To be eligible, you must be at the beginning of your studies toward a Ph.D. or Sc.D., either a college senior, college graduate with little or no postbaccalaureate graduate study in the biological sciences, or a first year graduate student.

An application must be submitted to the NRC Fellowship office by November 8, 1991 for Part I and by December 6, 1991 for Part II. In order to qualify for consideration please contact: The Fellowship Office, National Research Council, 2101 Constitution Avenue, NW, Washington, DC. 20418. The phone number is (202) 334-2872.

There are also opportunities available for professors and administrators. University professors and administrators are currently participating in International Faculty Development Seminars in various foreign countries. These seminars are designed to provide an atmosphere that is educational, scholarly, and inspirational.

Past seminars themes have focused on "The African-American Experience in the U.S.," "Chile After Pinochet," "Understanding Vietnam," and "Northern Ireland: Images of a Divided Society."

The participating faculty have been able to enhance the global awareness of their students as a result of their cultural experiences.

The 1991-92 schedule includes seminars in Hong Kong, Northern Ireland, Chile, Vietnam, Poland, the Netherlands/Belgium, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United States, and Germany. Participation is open to full-time teaching faculty and administrators at two- and four-year institutions of higher education. If you are interested in participating in this program please contact Professional Programs, CIEE, 205 E. 42nd Street, New York, NY 10017, (212) 661-1414 ext. 1455.

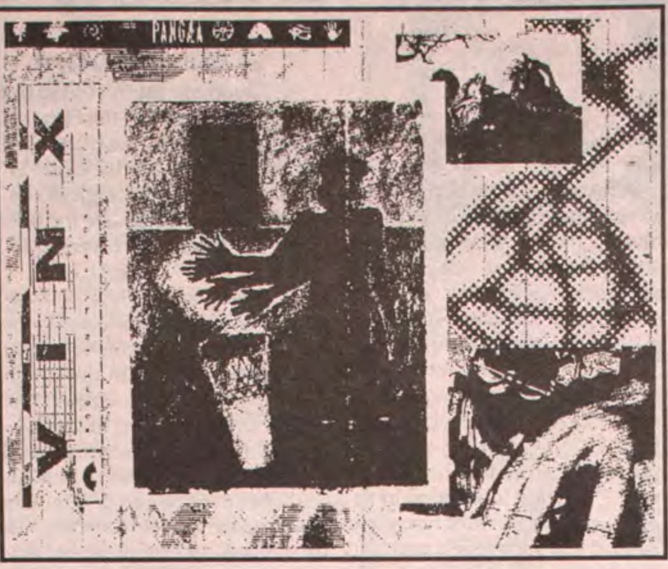
Debut Vinx Album Garners Praise

by Raph Koster

Vinx
Rooms in My Fatha's House
Produced by Sting, John Eden, Greg Paree, and Vinx
Pangæa Records (IRS)



These days, it's getting hard to find an original-sounding album. There's your dance stuff that all sounds the same (should we thank the drum machine or curse it?) and your rehash glam rock wanna-be metal music, your overly slick R&B that can't remember its soul roots and the sad fact that much of rap is ignoring the promise of that new form and aiming instead for contentious obscenities. Granted, tucked away in between these albums are ones that work in the same genres successfully, but in days when even alternative rock starts to sound commonplace, they are far and few between.

Such a gem is the debut album by an extraordinary vocalist and percussionist who goes by the name Vinx. If you were at Sting's concerts in the area, then you may remember him as the man who blew the Concrete Blonde cobwebs out of the audience's heads and made them sit up and listen. Accompanying himself only on African drums, he revealed a sly sense of humor and a soaring baritone that captivated everyone in the house. It's taken some time for his album to appear, but it's finally here now, and the question becomes whether or not he could maintain that sense of discovery on a recording. Happily, he can.

On an album produced by bassist Sting and featuring Branford Marsalis on sax, Herbie Hancock on piano, Angel Figueroa on percussion, and even Roscoe Lee Browne on a mid-song rap, there is no lack of instrumentation, but the focus is always firmly on Vinx's incredible voice and the rhythmic patterns he weaves. The album begins with a yell on "Tell My Feet," a catchy, chorus-driven tune with an ethereal backing. Latin rhythms appear on the salsa "My TV"- an interesting blend of Latin and African rhythms with the refrain "I ain't got nobody to come home to but you." It ends with a nod in Sting's direction, echoing the phrase "I want my MTV..." from the Knopfler/Sting "Money for Nothing" off of Brothers in Arms.

Another stand-out song is "While the City Sleeps," a panoramic picture of the middle of the night, when "the DJ is the law." Broken up by raps, classical violin, heavy metal riffs, and jazz piano, it's the kind of song you expect to see a video of on a late night on cable. "I'll Give My All To You" is an a cappella song with tight harmonies (provided by Mark Smith) that manages to suggest a whole harmonic structure.

In spite of the high points, Vinx seems to shine most when he's alone with his voice or when he has a full backing band behind him. Arguably the best meld of the differing styles he and practically everyone else have is the lounge jazz tune "Somehow Did You Know," on which Vinx's percussion is not even heard. In other places, the lack of instrumentation and near-total reliance on his percussion becomes tiring. Some of the songs seem undistinguished, no matter how wondrous the performance. Echoes of old R&B or pop can be heard in more than one.

In spite of all the shortcomings, Rooms in my Fatha's House is a fascinating debut from an unusual musician, and should recommend itself to listeners looking for something that won't be heard on the radio, not even on alternative rock.

Haverford President Opens Norman James Forum

by Cindy Young

Dr. Tom G. Kessinger, President of Haverford College, will open the 29th year of Washington College's William James Forum on Wednesday, Sept. 18. His topic will be "The Decline of the Nation-State (Even Ours?)".

Dr. Kessinger, a specialist on South Asia, was the head of the Ford Foundation's two largest overseas offices in New Delhi and Jakarta before he became Haverford's 11th president in 1988. He began work with the Ford Foundation when he was appointed program advisor for education and culture in New Delhi in 1977. He was based in Jakarta as the representative for the Southeast Asian region from1979 to 1987 and from 1987 to 1988 he was the representative for South Asia in New Delhi, covering India, Nepal, and Sri Lanka.

He is conversant in Urdu, Hindi, Punjabi, and Bahesa Indonesia, and first developed an interest in South Asia when he took two year's leave from his undergraduate studies to join the first group of Peace Corps volunteers in India.

After completing his bachelor's degree in history from Haverford with honors, Dr. Kessinger went on to receive his M.A. and Ph.D. degrees as a Danforth Fellow at the University of Chicago. His doctoral thesis was published by the University of California's Berkeley Press and focused on social and economic changes in a north Indian village from 1848 to 1968, and is still highly regarded for its combined application of anthropology and history.

During his years in Jakarta, Dr. Kessinger chaired the board of the Jakarta International School, which draws 2,000 students from 55 countries. He was chairman of various committees and during his last two years was the board's chairman.

He has also taught at the University of Virginia as an assistant professor of South Asian history. At the University of Pennsylvania he was a visiting professor of history and South Asian studies and a year later became an associate professor. In the three years he spent there, he chaired the undergraduate history department, chaired the College of Arts and Sciences' Committee on Instruction, and served as assistant chair of the Department of South Asia Regional Studies.

He is a native of Ridgewood, New Jersey, and was a member of the Friends meetingthere until his family left the community in 1972. He and his wife Varyam have two sons who are both in the engineering field: William, who recently graduated from Stanford University, and Colin, who is currently studying engineering at Cornell University.

Dr. Kessinger will be speaking in the Casey Academic Center Forum at 7:30pm. A reception will be held before his talk at 5:00pm at Dr. Tapke's House on 117 High Street. Everyone is invited to attend.

Poet Carolyn Forché To Read

by Cindy Young

Carolyn Forché, the winner of the Lamont Poetry Prize for 1981, the Yale Younger Poet Award, and author of Gathering the Tribes and The Country Between Us, will be giving a reading of her poetry on Wednesday night, Sept.18 at 8pm in the Norman James Theatre. Forché is widely known for her political poetry about El Salvador. Writer Margaret Atwood describes her poetry as "a poetry of courage and passion, which manages to be tender and achingly sensual and what is often called 'political' at the same time. This is a major new voice." Another critic of her work has said, "she is creating poems in which there is no seam between personal and political, lyrical and engaged."

Carolyn Forché is currently a professor in the Creative Writing Program at George Mason University. She recently edited a new anthology of 20th-century poetry of witness, which chronicles human rights violations throughout the world. Her new volume of poems, Angel of History, will be published in the spring of 1993. Her reading at Washington College is sponsored by the Sophie Kerr Committee and the Committee on Coeducation at Washington College. The reading is free and everyone is welcome to attend.

Volleyball Spikes Goucher in Opener

by Greg Coss

Washington College's volleyball team gained the confidence they needed last Thursday by beginning their season with a resounding 15-6, 15-4, 15-6 victory over Goucher College. Although the Shorewomen looked very impressive, Coach Penny Fall admitted that the big tests lie ahead. "The kids showed me some good stuff, but the quad match on Wednesday will really test us," Coach Fall said. "The competition level will be even across the board; it will tell a lot about our team. With three matches, it will be feast or famine." [The results of this quad match were too late for the Elm deadline; therefore they will be covered in the next issue along with how the team faired in the Gettysburg Invitational to be held this weekend.]

Coach Fall expressed disappointment in the level of competition in the team's opening match, but also admitted that because the Shorewomen were the far superior team, it gave her a chance to see what the rest of the squad could do.

"I was able to play a lot of the players who might not see as much time in tighter situations," Fall said. "Katina Duklewski and Sabrina Luginbuhl played very well, along with Niurka Goenaga and Kirsten Lucas. Those four nonstarters did a good job in the back-line."

One of the keys to the team's success this year is senior captain Theresa Sganga, the hitter/setter who is recovering from ankle surgery performed in early August. Coach Fall is naturally concerned with her condition, saying "She is not jumping as high and is not as quick as before," but on the positive side she said that "her therapy is getting stronger and she is making great progress." This just means the other starters need to pick up the slack in her temporary absence. These starters are being put to the test early, and by the end of the weekend they should have a good idea of just how far they can go this season. Starting the season off with a big win should help the squad considerably, and make them realize that they can be competitive with anyone on the schedule this year.

Field Hockey Sticks It To Dickinson

by Greg Coss

Last season, the Washington College field hockey team started the season with a 2-1 loss at Dickinson. This year the Shorewomen turned the tables with a 1-0 victory over that same team, this time at home. Revenge is so sweet! Or is it? The lone goal of the game was scored by Alicia Carberry unassisted midway through the first half, scoring it on her best friend and former teammate in High School.With friends like that, who needs enemies? See if she ever loans you a stick again, Alicia. (Just kidding!)

After grabbing the lead, the Shorewomen didn't give Dickinson much of a chance to draw even. Washington's three-back system of defense spearheaded by senior Jenifer Blenckstone, a regional All-American, smothered the Dickinson attack all day, with the Shorewomen getting the majority of the opportunities to score. The players would admit later that the opportunity to avenge last year's loss was a motivating factor.

"Last year they beat us, and it's tough to lose the first game," said junior defensiveman Eleanor Shriver. "We had a lot to gain by beating them. Yes, we wanted to return the favor, but also it just feels good to win that first game."

Senior Jenifer Blenckstone admitted "The team was really ready for this first game," realizing just how tough Dickinson has been in the past.

When asked why she thought this year's team beat Dickinson's and last year's didn't, junior all-purpose player Heather Mayr responded "We are more of an emotional team this year. The guys are getting more psyched up for the games. We have more heart and we really want to do well."

Jenifer Blenckstone is the key contributor to the Shorewomen's strong heart. She has taken the leadership role on defense, helping with positioning. But she also has helped the team on the whole by boosting its morale, not allowing the players to get too discouraged. Junior defensiveman Kris Phalen said "We look to Jen, she's a good containment player. We will always look to Jenny, its the kind of player that she is. She's a great leader."

The result of having this senior leadership (Blenckstone is the only senior on the team) in front of the goal results in shutouts like on Saturday. Wednesday the Shorewomen played at Wesley, too late for the Elm deadline. What were the keys to this game?

"We'll really have to be prepared for this one," said Blenckstone. "They weren't on our schedule last year, some of our players don't know much about them. We can't get cocky. These guys are tough."

Next week's issue will have the results of this game and player reactions, along with tomorrow's confrontation between WC and Farleigh Dickinson. If the opening game is any indication of what's to come, it's likely Washington will be 3-0 by then.

Men's Soccer: The WAC takes a Whack

by Chris Vaughn

The inability to capitalize on scoring opportunities is the missing piece so far in the Shoremen's soccer season. Washington finished another week of play with more of the same results. The squad suffered two more losses, an 3-0 season-opening setback at the hands of Wesley and a 4-1 drubbing administered by St. Mary's in WC's home-opener on Tuesday. Including their two pre-season games, the Shoremen have now scored one goal in four games while allowing sixteen.

Facing their first regular season opponent,Wesley, a game played nine days ago in Delaware, Washington appeared to be a formidable opponent. The Shoremen, as they had done in previous exhibitions, came out with a firm hold on offense but were unable to come away with a score.

"We had so many chances," said junior midfielder Charlie Linehan.

Fellow midfielder Chris Kleberg would agree with this statement but would also admit that "We've got to be a lot quicker."

The 3-0 loss versus Wesley was seen as a learning experience for this young yet maturing team, as the Shoremen tried re bounce back at home against St. Mary's this past Tuesday. With returning players Gilbert Orser and Chris Graham just off the injured reserve list, they had hoped to come out and surprise a healthy and respectable St. Mary's team.

As usual, they started strong with great performances by Kyle Hutchinson in goal and well executed corner kicks. However, the Shoremen slowly lost their intensity and desire. Co-captain Kevin Kelly attributes this to "A tired second half. We made more offensive runs and overlaps than in the past and killed ourselves on defensive recovery."

However, WC didn't come away completely empty-handed as Charlie Linehan finessed one in from about 30 yards out late in the second period. But it wasn't enough as the Shoremen lost a 4-1 decision to St. Mary's.

The team lost but showed signs of improvement. Could this be a sign of a rebound by WC? Maybe so. Come find out this Saturday at 1:30 when the Shoremen take on Dickinson at Kibler Field.

REC Sports Strong Under Berry

by Greg Coss

Director of Recreational Sports Dennis Berry has made a concerted effort over the past five years to make the REC Sports Program an organization primarily run by students. After all, only the students really know what sports other students want to play.

"We try to make it a student run organization," said Berry. "I can't predict what everyone wants in the program. Only the students can answer that question."

The end result has arrived in complete student leadership, something of which Berry is quite proud. Kristy Hilgartner is the Director of Recreation this year, and Berry is very satisfied with this choice.

"Kristy has worked in the department for two years," he said, She is very insightful .She isthe most qualified person for the job."

Darren Vican and Mike Swanson will be Assistant Directors to Kristy in club sports and intramurals respectively. Tracy Greenawalt will be the Aerobic Dance Coordinator and Chris Spezio and Maria Banashak take on Program Coordinating responsibilities.

Berry likes the idea of a student run organization, but he also would like his program to focus on the non-athlete.

"Last year we made great strides when we gave the all-sports award to Team Mule, whose players are not on varsity teams. They participated in every event and deserved the recognition this time."

Berry also noted that 73% of men on campus participated in REC Sports last year. Berry is making athletes of us all!

Anthro Students Visit Nanticoke Powwow

by Jennifer Reddish

Several students from Dr. Amighi's Intro to Anthropology class left their textbooks behind last weekend and experienced another culture firsthand. The Nanticoke Indian Powwow, held September 7-8 in Millsboro, DE, raised money for the Nanticoke Indian Museum. The Powwow, which occurs the weekend after Labor Day, draws professional dancers and artisans from across the country to display the fine intricacies of Indian Art.

The Nanticoke Indian tribe is small; it's oldest living member is 95 years old. Very few pure-blooded Nanticoke's remain and their numbers dwindle with every intermarriage. However, the Nanticoke traditions thrive in their yearly celebration, the highlight of which is the Native American Dancing. Even though Native Americans do not perform their religious dances in public, their secular dances still convey the spirit of Indian life to visitors. Dance competitions exhibit the tremendous power of Indian dance. The Screaming Eagle Dance performed on Saturday seemed to highlight the dance exhibition.

The festival this year drew many tourists, not all of whom seemed to remember the "rules of tact" when visiting a different culture. With the tourists came the avid picture takers and videotape makers. Despite the attendance of "traditionally costumed" Indian models with whom visitors could have their pictures taken, some tourists still took pictures of Native Americans without their permission or worse, when expressly asked not to take photographs. As Cristabel Garcia-Zamur noted, "When the lady who performed the Screaming Eagle Dance said that this was for her father and asked everyone not to take her picture, this woman right next to me still dragged out her camera and snapped a picture."

This did not seem to cloud the enjoyment of the Native Americans for whom the powwow was expressly held. Most of the visiting Native Americans and avid powwow tourists camped at the festival sight to enjoy the full weekend of the festivities. Dr. Amighi of Anthropology at Washington College noted after her experience at the Powwow, "I thought it interesting how my view of the powwow differed from the Native American perspective. I found it congested with tourists who seemed rude and indifferent to the festivities. Yet, when I spoke with one Native American woman of the Nanticoke tribe, she seemed thrilled by the great number of visitors and Indians. It seems that the years of intermarriage of Native Americans with other cultures has made them slightly indistinguishable from the tourists at times."

Trout Holds Forum

Construction, Diversity Among Topics Discussed

by Kris Wallenburg

This last Thursday, September 12, President Trout held his first President's Forum for this academic year in the Casey Academic Center Forum. Approximately thirty-six students were in attendance to hear the President's State of the College's Address and to discuss issues of concern to the student body.

President Trout stated that the "financial trouble" which the college anticipated toward the end of last year "ties to the state of the economy." He explained that the college "depends on the income from the Endowment Fund and there were a lot of companies last year that didn't pay dividends;" which, when coupled with the low interest rates lead to a shortage in the Endowment Income. Trout attributed the balanced budget to gift income, at which the WC Alumni placed 17th among thirty-three hundred institutions of higher education for the percentage of alumni who support this institution.

Trout went on to stress the importance of creating a climate of admissions consciousness, admissions support among the students. "Anything that any of you can do which would help us with students that you know who are looking at college is very important."

Bringing students up to date on the construction projects around campus, Trout stated that the Johnson B. Lifetime Fitness Center will be open for use by approximately January 15. Phase I of the Hynson Lounge project is scheduled to open around the 28th of September. Phase II of the project will probably begin this coming summer.

President Trout announced the proposal of a new academic building which would house both faculty offices and academic classrooms. "When I think about an academic building, I think about a ratio between faculty office space and classroom space. A place where students and faculty can intermingle." The proposed building sites for this new academic building are next to Dunning Hall, next to the Spanish House, the parking lot next to Tawes so the building would be an outcroping from the Tawes Theatre, or directly across from Bill Smith. "Will all this happen, who knows? I hope it will. I feel that any college that can afford five million for athletics should be able to afford five million for academics."

Trout mentioned that lights were in the process of being placed in the Bill Smith lot and in the North Lot. Mrs. Casey donated the money for the lights that were placed in the North Lot. Trout stated that he was very concerned about the problem of safety and that he will continue to improve the lighting conditions on campus. He also noted that a Sexual Harassment Policy will be promulgated within the month and will be out next month.

The major emphasis of President Trout's address was the issue of diversity at Washington College. During the summer, President Trout, Acting Dean Talyor, Dr. Cades, Mr. Kevin Coveney, and Dr. O'Connor were invited to attend the Lily Foundation Workshop on the Liberal Arts, in Colorado Springs. "An institution takes with them a problem or issue of

by Sherry Menton

A fire broke out in the engine of one of WC's culture vans around 9:00 pm last Saturday night as it was on its way back from Baltimore. Dawn Israel, driver of the van, said, "People had begun to signal to us to pull over... we thought that perhaps it was a broken tail light." Fumes began to seep into the van from under the floorboard, and these were followed by "a loud popping noise," so Israel immediately pulled the van over to the side of Rte. 97.

As thick black smoke rose from the rear of the vehicle, Israel and passengers India Henson, Pamela Pinckney, Bridgette Ferris, and Ramsey Bigham all grabbed their belongings and retreated a prudent distance from the van. "We knew it was going to blow," Israel said, "and by the time we ran several yards away from it, the van was totally consumed by flames."

A passerby contacted the police about the blaze, and the students were taken to the Anne Arundel County Police Barracks, which is where the Washington College Security retrieved them.

The cause of the malfunction is being looked into. According to the records in the Student Affairs office, a new engine was put into the van last year.

The Queen Anne's Hall residents had signed up for the van to take a shopping trip into Baltimore, and when they had gone to pick up the van at Maintenance on Saturday morning, no one was there to sign the van out or even to tell them which one they were supposed to take. Israel explained, "After testing all three of the vans with our key we discovered the van that was for us. To put it nicely, the van was in very poor condition."

On the way there, Ramsey Bigham discovered the hole in the floorboard, through which the warning fumes later escaped. Except for its noisiness, the van ran smoothly until the

USSA Opposes Thomas Nomination

Students from all across the country have voted overwhelmingly to oppose the confirmation of Judge Clarence Thomas to the U.S. Supreme Court at the national conference of the United States Student Association (USSA), which represents over 3.5 million students at 350 colleges and universities. The 44th Annual Congress of USSA was hosted by the student government of the University of Wisconsin - Milwaukee.

USSA President Tajel Shah commented, "Through his speeches and writings, Judge Thomas has indicated his opposition to many remedies which have been introduced to assist with the autonomy of women, the elderly, and the historically disenfranchised. This position is counter to the students' dedication to the principles of expanding access to higher education for all persons regardless of race, gender, and age. USSA also supports the right of all women to reproductive choice and demands that Judge Thomas reveal his position on this issue."

The resolution was introduced by USSA's National Women's Student Caucus, the National People of Color Student Coalition, the Women of Color Caucus, and the Lesbian, Gay, and Bisexual Caucus of USSA. It stated that although the confirmation of Judge Clarence Thomas to the Supreme Court would retain the seat of a Supreme Court Justice of African descent, USSA opposes him based on his previously stated positions and practice on affirmative action, reproductive rights, and discrimination.

To express opposition to Judge Thomas, USSA and the National Abortion Rights Action League's (NARAL) Campus Organizing Project will be organizing various activities in Wisconsin, Arizona, and Ohio, among other states, such as postcard and letter writing campaigns.

USSA is the oldest and largest student organization in the country, and has advocated for students in the nation's capitol for over 44 years. Its membership is made up of student government associations and student activists from across the United States.

OPINION/EDITORIAL

Invasion of Privacy?

Now is the time of year when many students are buying computers, either because they've just arrived at college and are equipping themselves, or because they don't want to have to deal with the term-paper crunch at the library's computer room ever again. Many students who are buying computers, or who have theirs already, are getting their Macs hooked up to the campus network, to fully take advantage of the software that WC makes available for student use.

What most of these students don't know, however, is that the innocent-seeming software that enables their network hookup also enables anyone in the Computing Center with access to the right software to see the filenames of everything you have on your hard drive.

The offending file is called "WC Responder", and it is placed in the System Folder when the rest of your network software is installed. This program does serve a valuable purpose. If your network connection should fail to work, and you call down to the Computing Center yelling and screaming and wanting to know what is wrong with it, the person at that end can test the connection without leaving the Computing Center. The GraceLAN Responder acts as a sort of computerized sonar; it sends a signal directly to your individual machine, and if the trace comes back, you know that the connection is still established. The responder can also see your startup initialization files (INITs), to see if your system problems are occurring because of incompatible INITs.

As far as students are told, that is the extent of the purpose and capability of the GraceLAN Responder. Some Elm staff members, however, have seen demonstrations of this program, during which it is used to see all the files on a hard drive, not just the INITs. While your files cannot actually be accessed or changed, the names of every file you have are open to scrutiny. Some people might not care about this, as long as their files cannot be changed. However, since students are not told that software with this capability is being placed on their hard drives, we believe that this constitutes an invasion of privacy.

While simply obtaining access to filenames may not be a crime in the sense that software piracy is, it is an unauthorized foray into someone else's computer files.

The job that the GraceLAN Responder performs is important to the WC computing network. The Elm is by no means suggesting that everyone should dump this file out of their system folder - the Computing Center then might not be willing or able to help you should your system ever crash. Nor do we believe that anyone in the Computing Center sits around and browses through students' hard drives for fun. We do strongly recommend that every student and staff member who has a network hookup and is concerned about a possible invasion of their filenames should ask the Computing Center about this program, so you can decide for yourself if you want to take the risk of removing the WC Responder, or instead take the risk of leaving it in place.

Athletic Department Members Express Support for Geoff Miller

To the Editor:

At this time we feel it is appropriate to voice our support for Geoff Miller. Since his tenure began as Athletic Director, Geoff Miller has had a decidedly positive impact upon Washington College. He orchestrates unity and equity within the athletic department, and has an open-door policy regarding suggestions and creative ideas. He is a strong leader who demands compliance with NCAA, College, and departmental policy, and conducts regular staff meetings to facilitate and ensure proper communication. Geof has assembled a qualified staff which strives for challenging goals that are in keeping with the demands of modern intercollegiate athletics. He has played a vital role in the upgrading of all the athletic facilities at the College, including the new Lifetime Fitness Center, the renovation of the Cain Athletic Center, and the upgrading of game and practice fields. He has strong ties with alumni, as evidenced by the annual success of the Sho'men Club, which he launched in 1988. His continued professional development has earned him numerous offices and wide acclaim from his peers across the country.

Moreover, his compassionate and sensitive personality is one that makes him extremely accessible to both staff and students, his loyalty to the College is unquestionable, and his decisions are clearly rendered wtih the College's reputation in mind.

Furthermore, we are enthused about the leadership and direction that President Trout is providing our academic institution. Hard work and commitment have enabled Washington College to enjoy a great deal of success over the years. We are confident that this tradition of excellence and integrity will continue.

Health Center Needs Full-Time Physician

Dear Editor:

If you could only hear me recite this aloud for you, then the pain and suffering you would be going through would certainly be sufficient to empathize with the situation which I and so many others are faced with here at the WAC. I don't know. Maybe it's those built-in ACs up in Cardinal, or maybe it's the more-than-polar climate control settings in Decker/ Dunning. Whatever it is, I and a substantial percentage of the student body have come down with something commonly lumped into the category of "Flu." Symptoms range: sore throat; hacking (up things); running, walking, or standing noses; aches and pains. Now there are two types of people-those who go to Health Services for an excuse note so they can miss class and those who go to get medicine so they won't have to miss class. Which ever category you might fit, it seems that getting those certain necessities is no simple task. The problem lies in the fact that there is only one registered doctor employed at the Health Center, and he is the only person "qualified" to dispense real drugs, antibiotics. I was once again informed of this on Tuesday morning in the examination room. The nurse "prescribed" to me some nice Promet VC cough syrup (Generic for Phenergan VC syrup) to "bring up some of the (stuff)" from my lungs. I was also issued 400mg Ibuprofen (Generic for Motrin) for my aches. Two generic medicines for my generic bug. I wondered what all that money my parents paid in insurance was going for. Generic cotton swabs? Generic condoms? Now I know why we get three for free.

The nurse told me to "come back tomorrow when the doctor is in. Two PM to three PM." I informed her that I had another lab and could possibly get out for a few minutes so that I could get some real drugs. At 2:20 I left lab, and as I walked into the lobby of the Health Services, I was greeted by twenty faces looking up from their magazines. I realized that I was not alone in my problem, except for the fact that I was still in class. Unfortunately, I couldn't stay, so as of today, I'm still nurturing my cold generically.

Why can't the school employ a full-time physician? We shouldn't have to schedule our afflictions and infections around the part-time doctor who works out the ever-so-efficient, first-class Kent Queen Anne's County Hospital. Once again, it comes down to the familiar question, "Where is all of our money going?" I think that there needs to be convenient and qualified help at all times at the Health Services. We could do the inexpensive thing and qualify the nurses to dispense real drugs or hire a full-time physician. Now everyone knows the school won't choose the more expensive option, but please, how about a real service for the students. We're paying for it, aren't we?

Sincerely,
John Bates

Weekly Absurdity

Isn't it absurd that an adminstration that, two year ago, urged students to move off campus if they were able to, now instead is forbidding students from living off campus in their freshman and sophomore years?

Many of us know this story already - about how the Admissions Office was predicting a record number of incoming students, which would lead to on campus housing shortages. So all students for whom it was financially feasable were urged to move off campus.

Lo and behold, the new year starts, and there is a record number of students living off campus. That wasn't good for the school's coffers, or for the social cohesiveness, so a new policy went into effect, to wit: no freshmen and sophomores could move off campus (unless, of course, their families came from the Chestertown area).

This in and of itself isn't absurd -- it's the way of the world. A prediction is made, so a policy is formed to deal with the predicted circumstances, except that the policy goes too far, so another policy has to be formed to overcompensate for the original overblown prediction. Sounds like the world economy, doesn't it?

Nothing is wrong with wanting students to have the experience of living on campus, of being in the middle of the college community 24 hours a day. But for many students, that palls after a while. They want to be able to cook their own meals, wash their clothes without worrying about them getting stolen, and study at any hour of the day or night without having to first bang on the ceiling to get the guy above you to turn his &^%$ stereo down. Fending for yourself - having to keep track of the rent, the utility bills, the groceries, is every bit as much a part of a liberal education as being in the midst of a hall of beer guzzlers.

Perhaps the students and the administration need to work together to create a new housing policy that's less knee-jerk reactionary and more sensible for students and the school.

Andrew D. Aprill

Certainly. The rights of individuals is not a "big city" issue. While the gay and lesbian community may be more vocal in an urban setting, due in large part to their numbers, taken at the individual level gay rights are just as important here as anywhere else even though fewer people are involved.

Task Force and GALA Will Heighten Awareness

by Sara Hunt

For years the students of Washington College blissfully have ignored the homosexual population on campus. Sure, the Gay and Lesbian Alliance (GALA) has been listed in the W.C. catalogue as a campus organization, but no one has ever paid it much attention. GALA, for its part, has remained remarkably quiet. "No gays here," the homophobes gleefully remarked to each other. So while the rest of the country has been struggling with the issue of homosexuality, Washington College managed to appear liberal and to keep GALA in the closet, so to speak.

But now all of that might come to an end. At the recent faculty meeting, Dr. Ed Weissman's proposal to form a Gay/Lesbian Task Force to uncover campus wide feelings on homosexuality was accepted. From there, the task force hopes to find ways to improve the standing of gays and lesbians on campus. The GALA-supported task force will consist of faculty and student volunteers. All participation will be, of course, voluntary and hopefully confidentiality will be guaranteed.

The co-presidents of GALA think that the task force is a wonderful idea. Education is their goal; they want to be an accepted part of campus life. Toward that end, GALA is going to sponsor on-campus events this year. The average student doesn't see the task force as such a good idea. "Who cares? There aren't that many gays anyway.", "Why are they getting special treatment?", and "What are we going to have to do; fill in our sexual preference next to our race on application forms?" are just some responses to questions about the task force. Most students, surprisingly, had a very valid concern; they wondered if people are going to get hurt by rumors.

Archaic Laws Part of the Problem

by Joseph Hamilton and
Ivan Schwabe

In response to the adopted resolution to form a "Task Force on the Status of Lesbians and Gay Men" in the Washington College community, the Washington College Elm has posed the question of whether this investigation is a "necessary measure" to take. In order to answer this question, however, one must reach an understanding of: the broader political implications of the resolution, and how these implications relate to the situation of lesbians and gays in this particular community.

As this particular community is, in essence, a sample of the greater community of Kent County, and also of Maryland, it has a tendency to reflect the views and attitudes of this larger whole. Maryland is one of 15 states that still adheres to and enforces Sodomy laws formulated in Medieval Christian Europe, prior to the drafting of the Constitution of the United States of America. Laws forbidding the activity of oral copulation stem from this period, also. With the maintenance of these laws, the moral views of the Judiciary System of the U.S. today remain archaic views.

The Constitution of the United States takes as one of its central tenets the view that no single religious, political or moral position can have priority over another. Plurality, as it is commonly known, is the novelty and strength of the United States' democracy. Currently, Sodomy laws in this country are founded on the morality and world-view of a single religion. This in effect denies citizens their inalienable rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. These laws are un-Constitutional.

State laws in opposition to the direction of the Union as a whole was the primary reason for the Civil War. By any state dragging its feet, it is passively attempting to detach itself from the thoughts and ideals that the U.S. Constitution was found upon. If the United States is to live up to its Constitution, then the citizens must examine any attempts to undermine the integrity of its goals.

This particular community is now becoming concerned about examining the rights and freedoms that the lesbians and gay men do not have in this community. A possible outcome of the Task Force, which is to analyze the oppressions present, would help develop an expanded definition of the freedoms outlined in the Constitution. Such an expanded definition of freedom would include not only the legal freedom from both physical and verbal harassment but freedom to develop themselves in an atmosphere conducive to personal growth. As an institution devoted to higher learning, it is imperative that such an atmosphere be created. And, without an attempt by the institution and its community to educate about lesbians and gays and dissolve homophobia, then this environment will never come to be.

Possible steps in this direction, as suggested by the resolution, would include the addition of an empathetic sys-

Task Force is Misuse of Money

by James L. Jenkins, Jr.

In response to Professor Edward J. Weissman's proposal that a task force be established by the college president to determine the status of homosexuals at Washington College and how to protect their rights, I would like to voice some criticism of the guidelines this new task force is supposed to follow. Aside from my disapproval of homosexuality, four objectives of the task force deeply disturb me, particularly because it seems that their purpose is to elevate the rights of homosexuals above the rights of heterosexuals.

For starters, one of the task force's duties is to provide protection against verbal abuse. Why should I object to such a provision? Simply because what constitutes verbal abuse is undefined in the task force objection outline. Is it going to consist of a string of vulgarities or threats spoken by a student or group of students to one or many homosexuals? Or is it going to involve expressions of disbelief by one or several students and their objections to such a sexual practice? If the latter is considered then not only should the task force prepare to have Washington College branded as a school of Politically Correct thought, but perhaps it should ask Congress to find a way to alter the Bill of Rights so that it still guarantees the freedom of speech and press unless homosexuals are offended by what they see and hear.

Another objection I have to the task force is that it seeks services from the college. Anybody who has been at this school longer than three days knows that this school is willing to use our tuition money to fund practically anything and everything. If the college plans to allow for grants from the SGA or the administration then perhaps the school ought to send a letter to each and every tuition-paying

Thomas Confirmation Likely

WASHINGTON, D.C.

Last Monday, September 16, Clarence Thomas ended a 5-day interview before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Senators of both parties say his chances for conformation appear favorable, although Democrats continue to complain that during the interview Thomas avoided too many questions; including ones on the abortion issue.

IRAQ

A United Nations report, summarizing the findings of four inspections of Iraqi nuclear facilities, says that if Iraq's production plants had not been destroyed they could have gathered enough material to build two or three atomic weapons by the mid-1990's.

Prime Minister Saadoun Hammadi has been dismissed from his post and from the Revolutionary Command Council. He is to be replaced by Shiite Mohammed Hamza Zubeidi. Analysts say that Hammadi's ouster indicates President Saddam Hussein's determination to dismiss officials whose loyalty he suspects, and also his increasing reliance on a circle comprised mostly of relatives and members of his Sunni clan. In recent weeks the Iraqi government has refused to let a U.N. inspection team use its own helicopters; moved a large military presence into the city of Nirkuk, and resisted US-led efforts to hold a Middle East peace conference

More than 370 asylum-seekers have arrived in the West German State of Hesse, fleeing from East Germany because of attacks by neo-Nazis and other right-wing extremists on their shelters and apartments. Many of the attacks have been made on Asians and black Africans.

tem of support, from the administration to health services to the members of the community themselves. The Gay, Lesbian and Bi-Sexual Union, as it is now called, certainly wishes to assist their members reach a healthier mode of life. These steps, and others that may develop as time goes on will contribute to the movement from prejudicial attitudes to a greater understanding of humanity.

It is our opinion that the Task Force on the Status of Lesbians and Gay Men presents the opportunity for the Washington College Community to contribute to a more humane world. The maintenance of democratic pluralism will be upheld. The welfare of the people of the United States and their nation as a whole will come into sight. Finally, we will see the heightened awareness and respect for the diversity of culture in our own particular community.

parent and donating alumnus to let them know that some of their money is going to fund a homosexual organization. After all, if the school is bold enough to support such an organization, it should be brave enough to let its donors and bill payers know just where some of their dollars are going. As a student who pays for his tuition with his own money, I would very much like to see the college take this step should it divert funds to a gay-rights organization.

A third objection I have to the task force is its purpose to make the Washington College community open to gays and lesbians. What if the community does not want to do so? Does it have a say in the matter? In conjunction with my first objection just because this school is a liberal institution does not mean that it should throw away its decency and any morality it has left to display to force its students to accept what many see as a perverted sexual practice or imply that they should. (I wonder what ol' George Washington, a staunch Right-wing Christian, would have thought of this task force objective?)

Finally, the task force is also to provide "services to the entire College community in the process of recovery from homophobia." Is this provision suggesting that the school is to provide nothing short of counseling to students who refuse to accept the idea of homosexuality? What if a student or a group of students are vehemently opposed to this idea for whatever reason, be it personal or religious? Are they to be seen as "abnormal" or "second-class citizens" in the eyes of the administration? It sounds to me like this provision will allow, if not require, the task force to overlook objections to homosexuality and continue to force its "therapy" on people.

In conclusion, the expressed duties of this new task force are nothing short of elevating the desired rights of a minority group over the rights of the rest of the student body. Furthermore, it seems that this task force also has the privilege of blocking resistance by any students or faculty to the idea of homosexuality or the establishment of gay-rights organizations on campus, a privilege which should clearly be overridden by the student body. Since Washington College prides itself on a close relationship between its faculty and students, I believe the school made a serious blunder in not conferring with the student body before creating this task force and outlining its assigned duties; however, I also feel that the school can somewhat correct this fallacy by repealing the resolution of September 10, 1991, and turning to the students for their thoughts on the matter. The students of this campus hold a variety of opinions. It would be decent of the school to listen first to what they have to say before taking action through a task force.

Washington College is very small. Everyone knows everybody's business and news travels fast. There are those on campus who will interpret participation with the task force or even interest in the task force as an admission of homosexuality. People are going to speculate, even more so than now, on the sexual leanings of others. And people will persecute their peers whom they feel are gay, even if they are not. The rumor mill is very unkind.

One of the co-presidents of GALA said she is prepared for verbal harassment. She believes it is part of the educating process and is to be expected. Hopefully, the rest of the homosexual population is as ready as she is. This is an conservative school; as a whole the campus doesn't like to disturb the status quo. Those who try to affect change are looked down upon. The task force must be prepared for opposition and must take as many precautions as necessary to prevent damaging anyone's reputation. Counseling services should expect more problems dealing with all the issues concerning homosexuality including verbal abuse, family acceptance, and self acceptance. Perhaps health services and the task force can arrange an open forum to discuss issues of sexuality and to quell any concerns regarding the task force. Right now the student body is unsure of what this will mean for them and many are afraid. GALA, the task force, and health services must be prepared to deal with and assuage the student's insecurities and fears. Of course, I may be wrong. This college is nothing if not apathetic. It is quite possible most people will continue their studies blissfully ignoring the homosexual population on campus. And that sort of apathy is as reprehensible as discrimination.

Dr. Walter Roemer Speaks to Students

by Rachael Fink

Monday night the first floor of Reid Hall had a special visitor. "Think of me as your uncle, Uncle Walter." 'Uncle Walter,' or Dr. Walter Roemer as he is more formally known, works full time at a mental health facility on Rt. 213, and comes periodically to talk to students on WC campus about everything from drug abuse to safe sex. He started the program several years ago in response to the growing need for awareness concerning the problems and pitfalls that face college students.

Among the topics discussed, drugs and alcohol were concentrated on the most. Dr. Roemer revealed that two students have already come to him this semester and been identified as alcoholics. He said that while it is positive for those two students to be receiving treatment, it helps to illustrate the magnitude of the problem on campus. Of alcohol he says, "(It) is an aggressive drug. It decreases your inhibitions, so whatever emotion you start out with - anger, depression - gets blown up. Alcohol will make it worse." Roemer stressed that while drinking in itself was not harmful it must be done in moderation; excessive drinking always leads to problems.

With much audience participation, the self styled uncle proceeded to list some of the symptoms of drug and/or alcohol abuse. Denial was at the top of the list followed by aggressiveness, moodiness, inattention to responsibilities and inability to drink 'socially,' that is without getting drunk. The "it's just a beer" theory was discussed and dismissed as denial in the light of the fact that a beer contains as much alcohol as a glass of wine and as much as a mixed drink. It follows that a single case of beer is equal to a fifth of whiskey in raw alcohol content. Another interesting aspect of alcoholism that was discussed is co-dependency, the enabling of the alcoholic to continue his/her destructive behavior by someone close - a good friend, boyfriend, girlfriend. Roemer stressed that if the situation persisted for any length of time "...you'll go crazy. Co-dependents can need as much counseling as the alcoholic."

As for trying to help an alcoholic once the symptoms have been recognized, Dr. Roemer had some very specific things to say. Confront him/her, but let him/her pick the time and situation; express your concern for the friendship and for his/her well-being; base observation on facts not hearsay - only use examples of symptoms that you, personally have seen; and never 'accuse' him/her of being an alcoholic; express your helplessness and try to get him/her to help him/herself by seeking counseling - just for you. Roemer stressed the need for qualified help to deal with the complex psychological and physiological aspects of addiction. In regards to alcohol specifically, he pointed out this startling fact, "alcohol withdrawal is more deadly and dangerous than heroin withdrawal."

Another important issue covered by Dr. Roemer was depression. He admitted that depression is normal in everyday life, but that it can go to the extreme in which case it becomes very dangerous. Some symptoms of severe depression include withdrawal from friends and family, apathy concerning classes, hobbies, and life in general, extreme loss of appetite and weight loss, fitful sleep and early morning waking. He pointed out that depression can be just as dangerous as drug addiction and should be dealt with carefully. In dealing with a depressed person, Roemer discussed the importance of being a good listener - don't offer too much advice, and don't be overly sweet with unfounded reassurances. As difficult as it may be, ask if the depressed person has any plans to hurt themselves - a hesitation could be a clue to a serious problem. He also cautioned about sudden upswings in mood - a happy -go -lucky person giving away things could be saying goodbye. At this point, professional assistance should be called immediately.

The final topic covered by Dr. Roemer was safe sex. He stressed that no matter how in love you think you are it's not worth dying for, so always use protection.

Throughout his talk with the women of first floor Reid Dr. Roemer was blunt, candid and to the point. "Uncles can say these things," was his justification for some of the shocking things he said. And while some of it was shocking, all of it was important and helpful, which is why Uncle Walter does what he does. Roemer will talk with any group of students who invite him to speak but he especially likes to talk to the freshmen, who are entering an unfamiliar environment. It is always reassuring to know that their is help available in time of need.

People Now Watching The State

by Kris Wallenburg

The William James Forum opened its 29th year on Wednesday, September 18, with the introduction of Dr. Tom Kessinger to the Washington College Community. Dr. Kessinger is the 11th President of Haverford College, a specialist on South Asia, and a trained historian. He spoke on The Decline of The Nation-State (Even Ours?) in the Casey Center Forum at 7:30pm.

According to Kessinger's lecture, the nation-state began to emerge in the 19th century where independence and separation was very evident. Then with the growth of international trade, international relations in the 20th century, this independent state was replaced with the state of interdependence.

In this state of interdependence, we have started to witness the breakdown of boundaries. This realization has come about with several crises, the Great Depression, the Energy Crises, AIDS, and the drug trade. The Great Depression had no boundaries. "Everyone in the world was affected by the depression even though they may not have been affected in the same fashion." Everyone in the world was affected by the Energy Crises of 1973, 1978, and 1979. AIDS knows no boundaries; each of us has an equal opportunity of contracting the disease. "We are in a position that we are part of the world."

Dr. Kessinger went on to relate the state of interdependence to the decline in sovereignty. "It is hard to convince people of this - about the absence of our own sovereignty, our own powerlessness especially after the Persian Gulf Crisis." People are unwilling to talk about dependence; about the dependence on the International Debt, the energy dependence, and the dependence on drugs. People have "internal options" about supply and demand when it comes to things like the energy dependence and the dependence on drugs. We can always find or develop a new way of harnessing energy and we can treat the dependency on drugs and therefore hamper the demand for the supply, but there isn't much we can do about the International Debt. And there are many other things that we can not control that we are dependent on, like the banking industry and the electronic transfer of monies, or when American companies employ a cheaper labor force from foreign countries. What comes after this state of interdependence? What of the 21st century?

Dr. Kessinger envisioned the "new world" as a transnational move, a relationship where nations become irrelevant. A move towards "one world" which is diverse in both culture and language. A world where trade is between people or businesses and not nations. A world of broad-based individuals who have the capability to make technical/scientific judgements and moral/ethical judgements.

Dr. Kessinger stressed that he is not talking about the end of the United States, but we have to be able to recognize what is occurring around us and to be able to "control and handle" it in the "new world". We should not stop the advancement of technology, i.e. the computer industry, but we must find ways to monitor the electronic flow of funds. We need to harness, understand, and control this technology. "As Ted Koppel stated that 'in George Orwell's book, 1984, the state becomes all powerful and is then controlling us and Big Brother is watching us' through television. The reality is the opposite of what Orwell predicted. The people are now watching the State, i.e. Tienneman Square - everyone saw it."

McLain Program Begins Year

The McLain Program in Environmental Studies opens its 1991-92 program with the presentation of Elizabeth Buckman, the Development Officer for the Chesapeake Bay Foundation. Her lecture is entitled the "Dilemma of the Chesapeake Bay and Opportunities to make a Real Difference." She will be talking about some of the ecological problems of the Chesapeake Bay which are explored by the Chesapeake Bay Foundation and the internship opportunities available to all interested students regardless of their major.

The McLain Program in Environmental Studies is curated by Donald A. Munson, Chair of the Biology Department. Some of the goals of the program are: to increase interest in and to provide information about environmental affairs to all members of the Washington Community and to all interested persons; to direct joint Chesapeake Bay Foundation and Washington College internships; and to develop other sound internships with other environmental organizations.

The curator of the program is responsible for coordinating the program which includes arranging for guest speakers (local and national), organizing a symposia on environmental issues, and possibly traveling to environmental sites. This past year some of the distinguished speakers who visited the Washington College Community were Christopher D'Elia, Director of the Maryland Sea Grant College; Dr. Victor Kennedy, from the Horn Point Environmental Laboratory; Dr. James R. Pratt, from Pennsylvania State University; and Michael Sutton, from the World Wildlife Fund. Also, this previous year, the program held two symposiums; in the Fall, Joseph Mihursky, Director of the Chesapeake Research Consortium talked about "Pollution Detection, Abatement and Monitoring"; in the Spring, Tom Horton, author, Verna Harrison, from the Maryland Department of Natural Resources, John Cumberland, Professor of Economics at the University of Maryland, and Dr. Joseph Mihursky, spoke on "The Future of the Chesapeake Bay."

Washington College has an ideal location when it comes to studying and investigating environmental issues. First of all, we are sitting on one of the world's largest estuaries, the Chesapeake Bay. And secondly, we are a small institution with a significant number of students interested in environmental issues. So why don't we use what we have?

by Tanya Allen

Josephine and Brenda flew towards K.A. "Oh, goody!" Brenda said as they came within range of the loud music, "They're having a keg party!"

"A keg party?" Josephine sniveled, still thinking about Napoleon.

"Oh, yes!" Brenda said. "Washington College keg parties are fun! They're so much fun that just about everyone on campus goes to them, forsaking the multitude of other exciting activities in Chestertown—things such as bowling, shopping at Roses, going downtown to sit on a bench and stare at the River...."

"Ah," said Josephine.

"Keg parties are so wonderful," Brenda went on, "That students will even go to them instead of making pilgrimages to Chestertown's magic fountain!"

"Magic fountain?"

"Yes! Downtown, next to the cement toilet bowl erected in memory of Senator James Alfred Pearce, is a magic fountain—one which, if you throw pennies into it, will grant any wish you dare to dream!"

"Hm..." said Josephine, storing this bit of information away to use another day. As they flew towards K.A. they passed a spider marching up and down the Cater Walk, carrying a placard printed with the words "REPENT AND BE SAVED! THE END OF THE WAC IS AT HAND!"

"First the Elm was destroyed!" the spider was crying, "Then the culture van blew up! YOU could be next! It's the end of the WAC as we know it! REPENT and be SAVED!"

"Oh, Charlie...." Brenda said as they passed the spider. "Craaazy Charlie....what are we ever going to do about you?"

"Hi, Brenda!" said the spider to the butterfly, "Repent and be saved!"

"Who...." Josephine began when they got out of earshot of the spider.

"Never mind." Brenda said. "I'll tell you later." As they came to K.A. they passed a young man, sitting with his head in his hands, a pool of vomit at his feet. "Keg parties are so much fuuuuun!" Brenda repeated as they flew inside.

"Napoleon? Napoleon?" Josephine called, "Are you here?" K.A. was dim, and smelly, and crowded with humans. There were a bunch of sophomores standing against a wall, singing the first of several "Variations on a WACy Theme" to the tune of that old favorite "If you're happy and you know it...."

"If you want to buy expensive books
Come to WAC....
If you're daring, try our crosswalk
Come to WAC....
If you play lacrosse or write,
And like to party all the night,
If you enjoy running around naked
Come to WAC...."

As the sophomores launched into another famous song: "Pop Goes the Culture Van...."

"...There goes all of the student's fun...
Pop! Goes the Culture Van..."

Brenda pulled up short and all of her wing-color turned pastel. "What's wrong?" Josephine asked. "Did you see Napoleon? What's wrong?"

Brenda stared for a moment, then gave her head a violent shake and said "No...I didn't see Napoleon, and nothing's wrong, nothing. I just saw someone I don't really want to see, that's all...." Josephine looked up and saw a bunch of moths flying around the punch. One glanced over at Napoleon and Brenda. For a second he looked startled as his eyes met Brenda's, but then his face became expressionless. He muttered something to one of his friends, who shrugged and called goodbye as Napoleon flew out of the door. Brenda was silent as she watched him exit. Her wings were shaking slightly, and she looked dazed.

"Brenda?" Josephine said, "Who was that? What's come over you? What's wrong?"

"Nothing," said Brenda in a quiet, small voice. "Nothing. Your boyfriend doesn't seem to be here. Let's leave."

So Josephine followed after Brenda, confused, as the sophomores began singing the John Cougar Mellancamp tune

"I was admitted to a small school
And I go to a small school
Gonna die in that small school
If I don't pass Philosophy...."

"Brenda, are you sure you're ok?"

"Oh I cannot forget from where it is I come from
I cannot forget the people who love me
I can be myself, yeah, in a small school
The people there let me be just what I want to be...."

(Special thanks to Tara Kidwell for coming up with and helping to compose the first part of "Variations on a WACy theme")

Safety at WC

Why Not Phones?

by Rachael Fink

Ask any administrator what the single most important aspect of campus life is and he will tell you - safety. When it comes right down to the wire, safety is more important than education - one can't learn if one's security is threatened. Generally speaking, the WC campus is secure; most areas are lighted at night, there is a round-the-clock security team, and campus awareness is high. But regardless of the measures taken to insure the invulnerability of the students, catastrophe will strike; and further measures must be taken to prevent unnecessary damage to WC and the WC students.

A key element of crisis intervention is communication, something that is difficult to achieve on campus, at this point. From the majority of rooms on campus one must travel down the hall, or all the way to a newer dorm to find a phone that will connect you with the people capable of solving your safety problems, wether they be of a medical or security nature. The instillation of a campus-wide telephone system would go a long way to solving this problem.

The likelihood of getting an all campus phone system is good, considering the relatively small size of the campus. Several other campuses this size have phones in each of the rooms, Skidmore, for example. Other colleges are in the process of installing phones to all the rooms (i.e.. the University of Delaware.) There are however some technical aspects that should be considered. The phone system requires a single pair of wires to each and every room, which explains why we can have a campus wide computer system easier than a phone system - the computer system needs only a single pair of wires to each dorm. As difficult as the wiring might make everything sound, there is a saving grace; there is a preexisting underground phone system on campus which can house the extra extentions needed

In addition to the safety factor, there are other advantages to having an all campus phone system. Communication between the faculty, administration and students would be simplified greatly. Students wouldn't have to pay extraordinary fees to C&P for them to come and install an individual hook-up. With a campus wide phone system there would be a one time charge of approximately two hundred dollars for a four year extension. And to top it all off, families would have peace of mind knowing that they can directly contact the students if a problem arises.

Along with the advantages, there is one large disadvantage to having a campus-wide phone system; the bureaucratic paperwork created. The administration would have to run the bills, distribute them to the students, and then collect the payments. When compared this to the advantage of increased campus safety alone, it is plain to see that the extra hassle would be well worth the result.

ARTS & ENTERTAINMENT

Take A Step Into The Past at the Renaissance Faire

by Sherry Menton

Hear, ye! hear, ye! Knights in heraldic devices, buxom maidens, wandering minstrels, filth-covered beggars, all await your pleasure at the Maryland Renaissance Festival.

This year marks the fifteenth anniversary of the RenFaire, held each fall in Crownsville, Maryland, just north of Annapolis. The Faire is open from 11 am until 7 pm every Saturday and Sunday through October 13. Cost of admission is $10.75.

For many Washington College students, going to the Faire has become a pilgrimage. Only a little over an hour away, the Faire offers a chance to wander through a sixteenth-century marketplace, to browse through every sort of handcrafted ware imaginable, and to sample real old fashioned cooking. Freshman Jessie Boone said of the Faire, "It's like you've stepped into a totally different world. I've been going for about four years and I love it."

Fletchers, chainmail makers, armorers, and bladesmiths are among the dealers in weaponry and armament at the Faire. From them you can purchase everything a good knight needs (you are not allowed to wear or carry weapons if you attend the Faire in costume, not even if the weapon is peace-bonded). Leatherworkers and costumers provide less warlike attire, and to top off your costuming, jewelers abound. While such finely made wares are costly, many Fairegoers derive hours of pleasure simply from window-shopping (or booth-shopping, in the absence of windows).

Some of the most popular attractions are the live performances held throughout the day on six different stages. Sword swallowing, juggling, magic, music, and jesting all are offered up for your enjoyment. A parody of Shakespeare, entitled "Shakespeare Skum," is always a sure bet for quality entertainment. Performed on a stage not unlike the innyard platforms of the Bard's era, "Skum" includes tragedy with a twist.

"They did really funny parodies of Hamlet, with Gertrude dressed like June Cleaver and carrying a plate of cookies," said sophomore Sara Hunt. "Shakespeare Skum was my favorite part of the Faire."

Sophomore Abrah Wilberding concurred. "Henry the Vee was hilarious."

Throughout the day, the star attractions at the Faire occur at the Joust Arena, where the story of Henry VIII and his wives unfolds. Henry, who along with other members of the Royal Court are portrayed by professional actors, appears at the Faire with his second wife, Anne Boleyn. One event is the "Court's Court," where the case of restitution to Katherine of Aragon, the first wife whom Henry had set aside, was finally decided. And rumors that Jane Seymour, the woman destined to become Henry VIII's third wife, is present at the Faire spells an unpleasant ending to Anne Boleyn's day...

Whether you view the Faire as a hands-on, historical learning experience, as a chance to shop for expensive trinkets, or a day-long string of live performances, the Maryland Renaissance Faire is an unusual diversion that WC students bored of the usual weekend entertainments should explore.

Poet Carolyn Forché

by Cindy Young

Poet Carolyn Forché read from her work on Wednesday evening here at Washington College. For those of you who were unable to attend or had trouble finding a seat due to the large crowd, you missed an interesting and moving reading by a woman who has seen many different views of the world. Forché, who spent time in El Salvador and is involved in human rights issues, began with a humorous anecdote of her youth and a poem about a friend she had lost contact with and was trying to locate. Later she admitted she had found the friend at a high school reunion - where else?

The most moving moments of the reading came when Forché read with emotion about topics such as the turbulent years during Vietnam, human rights violations in El Salvador, the victims of the Nazi camps, and the survivors of Nagasaki. and Hiroshima. Her poetry is about issues which, for the most part, the general population doesn't normally think about or doesn't want to think about. Anyone who was at the reading or has the opportunity to read Carolyn Forché's work would be hard-pressed to remain unmoved about the world we live in.

by Emily Daignault

In three weeks, Agatha Christie's play Ten Little Indians has been brilliantly taken from paper to stage. The auditions were held on August 29 in the Norman James Theater. The turnout was good and the talent was abundant. I had the pleasure of seeing most of this play on its final dress rehearsal. Now Ten Little Indians is finished, polished, and a superb piece of dramatic interpretation with a cometic twist. Ten Little Indians is a classic murder mystery that tells of the plight of ten strangers who are trapped on a private island. The characters have been brought together by an anonymous person. Each one has a piece of their past that is the reason for their presence. Things start to get strange when two of the characters die in rapid succession. Then slowly the group realizes that they are not alone. The killer is one of them!

The main characters in Ten Little Indians of Vera Claiborne, Captain Lombard and Justice Wargrave are expertly played by Abrah Wilberding, Richard McKee, and Ken Pipken. The scenes between Vera and Lombard are performed smoothly, with flirtation and fear being played off each other beautifully. Pipken does an impressive job in the role of Justice Wargrave, a judge who almost immediately takes on the role of detective once the murders commence. His strong and commanding performance stands out in a cast of exceptional actors. The commanding female role was that of Sara Hunt playing Emily Baxter. Hunt had her job cut out for her in portraying a prudish, uptight woman. However, once she steps onto the stage, the audience will have no trouble believing she is this character. Also of notice are the performances by Melissa Moorehead and Rachel Demma. Demma plays a compulsive liar named Blore, and Moorehead, a fast-paced young man named Anthony Marsten. These two have notable performances and show a strong future in the drama department. This cast seems endless in it's strong actors and their strong portrayals. Paul Briggs as Gen. MacKenzie, Rebecca Bryant as Dr. Armstrong, Kristen Hamilton as Mrs. Rodgers, Karyn Iacargelo as Mr. Rodgers and Eve Zartman as Fred.

Director Jason Imber has taken a talented cast, limited time and combined the two into a pleasing way to spend a few hours at the theater this weekend. This reporter can only guess at the difficulty involved in producing a three act play in three weeks. When asked what the whole production had been like Imber said, "It was the most fun I've had in a long time. It was a great cast and it was great to work with them."

The cast seemed to agree. They all responded with smiles, laughter at private jokes and genuine contentment when asked about the production of this play.

The best summation of this show was said by the Assistant Director, Ed Schroeder. "It's been fun. I've learned so much and been able to work with a lot of great and creative talents. After the show is over, well I might go to Wally World."

Ten Little Indians will be performed tonight and tomorrow night at 8 pm in Tawes theater. Reservations required.

The Juilliard Quartet is the oldest active string quartet. Members of the Quartet are Robert Mann, first violinist and the only member of the original Quartet; Joel Smirnoff, second violin and newest member; Samuel Rhodes, viola; and Joel Krosnick, cello. Their repertoire comprises of nearly 400 works, over 150 of them by 20th century composers. The Quartet has given the premieres of almost 40 American works.

The Quartet has also made several television performances and over 100 recordings. It has received Grammies for its CBS Masterworks digital recording of all the Beethoven quartets, its three-record collection of the Bartok quartets, and for its recordings of the complete Schoenberg quartets and the Debussy/Ravel quartets.

This performance will be the Quartet's seventh appearance in the college Concert Series.

Field Hockey Wins, Then Loses 1st

by Julie Greene

Washington College's Field Hockey team returned to campus this past weekend with a loss to Farleigh Dickinson University, making their overall record 2-1. Late last week the Sho'men shutout Wesley 4-0.

Elizabeth Olivere scored early in the first half against Wesley, followed with goals by Renee Guckert, and Eleanor Shriver assisted by Amy McCleary. In the second half, Jenifer Blenckstone assisted Caroline Jensen in getting the last goal of the game. WC dominated the game outshooting Wesley 20 to 2.

Attacker Maria Jerardi stated that the team's game with Wesley allowed them to work on their fundamentals.

It was a different story on Saturday. Despite eleven goal attempts, the Shorewomen failed to score. Goalie Brigid DeVries had seven saves against Farleigh Dickinson, but the Shorewomen were closed out 2-0.

Sophomore defender Kris Phalen emphasized that the score did not reflect their effort in the game against FDU-Madison. "We played a good defensive game, we just couldn't get the ball in the cage."

Jerardi added that "FDU's high level of play helped us see where our weaknesses were. The loss was not a detriment to the season."

Coach Diane Guinan stated that she is "not disappointed with anything we've done so far, although there are still things we need to work on."

Commenting on the season so far, Guinan mentioned that "there are a lot of new players. The transition from the high school game requires working hard, trying to play together. When we're together, there will be a big impact."

The Field Hockey team is travelling to the Salisbury State University Sunfest Tournament this weekend anticipating some exciting and competitive contests.

Along with Salisbury State, opponents include Catholic, Eastern Mennonite, and Lebanon Valley. Although neither Salisbury nor Eastern Mennonite were on the Shorewomen's schedule last season, both Catholic and Lebanon Valley were defeated in close contests by the Shorewomen.

Looking toward the tournament this weekend, Coach Guinan is "expecting good competition. It is a chance to play out of region, and will show how we stand against them. It is an opportunity to prove our strength."

Maria Jerardi expressed excitement over the tournament, saying it will give the team a "chance to work on integration."

Phalen added that "it will be a great task to see how well we're doing at this point in the season."

Senior defender Jen Blenckstone said, "it is a privilege for us to play in this tournament. When asked how she felt about the team's efforts so far this season she answered, "We're making progress with every game we play."

Next week's issue will cover the results of this weekend's Sunfest Tournament in Salisbury.

The Shoreboard's Peek at the Pros

by Greg Coss (6-5 record)

Washington -4 over CINCINNATI. The Bengals are paper tigers this year. Give the points.

ATLANTA +2 over L.A. Raiders. The Raiders are panicking because of a shortage of cups, which will force their players into predictable sideline patterns to avoid big hits. Take the points.

MIAMI -8 1/2 over Green Bay. If this was the University of Miami, I think I'd still bet against the Packers. Give the points.

NEW ENGLAND +11 over Houston. I don't like the Oilers. They're mean and try to hurt people, and sometimes they call people bad names. Take the points.

Minnesota +3 over NEW ORLEANS. In a freak sky diving accident in Baton Rouge on Tuesday, Saints quarterback Bobby Hebert lost both of his hands. He is still a very gritty player but I think this has to push up the Viking hopes. Look for the Vikes to key on New Orleans' running attack. Take the points.

Detroit even over INDIANAPOLIS. Barry Sanders will run all over Indy, and Colts coach Ron Meyer will be run out of Indy. By the end of the game they will be the two happiest people in Indy. Take Detroit.

Cleveland +12 1/2 over N.Y. GIANTS. With Hostetler at the controls, I'm not so sure the Giants can even score two touchdowns in this one. The Browns have other incentive in that owner Art Modell will not force the team to watch any more Indians games if they upset the Giants. Take the points.

Buffalo -8 over TAMPA BAY. If I were one of these buccaneers, I'd walk the plank. Give the points.

L.A. Rams +8 1/2 over SAN FRANCISCO. Young Schmoung. Take the points.

KANSAS CITY - 7 1/2 over Seattle. Seahawks can't fly anywhere except the Kingdome. Give the points.

DENVER -8 1/2 over San Diego. I like the Broncos because John Elway reminds me a lot of Mr. Ed, my favorite horse. Funny Elway should play for the Broncos, isn't it? Give the points.

Dallas +1 over PHOENIX. I think Troy is a great quarterback. I just wonder how he can go to school here and play for the Cowboys at the same time. Take the point.

PHILADELPHIA -3 over Pittsburgh. Dan Quayle is a big Steeler fan. Give the points.

Holyfield-Tyson: Heaven Can Wait

by Greg Coss

Who wants to hear this at ringside:

Ladies and Gentlemen! Now entering the ring, the meanest guy in the business. He stands 5'9", weighing 220 pounds, has a record of 41-1 with 35 knockouts and a rape indictment, lets give a warm welcome to the Pride of the Boxing World, the Undisputed Heavyweight Champion of the World, Iron Mike Tyson!

None of us obviously, and we never will of course, but if the promoters, boxers, and boxing commissions allow the November 8th heavyweight championship fight between Mike Tyson and Evander Holyfield to happen on schedule, the boxing world could be faced with such a champion.

Unfortunately, the above mentioned people only care about money. The promoters, Don King for Tyson (whose hair is having an identity crisis) and Dan Duva for Holyfield stand to make millions. They don't have any feelings for their fighters, just their wallets. Evidence of this came in Japan in February of 1990, when King called Tyson's fight with James "Buster" Douglas a tune up for Holyfield. After Douglas upset Tyson, King tried to become his promoter. Now there's a guy who you could really look to as a father figure! He probably traded away a couple of his kids at their little league games for ones who could hit better.

The bottom line is that an Indianapolis grand jury has filed a rape charge against Tyson. He is being charged with three counts of sexual assault and one of rape, and the trial begins on January 27, 1992. The fight should not take place until after these charges are cleared. End of story. It would be a disgrace to the Boxing councils (World Boxing Council, World Boxing Association, International Boxing Federation) to do otherwise. If they didn't, they would just be feeding the appetites of the other money hungry sell-out suckers like TVKO, the cable station which is showing the fight. They need the money badly because they're showing fights which are about as interesting to watch as the Home Shopping Network, and as a result are in financial trouble. And how can Mike Tyson fight with this cloud hanging over his head? If I were him I would be totally embarrassed. He's humiliating the sport because of all the money he can earn. If he goes to jail, what's he going to do with the money, buy license plates? And shouldn't the showgirl who holds up the card telling what round it is be a little bit worried?

Everyone is to blame, including Holyfield. A reporter for the Sun mentioned how terrible it would be for Tyson to beat Holyfield and then go to jail, not giving Holyfield a chance to avenge the loss. Who cares about possibly losing? We're talking about a woman who was possibly raped. Holyfield will earn $30 million for this fight, which is why he's keeping his mouthpiece in and staying quiet. He could step forward just as easily as anyone else, so he gets no pity. The only one who gets pity is the alleged rape victim, who may have to hear in the news how Tyson did in his fight, and I can guess who she'd be rooting for. The decision is an obvious one: delay the fight. This decision won't be made because of greed, which is scary because boxing is in the national limelight, and would seem to be a reflection of the greedy nation we are becoming. In conclusion, if Mike Tyson or Evander Holyfield reads this article, I'm changing my name to Pedro.

Now let's talk about who's going to win the fight if it ever takes place. First of all, it shouldn't really matter since the fighters will be making about $45 million between them. That may not seem like alot, until you realize that you could buy around ten Casey Academic Resource Centers with that kind of money. And you might even have elevators that actually work, too. Both fighters have held the belt so they both know how to win the big one. Tyson's one loss to Douglas was a result of the lack of preparation on Tyson's part and a distinct reach advantage for Douglas. Neither the reach advantage or laziness will affect Tyson this time. The fighters' reaches are similar and Tyson wants this fight very badly. That's the reason why I have to take Iron Mike in this one, probably in the early rounds.

You think I'm crazy, right? How can I pick a guy that a lot of people think is washed up? Easy. The last time Tyson fought a fighter who moved up in weight class, and thus was not a natural heavyweight he knocked him on his arse in ninety seconds (Michael Spinks.) Holyfield is a light heavyweight with 60 pounds of helium added to him. Also, has Holyfield ever faced a real opponent? Don't say George Foreman, because anybody that eats ten cheeseburgers for breakfast as part of his training can't be taken too seriously. Holyfield has never fought anyone with the speed and power that Mike Tyson possesses. Tyson will be back on top of the boxing world if he doesn't end up killing himself or going to jail first.

Powerhouse Dickinson Stifles WC Soccer, 5-0

By Chris Vaughn

The Shoremen experienced yet another loss as the Big Red Machine of Dickinson ventured to Kibler and adroitly spanked WC this past Saturday. Dickinson, which just recently beat #15 Scranton, came out strong and fast as the WAC never saw the light of day. It took only two minutes into the game for the Shoremen's net to start rippling.

One was really all they needed, but Dickinson's rampage went on from there. "We were simply overmatched," said midfielder Benji "Gumby" Ward. By the time the first period came to a close Dickinson pulled away 4-0 and left Washington in a cloud of bewildering dust. A keeper change was implemented with Greg Miller filling in for Kyle Hutchinson, but, it was already too late. Only one more score was allowed by WC in the second period for a final of 5-0, but Dickinson continually peppered the goal and constantly kept the pressure on. "They outstaffed us not only in numbers but in skill as well. Their third line was comparable to our first," said freshman sensation Matt Cairns.

What few offensive drives the Shoremen were able to produce proved to be unsuccessful as Dickinson was ever-present on the defensive side as well.

If this trend continues it may prove a long hard season for the WC soccer squad of '91, but with new crowd vivacity and fervor it's obvious the student body is reluctant to give up on the WC soccer tradition of old.

As for the line up this week, the Shoremen travelled to the shore this past Wednesday to take on Salisbury State, which will be covered in the next issue. This Saturday they take on a sturdy Guilford team here at the Kibler Dome at 1:30.

Ailing Volleyball hangs tough in Gettysburg

by Jason Ronstadt

About all volleyball coach Penny Fall heard during the hour long ride up to Gettysburg was the low rumble of the team van's engine. But the reason for the relatively quiet conditions wasn't team animosity or even pre-game jitters. Five of the team's starting players were so sick that they all fell fast asleep for the whole ride up. Coach Fall looked over at the large bag of decongestants riding shotgun and realized that the future held a serious gut check for the team.

"Health is going to be a big factor in our success this year," said Coach Fall. "The best is yet to come from this team. All they need to do is get healthy and keep working as hard as they have been and we should start to see more of their spikes hitting the ground."

Some of that hard work is already showing results for players like team captain Laura McClellan, who at the final whistle against Washington and Lee could boast of seven kills, eight assists, two aces, and ten digs. Said Coach Fall, "We have a talented team, we just need to get our timing down." Timing, however, doesn't seem to be a problem for Freshman Beverly Diaz, who's play in practice has impressed Coach Fall enough to put her on the starting team. "Beverly has told me every now and then that she sometimes feels a bit overwhelmed. I try to encourage her and remind her how talented she really is."

Overwhelmed is the last thing Beverly's stats against Albright would suggest. Her four kills and seven assists helped considerably in the match.

So to spite conditions that would make many a team pull out of a tournament, the Shorewomen fought hard and came away 1-3 for the weekend. However their record still stands at 3-4 in the league as they prepare for they're next opponent, Bryn Mawr college. This game took place Wednesday and will be covered in the next issue as well as games against Dickinson and Marymount College.

USA Today Searching for Outstanding Students

USA Today, in cooperation with four higher education associations, has begun its annual search for the nation's best college students. Sixty of them will be named to 1992 All-USA Academic Team.

The students selected to the first, second and third teams will be featured in a special section of the USA Today newspaper, planned for mid-February. The 20 first-team members will be invited to receive their awards at a ceremony in Washington, D.C.

Any full-time undergraduate is eligible. Each nomination must be signed by a faculty member familiar with the student's work and an administrator.

Criteria for the team were developed in consultation with co-sponsors, the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities (NAICU), the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges (NASULGC), the American Association of Colleges for Teacher Education (AACTE) and the Council for Advancement and Support of Education (CASE). The criteria are designed to find students who excel not only in scholarship but in leadership roles on and off campus.

Winners will be selected by a panel of educators, chosen in cooperation with our cosponsors. Each of the first team members will receive a $2,500 cash award.

According to USA Today, the key element, to be given most weight by the judges, will be a student's outstanding original academic or intellectual product. The judges will be influenced by the student's ability to describe that outstanding endeavor in his/her own words. They will not read an author's work, see an artist's painting or hear a composer's music. They will rely solely on the student's ability to describe the effort in writing, supplemented by recommendations from the nominating professor and up to three other persons of the nominee's choice.

Applications are available in the Career Center in Spanish House. Call Pat Ordovensky at 703/276-3467 or Carol Skalski at 703/276-5890 if you have any questions.

institutional concern for concentrated study. We took with us the issue of diversity." Trout stated that Washington College is historically a white college with, until recently, a ~2% minority population. A number of open meetings will be held throughout the year to discuss the issue of diversity addressed in their report. "Any of you who are interested in this question, I hope you will read the report and participate in advising us in how to proceed."

Trout went on to mention that on the entire Eastern Shore, 127 African Americans actually sat for the SAT. "I think Washington College can do something about that. That Washington College can become involved in early identification and early intervention beginning even in the first grade. I think we can begin with the sons and daughters of our own employees, who deserve a better shake in life then I think they face today, because the statistics are gloomy. At Washington College, we have a program whereby the high school students who are certified by the High School as college potential, gifted, and have a decent academic average can take a course here at a minimal registration fee. This year the Kent County High School recommended forty-three students who were eligible for this type of consideration - not one of them was black. So we think we have an opportunity here to make a difference and to ultimately help ourselves. This doesn't necessarily mean that the students will graduate from high school and come to Washington College; they may go somewhere else - fine. But I think we have a role to play,a responsibility."

Miller Automates Catalog

by Karyn Iacangelo

The Miller Library's automation process is nearing its completion. The process began back in 1986 and was made possible by grants from the Culpepper, Frueaff, Bingham, and Surdna Foundations.

In preparing the library for this new automation system, many steps were involved. The first step was choosing a system; to do this, consultants from several companies came and gave demonstrations to library staff and student employees. Over the summer a contract was signed with Innovative Interface Inc. and they will provide the system for the library.

The next step was to begin computerizing the Card Catalog and send it to Ohio to their large Database. Ms. Judith Hymes, Assistant Librarian in charge of Technical Services was put in charge of this project. Over the summer, Ms. Hymes used students to help her with this project.

This process of retrospective conversion should be nearly completed by December. At that time, two database tapes should be ready. The database should be installed and ready for student use.

The major force behind the automation project is William Tubbs, Director of the Miller Library. The new system will provide students with the convenience of accessing the database from their rooms. It will also enhance research capacity. Another benefit to this new system is that books and periodicals will be easier for students to locate and everything is on the database, so the staff will be able to better help the students.

There is still much to be done before this project is complete, but it is well underway. By next fall, the library should be fully automated.

Congressman Gilchrest Speaks at WC

Shares Stories of Power Politics with Students

by Sherry Menton

Congressman Wayne Gilchrest, Maryland's first district's member of the House of Representatives, spoke in Hodson Hall about "Power in Washington: A View from the House" on Monday, September 23.

Congressman Gilchrest was elected to the House in 1990 after losing the election to incumbent Roy Dyson in 1988 by 1500 votes. Gilchrest still lives in Chestertown full time, and commutes to Washington every day. He serves on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and Science, Space, and Technology House Committees. Gilchrest is a self-described "citizen lawmaker"; before his election he had taught civics, American history, and government at Kent County High School.

Of his first year in the House, Gilchrest recalled, "The Persian Gulf war was like a bolt of lightning out of the blue. The debate [of whether or not to support the President] was the finest hour for the House in recent history, because there was absolutely no coercing. We knew that as soon as we voted 'yes', people were going to die."

As Gilchrest went on to explain in his speech, that hands-off attitude and solidarity are not the norm in the House, though he said that "that tone, to a degree, has lasted all these months." Under normal circumstances, the Representatives are encouraged, either mildly or strongly, to tow the party line. "The Democratic Party has a well-organized chain of command," he said. The party whip stands at the door as the Representatives are entering before a vote, and a "thumbs up" or "thumbs down" tells Democratic members how they should vote.

The Republican Party, which holds a minority in the House, operates differently, according to Gilchrest. The minority leader sometimes expresses to Republican Congressmen a preference in voting, and explains his reasons to them, "but you have to vote your conscience," he concludes. Congressman Gilchrest hypothesized that this less demanding approach is present because the Republicans are the minority party. "The Democrats can dole out committee chairs - and of course, chairmanships are highly prized - as rewards for voting the party line." The Republicans have no such incentives to offer. Gilchrest expressed his own desire to see "more independent thinking when it comes to voting."

As an example of power politics at work, Gilchrest related the story of a "dire emergency appropriations bill" that the President wanted rushed through Congress near the end of the war. The original bill that the White House requested was for 85 million dollars. That figure increased to 250 million in the House because of the addition of 25 germane amendments, and to 4 billion dollars in the Senate with the addition of another 75 non-germane amendments. The bill then went to the conference committee, where the total was hiked up to 4.2 billion dollars for an 85 million dollar request. And because that 85 million was needed immediately, the bill pork-barreled through the approval process.

On a more personal level, Gilchrest said that he "feels a part of the system, but apart from it." And indeed, during the course of his discussion the Congressman displayed a degree of detachment from the processes he described. He referred repeatedly to what he called "recreational issues" - topics like the laws governing campaign contributions, and limiting congressional terms - that would be fun to watch being debated in the House.

Despite his arm's length view of the legislative process, Gilchrest admitted that "the strangest thing is that it doesn't seem strange." The day before his lecture at WC, Congressman Gilchrest was one of 250 guests at a dinner hosted by Vice President Dan Quayle. As part of his duties in the Space, Science, and Technology Committee, Gilchrest has had coffee and doughnuts in the Oval Office with President Bush and a dozen Senators, while discussing the proposed space station.

Said Gilchrest of his Congressional duties, "You need to be committed to humanity, public service, solving problems you think need to be solved, helping the homeless, the sick, the unemployed. You have to constantly question your own values... if you can't be true to yourself, you'll be subjected and acquiesce to... the temptations out there."

Fire In East Hall; None Hurt

by Karyn Iacangelo

A fire broke out on the first floor of East Hall in room 101 early Monday morning about 2:00. Brian Gimelson, the RA for East, heard a crash outside the dormitory and went to investigate, whereupon he saw the fire coming out of one of the rooms. Before the fire department arrived, Brian was able to put out the fire. "I was amazed at how quickly the fire department responded at so late an hour."

The fire was caused by a candle that burnt through a plastic shelf. The fire department was called and three fire trucks, as well as the Air and Foam Unit, two state police cars, and one local police car that responded to the call. It took about an hour and a half to get the building secured so students could go back.

Two East Hall residents helped in the effort to evacuate the building; R.J. Eldridge, and Andrew Parks.

OPINION/EDITORIAL

Task Force Has Already Benefitted WC

It seems the Campus Voices issue for this week has been overwhelmed (as are we) by the number of responses to last week's editorials about the task force to investigate... etc., etc. It's a double-edged sword, isn't it? "Task force to investigate the status of lesbians and gay men" takes far too much time and space to say every time (60 characters exactly, which would amount to about $5 or $6 in a classified ad), but the verbal shorthand of "gay and lesbian task force" invites misinterpretation, so people discussing the task force must be careful in their wording. There is great potential to misunderstand someone else's position on this issue because of a verbal misstep. That is why we at the Elm were gratified to see so many students taking the time to express their views clearly by writing to us. In an era of instant communication via satellite hookup, fax, electronic mail, and even the telephone, it is increasingly important that we learn how to clearly express our intentions without taking the time to sit down and puzzle out exactly how to phrase our ideas diplomatically.

At a less lofty level, it's been very gratifying to discover that students at Washington College have a pulse after all. We have been accused, and have accused each other, of collectively being apathetic about issues of local and national importance. WC students have proved those doomsayers wrong – and not just the students who wrote letters, either; everyone who argued with their tablemates at lunch about sexual freedoms, first amendment rights, or allocation of school funds has contributed to the WC community by just being aware of the issues.

In his recent address to WC students, Congressman Wayne Gilchrest expressed his opinion that the proposal to redistrict most of the counties in Maryland "is the best thing that's hit Maryland in a long time, because people are paying attention to it." People who wouldn't care if Maryland was redistricted quietly and in a matter of days are sitting up and taking notice, because of the furor surrounding the change in borders.

And so it has been with the task force. Aside from the benefits that the completed investigation will provide to our college, the controversy created by the task force's existence has already served to better Washington College by shaking, or perhaps shocking, WCers out of their apathetic stupor.

TaskForce Protects First Amendment Rights

As a senior political science major who is currently writing his thesis on the issue of gay rights, and as a strong advocate of such, I felt it necessary to respond to James Jenkins' letter concerning the task force to investigate the status of gays on campus which appeared in last week's Elm.

My first concern is that students may not realize that the purpose of the task force is not to put homosexuals above heterosexuals, as Mr. Jenkins incorrectly stated, but is rather to insure an equal existence between the two. Second, contrary to Mr. Jenkins' interpretation of the Bill of Rights (maybe he should pay better attention in Dr. Weissman's class), the freedom of speech clause does not openly protect a person's right to express his or her thoughts on an issue. It does, however, protect a person's right to express his opinion in a way that is deemed socially acceptable. Mr. Jenkins will not lose his right to express his disapproval of homosexuals in a proper manner, just as homosexuals will be able to express disapproval of "closed-minded" individuals like Mr. Jenkins in a proper manner. Third, I don't remember seeing an article from Mr. Jenkins requesting letters sent to parents and alumni telling of the creation and funding for Hillel (the Jewish union) or the Dale Adams Heritage Group (designed for the benefit of the ethnic minorities). The total Jewish and ethnic minority population on campus is less than 5%; based on national statistics, the homosexual population on campus would be double that amount. If this type of philosophy had been present in the past, we may have found ourselves as slaveholders, and this college would still be all male. Finally, the point should be made that the task force is not designed to force students to accept homosexuals, but to create a better understanding of homosexuals among the student population, which seems to be exactly what Mr. Jenkins lacks.

Sincerely,
Troy Petenbrink

Gays/ Lesbians Deserve Basic Human Rights

It's a tragic thing when a college educated man must resort to red herrings and half-baked arguments to mask the face of ignorant intolerance. But just in case anyone was convinced by Mr. Jenkins's editorial, "Task Force is Misuse of Money," some of us would like to debunk a few of his fallacious assertions.

Mr. Jenkins was rightly concerned that the Task Force neglected to define "verbal abuse." What he failed to realize is that the Task Force failed to do so because the Task Force doesn't yet exist. We are sure that when the Task Force is assembled that one of the first things they will do is precisely define their objectives.

Mr. Jenkins also thinks that everyone who pays tuition or donates money ought to receive a personal letter stating that college money might go to a gay/lesbian organization. If Mr. Jenkins had done a little research, he would have discovered that the SGA budget is public information, open to anyone who wishes to see it. Perhaps Mr. Jenkins would realize how unfeasible his proposal is if he volunteered to lick the thousands of stamps needed to tell everyone, not just about the gay/lesbian/bisexual alliance, but about all the other SGA funded organizations that someone might consider controversial.

Mr. Jenkins also feels that student and community opinion should be considered before forming a Task Force. Once again, Mr. Jenkins failed to report the facts. The Task Force is open to students and community members. Anyone, including Mr. Jenkins, can sign up. Two students and a local reverend have already volunteered for positions.

Mr. Jenkins also thinks that it is the aim of Task Force to identify heterosexuals, declare them "abnormal or second-class citizens" and "force its 'therapy' on people." We agree that this would be a horrible violation of human rights. Fortunately, it is not the aim of the Task Force to brainwash Republicans. It is the aim of the Task Force to teach students to respect the Constitutional rights guaranteed to all people.

Unfortunately, Mr. Jenkins seems to think that if the majority of students don't want a Task Force then there shouldn't be one. He apparently thinks that the will of the majority should dictate to the minority. He also seems to think that if the majority wants to deny the minority the Constitutional rights of life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness, assembly and free speech, they should be allowed to do so. Fortunately, the Bill of Rights doesn't distinguish between minority and majority rights. Neither does it distinguish between homosexual and heterosexual rights. It is the purpose of the Bill of Rights to guarantee all men and women basic human rights. It is the goal of the Task Force to make sure that heterosexual and homosexual students are able to express their views and pursue their own happiness without fear of harassment. It is not the duty of this college to force anyone to believe anything. It is the duty of this college to uphold the inalienable rights of all its students. If Mr. Jenkins is so adamant about denying these rights to homosexuals, simply because he considers them second-class citizens, then perhaps he should take his own advice and refuse to pay tuition to a college that seeks to uphold the rights of all Americans equally.

No Discrimination at WC

Dear Editor,

After reading the September 20th issue of the Elm, I felt the need to make my opinion on the homosexuality task force heard. It seems to upset the task force's supporters that most of the students at WC don't really care about homosexuals. Sara Hunt tells us that this "apathy is as reprehensible as discrimination." Well, where I come from this sort of "apathy" is called minding your own business. Personally, I find homosexuality to be repulsive, but like most- if not all- Washington College students, I don't go around looking for gays to pick on, I don't care what they do behind closed doors and I certainly don't do anything to infringe upon their rights.

Maybe I hang out with the wrong (or in this case, the right) people, but in two full years at this school, I have seen no evidence that there is a gay bashing crisis at Washington College. So what's the problem? Are gays being charged more for tuition? Are they being kicked off athletic teams because they're gay? Does Mean Jean turn them away when they want to get into the dining hall? Or are they just starved for attention in a community where people don't care one way or another about their sexual preference? While I found a couple of Jim Jenkins' comments in the last Elm to be a little too reactionary for my taste, he was one hundred percent right on one point: this task force is a waste of the administration's time, and our money.

Sincerely,
Dan Kretzer

Jenkins is a Joke

To the Editor:

I was highly gratified to read the premiere installment of the Elm's new humor column. With so much desperate seriousness in college life, a good laugh is necessary every once in a while. I refer, of course, to Mr. James L. Jenkins, Jr.'s 'editorial' about the task force to investigate the status of lesbians and gay men at Washington College. This article, appearing in the September 20 issue of the Elm, contained so much specious claptrap that I can only assume its intent was to be humorous.

Mr. Jenkins' article contains only one point that seems to me to be of any relevance, which is his complaint that the task force's objectives as specified in the outline does not specifically spell out what is to be considered verbal abuse. An organization such as the proposed task force, which will be dealing with some very touchy people on some very touchy issues, needs to be equally touchy in setting down its aims and objectives. Not to do so will give homophobic detractors of the task force an opportunity to split hairs over wording rather than actually deal with the issues the task force was created to deal with.

British Hostage Released

IRAQ

The prospect of renewed warfare in the Persian Gulf is being raised as the White House makes plans to issue a 48-hour ultimatum to Saddam Hussein, ordering him to guarantee United Nations access to his nuclear and chemical weapons facilities, or else face the use of U.S. forced inspections and "armed escorts," in an effort to make Iraq destroy all its weapons of mass destruction. At least a limited military deployment could come as early as this week.

According to a Newsday investigation, in some instances more U.S. casualties were caused by battlefield residue than Iraqi troops during Operation Storm's four day ground war. At least 14 Americans were killed and more than 100 were wounded by the residue. The residue was made up of unexploded Army bomblets left on the ground after Iraqi troops had fled. Many soldiers enjoyed playing catch with the explosives. Maj. Jim O'Donnell was quoted as saying "There is something about them (the bomblets) that just begs you to pick them up." He then told about one game of catch in which three soldiers were wounded.

BEIRUT

Seventy-seven year old British hostage Jack Mann was released by the Revolutionary Justice Organization on Wednesday. Mann, the oldest of the Western hostages, had spent 865 days in captivity; a time he called "two and a half years of chains." One American will also hopefully be released this week, according to an Iranian official. According to the official, all nine Western hostages, regardless of nationality, will be released by January.

WASHINGTON, DC

Although members of the Congressional black caucus testified this week that Clarence Thomas's confirmation to the Supreme Court would eliminate the right to abortion and set back the cause of civil rights; according to an Associated Press poll, fewer than one in six Americans are opposed to having Thomas join the Supreme Court, and more than half say he should be confirmed. The Judiciary Committee is expected to take its confirmation vote this week, with Senate floor action following next week.

Senator Jesse Helms is at it again: By a 68-28 vote, the Senate accepted a Helms-authored position that will prohibit the arts endowment from using tax dollars "to promote, disseminate or produce materials that depict or describe, in a patently offensive way, sexual or excretory activities or organs." A similar provision was dropped last year. However, the Senate did defeat on a 67-27 vote a measure to trim the endowment's funds by 13 percent next year.

U.S.A.

The average composite score among 797,000 students who took the ACT last Spring was 20.6 on a scale of 1-36. SAT verbal scores fell to an all-time low, and math scores declined for the first time since 1980.

A recent UFla study showed a 10% decline in student drinking over the past decade. The study also revealed that those who do drink drink less often.

Beginning in 1992, colleges will be required to make campus crime statistics public. This will give prospective students and their parents a chance to make informed decisions about the safety risks they might be taking when applying to prospective schools. Hopefully it will also force colleges to be more protective of the students already in their care.

CAMPUS VOICES - Do you think it would be a worthwhile effort for the school to install a campus phone hookup in every dorm room on campus?

Christabel Garcia-Zamor
Rockville, MD
Sophomore

Definitely worthwhile, because when you have a hall phone you never receive messages because people are too lazy to walk to your room, or to get the message right. We're completely overcharged by the phone company when we have phones installed individually.

Deb Kulich
Senior
Kinderhook, NY

Yes, I've paid for a phone in my room for four years and it gets expensive to go through C&P. It would be more convenient to go through the school.

Alex Nader
New York, NY
Sophomore

Yeah, I like that idea. Actually, it might keep people from doing homework, because they'll be on the phone all the time.

Kelly Burns
Annapolis, MD
Sophomore

Of course.

Richard McKee
Owings Mills, MD
Freshman

Yes, it would. It's a big problem because people who have their own phones never answer the pay phones, so you could miss getting an important message.

But as for the rest of Mr. Jenkins' article... Mr. Jenkins does not appear to have understood the facts behind the formation of the task force very well, referring to the task force in one paragraph as being "a homosexual organization" and in another, to its purpose being "to elevate the rights of homosexuals above the rights of heterosexuals." To address these points one at a time: Mr. Jenkins, because and organization concerns itself with the rights of a certain group of people, that does not necessarily mean that the members of that organization all belong to that group (were blacks the only people against slavery?). Secondly, nowhere in the resolution on the task force do I see anything about "elevating the rights of homosexuals above the rights of heterosexuals"; rather, the goal of the task force seems to be to ensure that homosexual people be granted the same rights as heterosexual people. Mr. Jenkins also bring up "ol' George Washington, a staunch Right-wing Christian" and wonders what the president would have thought of the task force's objectives, too, Mr. Jenkins. As someone who fought for this country's freedom to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, I'm sure Washington would have been horrified to learn that someone was seeking to perpetuate those same ideas at a college named for him.

Does Washington College need to protect the rights of homosexual people on campus? Of course it does, as long as determinedly closed-minded people like Mr. Jenkins or Mr. Paul F. Obrecht [from the Campus Voices of the same Sept. 20 issue] insist on forcing their beliefs on others just because those others happen to be different. And in closing, I would like to offer this opinion: that the words homosexual and heterosexual work much better as adjectives than as nouns. To say that a person is a homosexual or a heterosexual reduces those persons to labels, rather than the living people, with love, pains, and laughter, that they are.

Respectfully,
Clay Eichelberger

Jenkins Should Let God Do the Judging

This letter is regarding Jim Jenkins' guest editorial on the Campus Voices page of last week's Elm. In his editorial, Mr. Jenkins attacked the creation of the Task Force on Gay and Lesbian issues on the grounds that it was a misuse of money, immoral, and infringed upon the rights of heterosexual students on campus. I would like to offer a rebuttal to his arguments.

I have had no connection with this task force or GALA, nor have I read the minutes of the Faculty meeting that passed the task force proposal; however, several of the statements Mr. Jenkins make seem to me to be kneejerk reactions against the idea of bringing homosexuality out into the open. The attitudes expressed in this letter seem to imply that homosexuality on this campus was not an issue until today, that the status quo was fine, and that in fact the statistical average of a 10% homosexual population did not hold true at Washington College.

To tackle Mr. Jenkins' arguments one by one: he first expresses a fear that free speech against homosexuality will be curtailed. As I understand the task force objective, only courtesy is asked of the WC community. The specter of 'political correctness' has not yet made its appearance on this campus, and I hope it never does. Bluntly put, if he's worried that somebody is going to get in trouble for calling a fellow student a cocksucker, well then, that just indicates that there is a problem- and not even one of gay rights, but just one of manners.

As for the task force seeking college funding: well, there are many organizations on campus that you may not agree with; and your money (as a student) goes directly into their pockets. Last year, your student activities fee went into paying for human-rights activism and interfering with other nations' judicial and political process, alcohol abuse, celebration of pagan holidays involving nudity, and silly public feuds between campus-wide publications. In the name of the free speech, right to assemble, and other Bill of Rights clauses, these various things were allowed to happen, and Mr. Jenkins helped pay for them.

The idea of singling out one organization, one issue, one prejudice out of all these for disclosure strikes me as irrational. If Mr. Jenkins really cares, then he may ask the SGA to publish its club funding allocations in the Elm, he may ask the College to publish its budget; but since both of these things happen every year, I don't think he'll have to.

As for making the College open to gays and lesbians, and whether the community will accept it: I hate to break it to him, but Washington College, along with every single institution of higher education, along

Katherine Trout Demonstrates Weaving for WC Women's League

by Sherry Menton

Mrs. Katherine Trout was the guest lecturer this Monday for the meeting of the Washington College Women's League, which is celebrating its 40th anniversary this year. Mrs. Trout displayed many handwoven items, and answered the most commonly asked questions about the weaver's art.

To illustrate the difference between the works of other weavers and her own creations, she shared with the group handcrafts that came from Guatemala, Africa, and India. She then displayed some of her own works, explaining that her interest is in color variations and weaving patterns. "Other weavers are interested in the structure and the mathematics of weaving, but that, for me, is one of the least interesting things."

To aid in her discussion Mrs. Trout brought with her a portable wooden loom and a spinning wheel. She explained how to dress the loom and how each of the pieces work. "A loom is like a computer," Mrs. Trout said. "You can't play games until you know how to make it work."

by Tanya Allen

"It's the end of the WAC as we know it!" Crazy Charlie was crying as Josephine and Brenda flew away from K.A. "First the Elm was destroyed, then the Culture Van blew up, then East Hall caught on fire, half the campus caught the flu, and a Somerset washing machine exploded! Repent and be saved! Repent and be saaaaaaaaaaaved!" Josephine and the butterfly flew past him silently. "Let's rest for a while...." Brenda said. They stopped and perched on the "Bench Overlooking Minta Martin". Someone had left a ripped white snack bar bag on the bench. There were a few french fry crumbs still in it. Josephine nibbled on the crumbs while Brenda's wings fluttered nervously. Josephine munched and munched. Brenda's wings fluttered and fluttered. "Brenda," Josephine finally asked, her mouth full, "What's wrong?"

"Nothing...nothing...." Brenda said.

"No, Brenda," Josephine swallowed and said firmly, "Something is wrong—you're acting really weird."

"No I'm not!"

"Mmhm." Josephine bit into another french fry crumb, then tried again. "Come on, Brenda," she said gently, "Does it have something to do with one of those moths we saw inside K.A.?"

"No, no...." Brenda flitted back and forth across the bench, then suddenly stopped and became completely still, staring straight ahead. "Yes."

Josephine nodded and chewed thoughtfully. "Which one?"

"Ok..." Josephine nodded again. "All right...what did he do?"

"Nothing!" Brenda said, then started flitting around once more. "Nothing...nothing!"

Josephine groaned, then grabbed Brenda by the wings and made her stop flitting, while keeping a comforting limb around her back. "Brenda, don't be afraid...tell me. Did he do something bad to you?" Brenda shook violently. "Did he hurt you?"

"WHAT DOES IT MATTER?" Brenda suddenly screamed. "WHAT DOES IT MATTER IF HE HURT ME OR NOT?"

"Brenda?"

"What does it matter?" Brenda said in a quieter voice. "It seems that males are always hurting females...it's just a fact of life...."

"Brenda?"

"Well," Brenda went on in a toneless voice, "Not all males, I realize, not even most males, but enough of them...."

"I don't understand...."

"I mean, even in the human world—the human world, with all its ethics and religions and moral codes...do you know what the statistics are in the human world? In the human world, 1 in 4 women will be raped in her lifetime."

"1 in 4...?" Josephine repeated incredulously.

"Less than 10% of them will report the assault," Brenda went on, "And less than 5% of the rapists will go to jail."

"Oh God," said Josephine, "Is the situation that bad?"

Brenda snorted. "Yes, the situation is that bad. It's bad in the cities, in rural areas, on college campuses especially...It's a world-wide problem, and it's always been bad, since the beginning of life. You'd think things would have changed by now...Recently there was an especially horrifying incident in Kenya..."

"Kenya? Yes?"

"I remember the facts and dates because hearing about it shocked me so much..." she shook her head and went on. "On July 13, in a boarding school in St. Kizito, 271 teenage girls were attacked by their male classmates."

"271?"

"They were chased into a dormitory," Brenda said quietly, "Where they were crushed into a corner..." she swallowed, then

Goldstein Program in Public Affairs

Call for Students in Public Service

by Racheal Fink

On September 23, Washington College had the privilege of hearing Congressman Wayne Gilchrest speak about "Power in Washington: A View from the Hill" which was sponsored by the Goldstein Program in Public Affairs.

The Goldstein Program in Public Affairs was created by President Cater in 1988 and named after Louis L. Goldstein, WC's Chairman of the Board of Visitors and Governors and a 1935 alumnus. Cater established the endowment which supports the Goldstein Program and the Goldstein Chair. A resolution from the Board in April of 1990 created the program in its present form.

The purpose of the Goldstein program is to "encourage students to enter public service by introducing them to leaders from all areas of public activity. The Goldstein Endowed Fund sponsors lecture series, symposia, visiting fellows, travel and other projects that bring students and faculty together with leaders experienced in developing public policy."

Dr. Daniel Premo, Chair of the Political Science Department, is curator of the Goldstein program. As such, Dr. Premo is "responsible for exploring ways by which this endowed Program can be integrated into the College's curricular and extra curricular education."

In addition to the lectures, symposia, and travel activities that further the program, support has been allocated for the purpose of acquiring books for Miller Library that, "assist in the preparation of public leaders for roles in government, business and civic affairs."

Last year, the first official year of operation, the program supported numerous events, including a lecture by Anna Husarska on "Post-Communist Politics in Poland," a symposium including Michael Albert, Carol C. Gould, Fred Whitehead and Kevin Brien on "The Future of Radical Politics in America," and a field trip to Washington, D.C. to visit the Museum of African Art, the Museum of Modern Latin American Art, the National Textile Museum, and Dumbarton Oaks.

In support of the Centennial of Co-education at Washington College, the Goldstein Program is sponsoring two symposia; the first, entitled. "The Status of Women in Politics: The State and Local Level," to be held on October 23 in the Hynson Lounge at 7:30 pm, and the second, "The Status of Women in National Political Life," scheduled for November 18 in the Casey Forum at 7:30 p.m. Some of the participants will include Eloise Foster, Assistant Secretary, Department of Budget and Fiscal Planning, Congresswoman Beverly Byron, and Gloria Borger, U.S. News and World Report. Barbara Kreamer will be moderating both symposia and a dinner will proceed each discussion. Everyone is encouraged to attend these events and the many others that will follow.

Historical Society Plans Many Activities

Trips to historic towns, museums, battlefields and archaeological sites, lectures on topics of historical interest and tour guide opportunities highlight proposed plans of the Washington College Historical Society for the fall semester. Members present at the Society's organizational meeting last week suggested Frederick, Winterthur Museum, Antietam Battlefield, Historic St. Mary's City and various small towns on the Eastern Shore as possible destinations for the coming year. Organized just last year, the Historical Society toured Annapolis and also sponsored a lecture by preservation attorney Tersh Boasberg, who led the fight to stop a shopping mall from being built on the edge of Manassas battlefield.

Promoting and preserving the history and culture of Chestertown, the Eastern Shore, Maryland and surrounding areas is the Society's stated purpose. What that involves is introducing members to the fascinating and colorful heritage of the region by actually visiting historic sites. The Society offers students an opportunity to experience history rather than read about it; often a more fun and unique way to learn than in the classroom.

The Historical Society's faculty advisor is Dr. Richard Striner. Anyone interested in history is encouraged to join the Society by attending the next announced meeting or by contacting President Cynthia Slaby at 778-9168 or Vice President Jenifer Grindle at 778-9324.

went on, "19 girls died of suffocation. Another 71 were raped."

"That's horrible!"

"Two boys were charged with rape, and 29 boys, ages 14 to 18, were charged with manslaughter."

"Oh my God..."

"And you know what the school's deputy principal said?" Brenda turned to Josephine, her voice trembling. "The deputy principal, whose name was Joyce Kithica, was quoted as saying 'The boys never meant any harm against the girls. They just wanted to rape.'" *

"They never meant any harm...they just wanted to rape...." Josephine repeated, dazed.

"So you see," Brenda went on, "Things are tough all over—in all the phylums, on the campuses, in the cities, in our country, in all countries...there are always men who rape women. It's a fact of life."

"Brenda, you can't say that! There must be things that can be done to prevent..." Brenda shrugged. Josephine looked at her for a moment. "Brenda, that moth...he didn't...?"

"I told you it doesn't matter!" said Brenda. "These things happen!"

"Brenda, talk to me!" Josephine said, "Tell me what happened!" Brenda shook her head. "Brenda, tell me!"

"I CAN'T!" Brenda screamed. "It doesn't matter! I don't matter! Leave me alone!"

"Brenda, if you don't want to tell me, then tell someone, please! Tell a friend, or a counselor, or someone...please! If something horrible like that has happened to you, you have to talk to someone about it, if you don't it all sits inside you, and...and...feeds on you, it's like the pain becomes a parasite...if you don't tell anybody about it, if you don't get that pain out, it will hurt you, and keep on hurting you, for the rest of your life!"

"Leave me alone!" Brenda said. "Just...just...leave me alone."

"Brenda, please...let me help you..."

"Leave me alone!" Brenda rose into the air. "I told you, I can't, so just...leave me alone!"

"Brenda!" Josephine cried, but the butterfly had flown away, leaving Josephine kneeling next to the forgotten white ripped bag of french fry crumbs on the bench overlooking Minta Martin.

Females especially: at night, do not walk across campus or in town alone.

Do not prop doors.

This campus is not as safe as it seems.

Richard Thompson Blends Psychosis, Humor and Musical Ability

Rumor and Sigh
Richard Thompson
Produced by Mitchell Froom
Capitol Records

by Raphael Koster

If you're like most readers of Rolling Stone, you were astonished when their list of the best albums of the decade of the 80's placed the unfamiliar names of Richard and Linda Thompson at position number two, with their 1982 album Shoot Out the Lights. A short visit to the record store, however, would reveal that Thompson has been around (with and without his collaborator and ex-wife) since 1967, when he was part of the seminal folk-rock group Fairport Convention. Since then he has been one of the most respected guitarist/songwriters out there, but known only to a few because his recordings were on indie labels such as Hannibal Records. Well, Polygram bought Hannibal, and Capitol got Thompson himself, and so Rumor and Sigh was preceded by a media blitz in all major trade magazines. It was also heralded by critics as a major event.

Thompson is a guitarist fond of mixing alternate tunings, modal scales, folk flatpicking, Strat blasting, and ferocious lead work. In one solo he hits every note on the guitar fingerboard in fifteen seconds. He plays holding a pick between two fingers while picking with the other three. His songwriting is sharp, incisive, darkly humorous, and sarcastic. Perhaps his only flaw is his voice: deep, rough and limited in range, it sometimes seems to strain to measure up to the rest of the music.

The album starts with a bang with the songs "Read About Love" and "Fell So Good"— the latter is already getting airplay. Both feature deranged narrators (one a sexual pervert and the other a violent convict) describing their worldviews. The ominous "Grey Walls" features heavy drums that burst into full-fledged menace; the subject of the song is a husband dropping off his wife at an insane asylum. The tempo gets picked up gain in "You Dream Too Much," a fairly conventional shattered love song that nonetheless ends in a burst of discordant noise.

One of the standouts on the album is "1952 Vincent Black Lightning," a song structured like a medieval ballad that deals with thoroughly modern subject matter: a pair of juvenile delinquents, the tragedy that ends their love, and their mutual love for motorcycles. The complex and beautiful acoustic accompaniment serves to display Thompson's nimble fingers, and reinforces the odd beauty of lyrics like "He reached for her hand and gave her the keys/ He said I don't have any further use for these/ I see angels on Ariels in leather and chrome/ Swooping down from heaven to carry me home..."

Other strong songs include the eerie and compelling "Mystery Wind" that sets an atmosphere with Knopfler-like guitar and sustained synths, a simple beat and a droning vocal; the oriental-tinged "Backlash Love Affair," rife with sarcasm and wickedly funny; the vicious diatribe "Mother Knows Best," an attack on Margaret Thatcher; and the off-the wall "Don't sit on my Jimmy Shands"— a plaintive polka about a drunk sitting on a bunch of out-of-print 78s. What begins as a polka goes through some distortion as the man destroys the records, then ends improbably as a Celtic reel.

Not all is perfect, however. There are several lackluster songs on the album, easy to spot because they are the ones that show little evidence of Thompson's sly humor, his able guitar, or his vitriol. His voice is just not strong enough to carry ordinary lost-love or happy-love songs.

The last song on the album is the disturbing "Psycho Street," which alternates between often funny and certainly sick tales of madness that sometimes seem queerly sane, recited over a menacingly droning guitar. It's stop-and-go tune, for the chorus is like nothing so much as Mr. Rogers-as-serial killer singing songs of neighborly love. This chorus is gradually overwhelmed by sirens and thumping bass.

All in all, Rumor and Sigh is definitely not for everyone. If you are easily offended, pass it by. If you will gross out at the idea of a cat being barbecued because it won't talk, pass it by. But if you are willing to listen to Richard Thompson on his own terms as he paints a rather depressing picture of the human psyche, and laugh with him, then do so. It may be tinged with hysteria, but it can be a great listen.

Hockey Drops Two In Salisbury, Then Recovers Impressively

Aggressive team play by sophomore attacker Elizabeth Olivere (passing ball) can help WC thrive this season.

By Greg Coss

Every sports team faces a character test at some point during the course of a season. Some teams swim, and others sink. The Washington College field hockey team did the backstroke last weekend at the Sunfest Tournament at Salisbury State, passing their test with flying colors.

The Shorewomen received a very rude greeting in their first game of the tournament on Saturday. Lacking the team chemistry they had shown in their three previous contests, WC could not get anything going offensively as they were blanked by Oneonta State (N.Y.), 2-0.

On the bright side, junior goalie Brigid DeVries stopped a season high nine shots. This would be two shots too few, however, as the Shorewomen would have to accept the loss and regroup for an afternoon game against powerhouse Salisbury State.

WC would never see the light of day in this one, as they were thrashed, 5-0. DeVries kept it as close as it was, setting a new season high with sixteen saves. Washington never had a chance in this one though, as they ran into a buzzsaw in the form of a very strong Salisbury team, as well as being off their own game, as Coach Diane Guinan would admit later.

"Everybody worked hard individually on Saturday," she said. "But individuals don't win games, teams do."

Battered and emotionally letdown, the Shorewomen easily could have folded in their final match against Catholic on Sunday. After all, Catholic was a team that had upset the very same Salisbury team that gave Washington fits. But WC would pull all of their talent together in this one, surprising the Cardinals, 2-1. This game was probably the biggest challenge for the WC squad, a huge test of their poise. It was a time when the Shorewomen needed someone to step forward and make the big plays. Fittingly, it was senior captain Jen Blenckstone who did just that, scoring one of the goals and assisting on the other.

With thirteen minutes left in the first half, Blenckstone took a hard shot from about forty feet out that was redirected into the net by sophomore Caroline Jensen. This would be the only score of the first half as WC held on to the narrowest of margins.

Catholic evened the score with twenty-one minutes remaining on a breakaway goal which could have taken the wind out of the Shorewomen's sail. But Blenckstone would retaliate for WC just three minutes later unassisted, and turned the tide back in WC's favor. The Shorewomen were then able to hold off Catholic the rest of the way and preserved a 2-1 victory. Coach Guinan could not help but be happy with the team's performance afterward.

"When a team has confidence, they can come back from disappointment," she said. "We really pulled it together on Sunday. We had the fatigue factor and the pressure of facing a big rival working against us. This was a big win. Now we have to prove we are worthy of it."

A big win indeed. This win gave Washington a number four NCAA regional ranking (there are five regions in the NCAA's) and got them back on track. But just when it seemed like smooth sailing, revenge-minded Catholic returned to WC on Wednesday, a game which will be covered in next week's issue as well as a Saturday game at Elizabethtown and Tuesday's hosting of Albright at 4:00 p.m. Come support this very talented team, and watch it make a return trip to the MAC playoffs.

REC Sports Filled With Events

by Greg Coss

REC Sports' popularity is growing each day, so much that it isn't giving Tracy Greenawalt any time to cool down. The senior Aerobic Dance Coordinator faces a full class, which has prompted concern from REC Sports Director Dennis Berry, who wants to see everyone have a chance to dance. The result of his fear is an effort to bring step aerobic, the newest craze in aerobics, to Washington College. If budget allows for this, it could be here by late in the Fall semester, opening new classes for students.

In the meantime, REC Sports still is offering many enticing alternatives. The Greek Games will be held on September 29th, and then the following weekend the Theta Chi Softball Classic will take place. Berry said it is likely that ten campus (faculty and staff) and one alumni team will be participating, and he hopes for more entries. Entries must be brought in next week to Berry, whose office is located in the Casey Swim Center. Proceeds from teams entering will go to the Theta Chi Fraternity's charity of their choice.

Also, next week starts women's flag football. For those who are unaccustomed to the rules and the game of football, there will be minicamps held for each team. Each team is assigned a coach who will run them through plays and discuss strategy. The AOII team is the three-time defending champion, allowing a total of six points scored against them in those three years.

The Certs volleyball tournament also gets underway next week, and on October 14th and 15th the Shick Superhoops (3 on 3) tournament takes place.

In the ongoing football league, Caroline currently leads the league in points scored, averaging 19 points a game, while Conway leads all scorers with 30 points. Get with the REC Sports program!

Soccer Runs into Double Trouble

by Chris Vaughn

The streak stays alive! The Shoremen continued to fall deeper and deeper into the hole, as they dropped yet two more on their road of frustration, accumulating a record of 0-5.

WC travelled to Salisbury State last Wednesday, hoping that a trip to the shore would bring their first win. It was not to be, however, as Salisbury handled WC with ease, 5-0, with their defensive inclusive transition game. "Our biggest problem was our mental status. We came out flat and dragging," said returning junior defenseman Tad "Rerun" Hershey.

Last Saturday would be an entirely different story. The Shoremen warriors entered the Kib Dome with a sense of revived vitality as they prepared to take on #7 Guilford. Their lateral ball movement, which they lacked in previous games, was rather impressive and kept the pressure on the North Carolina boys. WC was able to keep the score at 1-0 during the first half, but then would suffer an emotional setback. Our own Chris "Flea" Kleberg took a cross from forward Chris Graham and fired home the apparent equalizer, only to have it called back because time had expired. Guilford capitalized on WC's subsequent letdown early in the second period, striking two more times to account for the rest of the scoring, as WC fell, 3-0.

The Shoremen take a well needed break this week as they prepare for a big game against Franklin & Marshall this Saturday at 1:30 here on the Kibster! Be there for what we hope is a change of pace!

This week's best bet in Professional Football:

The New York Giants are only favored by 2 1/2 points over the Dallas Cowboys in Texas Stadium this Sunday. The Giants are a much better team than the Cowboys. I'm so confident about this one, I'd bet Chris Spezio's (Meat's) life on it. God, I hope Aikman doesn't get hot. Take New York.

with every governmental body save the military forces, already IS open to gays – along with women, whites, blacks, heteros, convicted murderers, abortionists, right-to-lifers, etc. etc. I refer him to Title IX in the Student Handbook if he has further questions. If he is willing to strike down a national regulation in order to CLOSE the school to such people, then he has every right in the world to start a campaign to do so, and lose accreditation for his diploma.

The last point I would like to raise is Mr. Jenkins' reaction to the idea that the campus might need to recover from homophobia. Homosexuality is hardly something new, it is hardly something that can be avoided or ignored, and it is certainly not something which people have to agree with. It is, however, something with which people should deal. It is not going to go away just because Mr. Jenkins dislikes it, or because the church dislikes it, or even because God dislikes it.

If we want to take the religious view – each of us must make their own path to Heaven, and forcing people to follow a path that is not their own is quite possibly the severest offense to morality and ethics that can exist. A morality which people must be forced to follow is a morality that has no credibility. Likewise, if the administration were to force counseling on students, I would be in the front of the protest pack. However, all they are asking right now is that people learn how to live with one another without condemning, that HOMOPHOBIA (defined: an irrational fear of homosexuality) not be a barrier to understanding and a sense of community.

In summary, if Mr. Jenkins wants to take a moral stand, I suggest he leave the judging up to God. If not, then he may as well just learn to live with what is a fact of life, and should be treated as such. Any group has the right to go about their business unmolested until it harms someone else, anyone can say what they wish as long as it does not harm someone else, and your taxes go to pay for things you don't like. To single out this task force and this organization for special treatment would be the strongest possible denial of the democratic priciples which Mr. Jenkins seems to so eagerly defend.

Elm Policy Fails to Uphold First Amendment Rights

To the Editor:

The Constitution is specific: "Congress shall make no law ... abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press ..." It seems the "Elm" has managed to do what Congress couldn't. I admit, it was complete boredom that drove me to read the fine print in the newspaper staff box. Nonetheless, I was appalled to read that all "letters must be signed: no anonymous letter will be printed under any circumstances. Students should include with letters their major and year, faculty and staff their department and position." Obviously the editor thinks that anonymous opinions aren't worth the newsprint.

Maybe Ms. Menton isn't aware that the Supreme Court has repeatedly upheld that the First Amendment does protect anonymous speech. The same amendment which protects her paper also entitles cowards to the right of free speech.

I can only conjecture as to Ms. Menton's reasons for believing the First Amendment shouldn't apply to Washington College students. Therefore, I hope she will either fully explain her policy or recognize that newspapers have a special duty in securing the Constitutional rights of Freedom of the Press and Freedom of Speech, not just for themselves but for every American Citizen.

John Need
Major: Philosophy
Class: Senior

[Editor's Response: Had Mr. Need's "complete boredom" motivated him to read the August 30 article, "New Editorial Policy," he would not need to conjecture about the Elm's reasons for this policy. We stated, "we will no longer be printing unsigned letters to the editor, or printing letters with the author's name withheld. This is due to problems incurred by last year's staff when they printed an inflammatory letter without a byline. It is the opinion of this year's staff that if a student or staff member feels strongly enough about an issue to ... write the Elm a letter, he should be willing to publicly defend the opinion stated therein." Furthermore, "the Elm exists to provide a forum ... to exercise their first amendment rights; it is not the responsibility of the Elm or the Elm staff to shield authors from possible controversy." I would also refer Mr. Need to Troy Petenbrink's interpretation of the first amendment rights in his letter on page 2 of this issue.]

Board of Visitors and Governors Plans New Classroom Building

by Sherry Menton

The Washington College Board of Visitors and Governors on September 28 approved a plan to allocate $20,000 hold a competition to determine the architect for a new classroom building for WC.

The site of the proposed classroom building has not been decided; however, plans currently call for the building to contain 26,000 square feet of classroom and faculty office space. The total estimated cost of the building is 4.6 million dollars, 2.3 million of which will be paid for by a matching grant from the state of Maryland.

Renovation of William Smith Hall is another construction project currently in the works. The estimated cost of the renovation is $450,000, bringing the total cost of both building projects to 4.9 million dollars. The renovation project is currently on hold until a course of action regarding the new classroom building is determined.

Also addressed by the Board was the status of Washington College's relations with the N.C.A.A. In a statement issued by the Board, it relates, "Following a meeting between members of the Student Affairs Committee of the Board and representatives from the men's

At the SGA meeting on October 1, the CIA report was addressed as well as the issue of smoking in the Coffee House and the Dining Hall.

The CIA report stated that the Comedy Club will premier October 16 from 8:30-10:00 PM in the Coffee House. The Travel Committee is sponsoring a trip to the Museum of Art in Philadelphia on October 19. The next trip planned by the committee will be to New York City; the date will be forthcoming.

Along with the CIA report, the issue of smoking in the Coffee House and Dining Hall were discussed. Dorm senators were asked to get opinions from their residents, and anyone with a very stron opposition should write to The Elm. Dorm Senator Christy Albright brought forward the same concern with smoking in the Dining Hall. Many senators agreed that this was a growing concern amoung their residents and the issue will be tabeled at the next meeting.

SGA Treasurer Brian Gimelson stated that 360 people attended the Greek Games last weekend and $195 went to SGA, and $270 went to both the Alpha Chi Sorority and the Theta Chi Fraternity. The Aeorbics Dance Program, which originally requested $650 in funding, asked for $250, and the money was allocated. The Woman's Basketball Club which originallly requested $500 apllied for funding, was allocated $250 by a unanimous vote. The Office of Student Activities requested $626.20 to send four students to a conference on programming, and the money was allocated.

Bach's Lunch Concert a Sunny Success

by Sherry Menton

The Music Department's open-air performance, "Bach's Lunch," was greeted by warm weather and sunny skies this Wednesday after having been rained out last week.

The annual concert, which was presented on the Miller Library terrace, drew a sizeable audience not only from students who had gotten take-out lunches in order to attend the concert, but from students and staff who, walking across the terrace en route to something else, were attracted by the sounds of Vivaldi, William Byrd, and Phillip Glass in addition to the expected Bach.

The program began with a harpsichord solo of Bach's "Prelude and Fugue in D Major" performed by Michael Tyson.

Marilee Schumann, Cindy Young, and Jan Hartley then played Byrd's "Fantasia in D Minor" on their soprano, alto, and tenor recorders.

Vivaldi's "Concerto In G Minor" was performed by Melissa Sirick and Tiffany Althizer on violin, Sally McGee on violoncello, and Tyson on harpsichord.

The "Modern Love Waltz" written by Phillip Glass and performed by piano instructor Kathleen Mills added a touch of contemporary music to the concert. The electronic keyboard she used was provided by sophomore piano student Scott Graham.

Bach's "Cantana No. 211" was the final offering, with Kathleen Mills on harpsichord, Elizabeth Parcell on flute, and Sarah McGee on violoncello accompanying soprano Barbara Dresser.

Junior Fellows Accepting Applicants

by Julie Greene

As the Society of Junior Fellows embarks on its second year at Washington College, applications for membership are once again available to upperclassmen.

The Society was established last spring as a "collegium of scholars dedicated to the exchange of ideas," purporting to actively engage the interests of all Junior Fellows through lectures and an annually published journal of undergraduate research and writing by the Junior Fellows and funded by the Society.

Juniors and seniors may currently apply for membership to the Society, which is limited to 40 members. Membership criteria include a cumulative GPA of 3.2 or better, active participation in community outreach programs, and a demonstration of leadership qualities in extra-curricular activities. Applications for membership must be accompanied by a recommendation from the Department Chair of the student's major field of study. The application deadline for the fall semester is October 15, but students should submit them to the curator, Dr. Davy McCall, before that date so he may forward them to the Society's Advisory Council for review.

In their founding year the Society had 32 members from the Classes of 1991 and 1992. The Junior Fellows had a cumulative grade point average of 3.75 at the end of the last academic year.

One of the functions of the Society is to provide funding for projects which broaden the Fellows' educational experiences. This funding may be used to supplement internships, or for independent scholarly research, volunteer work, or research-related travel. Only Junior Fellows are eligible to submit proposals for monetary grants for the committee's consideration.

During the summer of 1990 the Society assisted two internships. Roy Kesey, a senior Philosophy/English major, taught American Literature at the Vilnius Polytechnical Institute in Lithuania, while political science major Steve Bruchey served an internship in the Maryland Governor's Office.

This past summer the Junior Fellows Program funded eight internships and special research projects. Mary K. Brewster studied the technical competence in wetland science, plant identification, soils, hydrology and government regulation during her internship in the Wetland Science Training

OPINION/EDITORIAL

Dining Hall Smoking: Should it be Banned?

The SGA this week tabled discussion of a resolution to ban all smoking in the Dining Hall. The Senators did not want to vote on this issue until they had a chance to find out what their constituents think of the idea. At a time when governing bodies at all levels, be they college or national, vote according to their own desires and run roughshod over their constituents, the Elm is gratified to see that the Senators actually want to represent the student body's opinion on this matter.

We have grown up in a health-conscious decade; more surgeon generals than we can remember have repeatedly warned us about the dangers of smoking. Over the past year or two the Surgeon General has stated firmly that secondhand smoke is as carcinogenic as if the breather were smoking a cigarette himself.

As a result of this media blitz, many states have banned smoking in all public buildings, except in designated areas. Airline flights are largely smoke-free. Our own Miller Library now has no Smoking Room at all. The dining hall has a non-smoking section, but as a recent Napkin Board inquiry demonstrates [in the Sept 23-29 WCDS Newsletter], the abuse of this area is such that many people don't know it exists.

The Elm is tentatively in favor of the SGA resolution to ban smoking in the dining hall. It is a source of wonder to us that anyone can manage to eat and smoke at the same time, anyway. The plethora of health-related arguments in favor of the plan are undeniable. However, the Elm also recognizes that smokers may feel like they are being pushed out, barred from public areas, simply because of a trait that is, after all, a matter of personal choice. The Elm does not endorse discrimination against smokers or any other group, but if smokers are unwilling to respect the no-smoking section of the dining hall, perhaps the only alternative is to ban smoking. Another option, and one that we would urge the SGA to consider, is making two wings of the dining hall non-smoking, leaving only one wing as a smoking area. Perhaps a compromise will satisfy smokers and non-smokers alike.

The Elm encourages all students who have an opinion on this issue to speak to their Dorm Senators. The SGA is being kind enough to give the student body a true voice; all students should take advantage of this opportunity to be heard.

The Kent Parking Lot: Going in Circles

Wouldn't it be really stupid if someone spent a lot of money to clear Eastern Neck Island, pave it with asphalt, line it, but not allow anyone to park there? Yes, REALLY STUPID! So what's with the stupidity associated with lovely Kent Circle. [sic] I can remember keg parties on the quad, drinking and playing frisbee all afternoon. Students actually enjoyed hanging out there. It seemed to bring the campus together. Who could forget that wonderful rainy May Day of the same year, the entire campus watching Sean Kennedy and Dave Butler mud slide in the buff (ouch!) and then everyone joining in themselves. I still have scars from that.

But then came Clint and his "Master Plan" to redo the campus. I returned Junior year to find a road built around the quad. I guess the administration was tired of people driving on those little golf cart paths. And so arose Kent Circle, a nice drive with several parking places strategically placed in from to the dorms. People naturally parked their cars in the spaces, but were surprised to find warning on their cars one morning saying they were no longer allowed to park there. So the lot stood empty except for the security truck. Why you may ask? Well why ask why? That was the response last year.

Now it's happened again. Two weeks of unrestricted parking and now they have put back that little post in the middle of the entrance. The lot is once again empty. There is something called "No-Net-Loss Development," and the fact that the Bill Smith lot was filled in with grass is great, but something was still lost. Having those spaces there and not using them is a loss. Taking away our quad for 18 parking spaces for the security truck is a loss.

Several plans have been proposed, but none considered. I realize they just spent big bucks writing RA on the new Talbot parking lot, but how about RA parking in Kent Circle? Or maybe they can fill it back in with grass. Just please do something with it. We can't have kegs on the quad anymore, but how about some cars? I just hate to see wasted space.

Sincerely,
John Bates

A Message To Students From the Computing Center

To the Editor:

The Academic Technology Committee has begun to readdress the issue of student access to computing resources on the college campus. As an interim solution to the expressed need for more access to computers on campus, for the balance of the fall semester the computing classroom in the Casey Academic Center will be open for general student access Monday through Thursday 6:00 PM to 11:00 PM, Saturday from 1:00 PM to 5:00 PM, and Sunday from 1:00 PM to 11:00 PM. I would like to add that the reason the classroom is not currently open for general student access is a support issue and not a budgetary issue as reported by the Elm. The computers in this classroom are set up based upon the needs of the classes using the facility. Student "hackers" customizing these systems interfere with the ability of other students to use them during classroom simulations and presentations. If students using the facility can refrain from malicious or inadvertent "hacking," copying of files to and from these machines, and making deliberate modifications to the system software, then the problems associated with the classroom's use last semester will be greatly alleviated. The schedule for general access will begin this Saturday, October 5. Please help us to maintain this facility as one of the finest electronic classrooms in the country.

Sincerely,
Paul Bishop
Director of Computing

Swarthmore Student Berates Jenkins for Subverting Constitution

To the Editor:

While visiting Washington College this weekend, I happened to read the Elm. I was interested in the debate surrounding the task force to investigate the status of homosexuals. As am not a member of the Washington College community, I can not speak, with any authority, to the necessity of such a task force. However, I was struck by James L. Jenkins, Jr.'s opinions, as expressed in his editorial.

Whether or not a task force is a "misuse of money", as the deceivingly benign headline suggests, is certainly an issue for the students, faculty, and administration of your school. Mr. Jenkins' article, however, dwarfs this debate, becoming a manifesto of intolerance, discrimination, and fear.

It is ironic that Mr. Jenkins, while calling for minority suppression, mentions the Bill of Rights. When the writer states, "A[n]...objection I have to the task force is its purpose to make the Washington College community open to gays and lesbians", he is clearly and decisively contradicting the egalitarian principles espoused in the aforementioned document. Mr. Jenkins seems unable to transcend his egocentric construction of the ideals on which this country was founded. In his vehement call for societal stagnation, the writer seeks to deny homosexual individuals their humanity. The theoretical community, proposed by Mr. Jenkins, is one of majority absolutism in which the status quo serves only to reproduce itself; it is the antithesis of an educational environment.

Although the writer claims to be concerned that "the rights of homosexuals...[might be elevated]...above the rights of heterosexuals", his belief in the exclusion of gay and lesbian people from the college community clearly undermines the legitimacy of his arguments and suggests a deep-rooted fear of difference as well as a profound insecurity about human sexuality.

Mr. Jenkins' opinions are, unfortunately, not unique. The hegemony has learned to fear plurality, as it intrinsically dilutes their power. Terns such as moral, decent, and normal have been appropriated in order to maintain the inequitable status of all groups outside of the ruling elite. Unfortunately, these efforts have succeeded and become an integral part of our society. Hopefully, positions, like Mr. Jenkins', will promote constructive academic debate as well as exploration into the hidden motives and fears implicit in any discourse on sexuality, gender, and power.

In short, although Mr. Jenkins is certainly entitled to his myopic opinions, he has failed to grasp the basic tenets of our country's constitution. By attempting to suppress the rights of the gay, lesbian, and bisexual community, the writer plants an insidious seed which will eventually poison the land that sustains him. Furthermore, this naked fear and hatred of homosexuals paradoxically and simultaneously confirms the power of plurality and the writer's impotence in comparison. Mr. Jenkins' spurious arguments are anachronistic at best; unchecked, however, they threaten to tear apart and, consequently, destroy our country and its position in the world today.

Sincerely,
Peter Oishi

To the Editor:

I am certain that the entire Washington College community, especially the residents of the International House, join me in thanking Brian Gimelson, the East Hall RA, for his speedy and thoughtful reaction to the room fire Sunday night [September 22] in his building. His responsible actions prevented a very dangerous situation from becoming a tragic one.

Campus Voices Trivialized Security Aspect of Phone Issue

by Ann Veiga

As a student of Washington College, I am truly embarrassed by Campus Voices in last week's Elm. Despite the fact that only students were interviewed (an insufficient representation of the campus community), the responses were shocking. I presume the interviewed were approached at 6 am in the morning and their pictures were taken some time after noon. If so, I can therefore understand their responses as I myself am not a fully functioning, thinking human being while it is still dark outside.

Students, if you truly think it is worthwhile to have a campus phone hookup in every dorm room - if you have an opinion on this issue - why degrade the issue by complaining about fellow students' inability to relay messages or neglect in answering the phone? Pointing out minor human failings will not help the remaining college community to realize that there are real legitimate reasons for a phone hookup. Yes, the expense for an outside hookup is atrocious, and for the average college student, not affordable. Whether you hold these opinions or have no opinion whatsoever, do not overlook the most basic, legitimate reason - security.

Schools competitive to Washington College have recently, or are in the process of, installing a campus phone line in each room. Colleges such as Goucher, Sweet Briar, and Pitzer defend their investment not only because of the convenience it gives to administration, faculty, and staff if students need to be contacted, but primarily for the students' safety. The students have a direct line to campus security if emergencies arise. In the case of family emergencies, students are readily able to receive the call, not having to depend on a hall phone and fallible human beings.

Anything can happen (by outside or inside forces) on a college campus, as Josephine the Fly clearly pointed out to us last week. We were also informed in the Elm that it will be a requirement in 1992 to make campus crime statistics public to help students and parents be aware of safety risks they may be taking when choosing a college. Although Washington College's crime rate is much lower than those of other colleges, why not practice preventative security, even if that means each room is only equipped with a direct line to security?

I hope that those who support the mental and physical health of the Washington College community by their generous contributions will soon realize that we will be able to fully enjoy these gifts only if we are ultimately prevented from harm. Perhaps they will hear the plea for preventative security.

Until then, students, pease do not forget to place you robe near arms' reach, leave a quarter out on your night table, memorize 778-2800 ext. 310 dutifully, practice running to the hall phone (Cardinal residents may have to throw on a pair of sneakers to get to their phone and the remaining new dorm residents should walk, not run down their stairway so as not to fall), and finally, learning a prayer or two may help while you are patiently waiting for an answer if an emergency arises.

WC Students Out of Touch With World Events

by Sherry Menton

As our Campus Voices poll for this week has demonstrated, it is not always easy for students at WC to find out about world events. In the past week, President Bush and now Congress are seriously considering invading Iraq again to enforce UN mandates, Judge Clarence Thomas has moved one step closer to sitting on the US Supreme Court, Governor Schaefer has submitted a budget that will cut 25% from private college funding (which promises to drastically affect Washington College), and revolutions and civil wars are continuing all over the world. Many students remain oblivious to the majority of these crucial events.

The Periodical Room of Miller Library is the surest bet for students who want to know what's going on outside (and sometimes even inside) Chestertown, but a student would have to be a dedicated news buff (or have a class assignment to read the paper!) to make a special trip to the Periodical Room every day.

The Snack Bar has a television for use by its patrons, and students could catch the news there, were it not that Cheers is on almost as often as the news is during 5-7 pm.

The main problem with trying to watch television news (and I speak from experience, as an unreformed newsaholic Washingtonian) is that most students have other places to be during 5-7 pm than in their rooms, or a friend's room, or a dorm lounge, watching the news. One place that on-campus students are almost certain to be at some point during that time, however, is the WC Dining Hall.

Those of you who attended the Spring Fling night at WCDS last year may remember that a television was set up in one corner of the dining hall, showing "Field of Dreams." It would be wonderful if a television could be placed in the dining hall every night at dinnertime. Students who want to hear the news could sit in that wing of the dining hall, and students who aren't interested can ignore it just as they ignore the noise produced by everybody else's conversations. And even for those who chose not to pay attention to the news, they would at least be reminded that the outside world isn't waiting for us.

In an era of instant global communication, when political and business matters can change hourly, Washington College is doing its students a disservice if it does not make every effort to keep them aware of the social, political, and economic changes that are reported daily in the news. Providing a television in the dining hall so students can have easy access to the news would be relatively painless for the WC bureaucracy to deal with, and would be of great benefit to students.

The Elm will not be

Fall Weekend.

In the meantime, we will still be accepting your letters and comments.

US, Soviets Reduce Nuclear Arms

WASHINGTON, D.C.

The Cold War is really over! On Saturday, President Bush announced a plan to withdraw all short-range nuclear weapons intended for use against Soviet troops in the event of a general war. The U.S. will also eliminate nuclear cruise missiles from ships and submarines. These are the biggest steps yet towards reversing the arms race. Moscow is preparing counterproposals to be presented later in the week, and is urging other nuclear powers to do the same. Deputy Foreign Minister Vladimir Petrovsky is quoted as saying "Today we have a real chance of a breakthrough to a nuclear-free world."

MARYLAND

Governor Schaefer has announced a $450 million cut in state spending. The plan includes 1,766 permanent layoffs and the elimination of 419 vacant positions. Two medevac helicopter bases will be closed, welfare and drug addiction programs will be sharply curtailed, and the General Public Assistance program for the poor will be eliminated.

HAITI

President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, who is Haiti's first freely elected president and an enormously popular Roman Catholic priest, was arrested on Monday by rebel soldiers. The government is negotiating "to at least save the president's life." The soldiers have seven demands, including greater independence of the military and reinstatement of several officers fired after Father Aristide became president.

GERMANY

Thursday marked the first anniversary of Germany's unification. Although this should be a happy occasion, many eastern Germans have been disappointed by the year of unification; as many have felt exploited and belittled by the richer western Germans. The writer Fritz J. Raddatz was quoted as saying "On the map we are unified, but in our heads we certainly aren't." The prejudice between eastern and western Germans is so great that now another sort of wall has been built between them: one known as the "wall in the head."

U.S.A.

America mourns the death of one of its most beloved children's authors, Dr. Seuss. The influential writer wrote 4 of the top 10 best-selling children's books of all time and won a Pulitzer Prize in 1984 for his services to children's literature. He died on the 24th at age 87.

On Saturday, September 28, our country also lost a great jazz musician, Miles Davis. Davis, a trumpet player who lived to age 65, was one of the originators of the "cool jazz" style; and produced such albums as "Porgy and Bess," "Miles Ahead," and "Bitches Brew."

Tough Choices: How to Balance the Budget

by Governor William Donald Schaefer

The most difficult job I've had in the past few weeks has been balancing the state budget, and I thought you would like to know how some of the decisions were made. I'm not happy with these decisions, because people are going to feel the impact of these cuts, but I am required by law to balance the budget. There are alternatives.

A variety of factors contributed to the $450 million shortfall for this fiscal year. Among them: the recession has produced lower revenues from the sales tax and income tax, because people are spending less and many are earning less. Unemployment has helped drive up some of our more expensive aid programs – programs we have to fund. Since 1989, state aid to health care has gone up $300 million, spending on welfare and social services has increased $129 million, and costs for prisons and public safety has climbed by $155 million. Higher education, an important area which I committed to improving, has gone up by $91 million since 1989.

I am constantly told to "cut the fat" and cut unnecessary spending, but did you know that in the past few years, we have whittled away at other areas of government, cutting $85 million since 1989 from the bureaucracy and assistance to private groups. Last year, we trimmed 3,300 state jobs during cost containment efforts that cut more than $600 million from state spending.

Now, how do we go about balancing the budget for the current fiscal year? You might think that in an $11.5 billion state budget, it shouldn't be too hard to find a spare $450 million. But $7.1 billion of the total budget is made up of "mandated" expenses, programs the federal government requires us to fund. They include all the requirements passed down to us in the federal budget, education spending – this helps the local governments – the courts, the General Assembly, and payments on debt services for construction of schools, wastewater treatment plants, and other buildings. That leaves just $4.4 billion that can be cut, and this year we had to trim 10 percent of that to bring the budget in line with revenues.

Where did we cut? We made average across-the-board cuts of 6.5 percent to state agencies, which follow last year's 6.5 percent reductions. We cut non-mandated state aid by 25 percent, or $103 million, the maximum allowed under the law with legislative approval. This affects local government aid, paying for county police, health departments, community colleges, and the school breakfast program. Private institutions, like private colleges, the Baltimore Zoo and National Aquarium, historical sites, and the University of Maryland Medical Systems, also were cut 25 percent.

Some programs were eliminated outright, like the General Public Assistance (GPA) program that pays benefits for 24,000 of the state's poorest people, and the state-only Medicaid program that goes with GPA. We had to eliminate what we now have to consider "luxury" items in public safety: education, recreation, anc counseling services for prison inmates. With fewer chances to earn "good credits" that help speed their releases, inmates will end up staying longer in prison, and the state will effectively be in the business of "warehousing" inmates. Finally, the total effect of all the cuts will involve laying off more than 1,700 state workers and eliminating another 419 vacancies, reducing the statewide workforce by nearly 8 percent this year alone.

None of these decisions came easily, and each cut spells further potential problems for jails, hospitals, and shelters. The University of Maryland chose to balance its budget by increasing tuition, an option I'm not happy about. Reductions in local health aid means Maryland's counties won't have state money to spend on school nurses, restaurant inspectors, and basic local health services. The individual agency reductions means closing two State Police barracks, closing 22 Youth Services bureaus, and reducing grants for foster care and Aid to Families with Dependent Children. The $2 million cut form the Public Defender's Office means as many as 140 appeals a month will be deferred, choking an already strained judicial system. The state's Property Tax Appeals Board's reductions will mean the board will stop hearing appeals after Nov. 1. The $3 million reduction from the Department of Economic and Employment Development reduces opportunities for what could be lucrative foreign trade.

I don't like this plan, because it ends up hurting people who need our help the most. Unfortunately, right now, we don't have a choice, because as I said, the law states that the budget must be balanced. Make no mistake about it, there is no "fat" to be cut. Whatever is left – if eliminated – is going to hurt someone, somewhere. Some people are going to be shocked by this. I also don't like the burden that's being passed on to local governments.

A year ago I proposed a tax package that would have helped us avoid a lot of these reductions. My proposal was rejected because some didn't like it, didn't think it was needed. I have not proposed taxes to balance this budget, because that's something I couldn't have counted on. The cuts had to be made from what was available.

Through these difficult next few months, I want you to know that people will continue to be our No. 1 priority – we're just having to re-think how we deliver some services. And if ever before we needed new ideas and innovation, it's now. We need new ideas on helping prisoners, helping children, and treating the disabled. We need state agencies, local governments, and the private sector to work together to find new ways to treat old problems. There are alternatives to taking these kinds of steps to balance the state budget. My concern is that these reductions throw us backward. Remember it takes about 10 seconds to demolish a building, but it can take many years to rebuild it. That's the kind of rebuilding we would be facing in Maryland.

As always, I appreciate hearing from you. Write me: Governor William Donald Schaefer, State House, Annapolis, MD 21401.

by Tanya Allen

Brenda flew away, leaving Josephine alone on the bench overlooking Minta Martin. "Brenda!" Josephine cried, starting to fly after her, "Brenda! Which way did you go...come back! Brenda! Let me help you!" Josephine stopped and stared wildly into the darkness. Her friend had completely disappeared. "Brenda!" Josephine's voice was thin and frightened, and she began to also call for "Napoleon? Napoleon!" The only sound she could hear was that of seven drunk lacrosse players singing the Frankie Goes To Hollywood song.

"We lax, we do it
to it...."

Frightened, Josephine took a breath and plunged into the night. "Brenda?" she called her friend's name as she flew, her voice quavering. "Napoleon? Someone?" She flew across the crosswalk. "Hello? Gee..." she said to herself as she sighted the Lit. House, "That looks like a pretty place...." she could see some students through the windows, sipping wine, and she could hear them yelling to each other about the library's current display of banned books. "Can you believe...?" one yelled at another, "Can you believe that Maurice Sendack's In The Night Kitchen has been banned in some schools?"

"No way, man!" yelled another, "I love that book!"

"Yeah!" said the first, "And another banned A Doll's House because it had feminist thought in it, and others banned The Lion, the Witch, and the Wardrobe, and A Wrinkle in Time, and they even banned Big Papa's favorite book— The Catcher in the Rye, the one he mentions at least once a class period, in every class he teaches! Can you believe it? I'll bet he's upset! And, man, the list goes on! Just about every cool book there is has been banned at some time or another!"

"Yeah!" said a chick in a long skirt and jangly earrings, "Another school banned The Old Man and the Sea...."

"The Old Man and the Sea?" Oh man, how can that book possibly be controversial? It's about a man...who goes fishing! He goes fishing! Horrors! Controversy!"

"Oh, people are just so ridiculous...." another lit-house lady said. Josephine could also see a lone computer screen glowing in a room upstairs, and a long-haired man loping through the kitchen, then stopping to stare at a sheet of paper, muttering, "Is it 'YAWP, Young Aggressive Writers and Poets,' or 'YAWN, Young Aggressive Writers and Novelists?' Oh, who knows...."

Josephine was about to enter the building, when she heard a familiar voice coming from the garden behind the house.

"They destroyed the Elm!" the voice was saying.

"Napoleon?" Josephine whispered. "Nap...!" she started to rush toward the sound, then stopped as she heard more of what it was saying.

"They destroyed the Elm, therefore they must be destroyed themselves!"

"Yeah! Yeah!" a caterpillar cheered. "This school sucks!"

Josephine ducked under a picnic table and peered out from behind one of its legs. Her beloved Napoleon was standing in the center of a circle of bugs, his eyes glowing, his front legs rubbing together. "We shall destroy them!" he cried. "We shall destroy the administration! The faculty! The students! The dining hall workers! The security guards! Everyone! We shall destroy them all! Bugs! Let us review what we have done so far!"

"We," cried a gnat, "Are the 'bugs' in the computer network— the ones that keep making it go down!"

"And we," cried a moth, "Are also the ones who caused the culture van to blow up, and later the Somerset washing machine!"

"And we," cried a bee, "Are the ones who bring viruses to the campus computers!"

"And we," cried a grasshopper, "Are the ones who are making so many of the students 'catch bugs' and get sick!"

"And we," cried a cockroach, "Are the ones who jump up and down on the dorm toilet handles and make them flush, thereby scalding showering students! And to think," she went on, "To think that everyone thought it was the Freshmen who dared to flush and scald without yelling a warning! Ha ha ha ha ha!"

"Together!" Napoleon yelled, "Together we will slowly, but surely, cripple the school and everyone in it! Together, we will get revenge! Together, we will bring about the end of the WAC!

It's the end of the WAC as we know it
It's the end of the WAC as we know it
It's the end of the WAC as we know it
And we feel fine...."

Josephine shuddered as she listened to the bugs sing the REM song. "This is horrible!" she said to herself, "Simply horrible! Napoleon's gone mad! He must be stopped! What am I going to do?"

Ford Foundation
Fellowships Available for Students and Faculty

The National Research Council will administer the Ford Foundation Predoctoral, Dissertation, and Postdoctoral Fellowships for Minorities Program which will offer approximately 55 three-year predoctoral fellowships, 20 one-year dissertation fellowships, and 25 postdoctoral fellowships to Native American Indians, Alaskan Natives (Eskimo or Aleut), Black/African Americans, Mexican Americans/Chicanos, Native Pacific Islanders (Polynesians or Micronesians), and Puerto Ricans.

Designed to increase the presence of underrepresented minorities on the nation's college and university faculties, these fellowships will provide opportunities in higher education for members of these six minority groups which are most severely underrepresented in the nation's PhD population.

In this national competition sponsored by The Ford Foundation, citizens of the United States, members of one of the designated minority groups, beginning graduate students or within one year of completing the dissertation, and who expect to work toward the PhD or ScD degree may apply for a predoctoral fellowship award.

Those citizens who are preparing for or already engaged in college or university teaching, and who hold the PhD or ScD degree may apply for a postdoctoral fellowship award of one year's duration.

Fellowships will be awarded in the behavioral and social sciences, humanities, engineering, mathematics, physical sciences, and biological sciences, or for interdisciplinary programs composed of two or more eligible disciplines.

Awards will not be made in areas such as business administration and management, communications, health sciences, home economics, journalism, library science, counseling, personnel and guidance, public health, social work, fine arts and performing arts, and education.

Awards also will not be made for work leading to terminal master's degrees, doctorates in education (PhD or EdD), Doctor of Fine Arts (DFA) degrees, or professional degrees in such areas as medicine, law, or business.

Tenure of a postdoctoral fellowship provides postdoctoral research experience at an appropriate non-profit institution of higher education or research of the Fellow's choice.

Appropriate institutions include universities, museums, libraries, government or national laboratories, privately sponsored non-profit institutes, government chartered non-profit research organizations, and centers for advanced study.

Fellowships will be tenable at any accredited nonprofit United States institution of higher education offering PhDs or ScDs in the fields eligible for support in this program.

Each predoctoral fellowship will include an annual stipend of $11,500 to the Fellow, and an annual institutional grant of $6,000 to the fellowship institution in lieu of tuition and fees.

Dissertation Fellows will receive a stipend of $18,000 for the twelve-month tenure with no institutional grant.

All predoctoral fellowship applicants must have Graduate Record Examinations (GRE) General Test scores for tests taken since October 1, 1986.

All dissertation fellowship applicants must be admitted to doctoral candidacy and have completed all course work and examinations (except for the defense of the dissertation) by January 31, 1992 and expect to complete the dissertation during the 1992-1993 academic year.

The deadline for applying for the predoctoral and dissertation fellowship competition will be November 8, 1991, whereas the deadline for the postdoctoral fellowship applications will be January 10, 1992.

All inquiries concerning application materials and program administration should be addressed to: Ford Foundation Predoctoral and Dissertation Fellowships, The Fellowship Office, GR 420A, National Research Council, 2101 Constitution Avenue, Washington, D.C. 20418.

Banned Books Celebrated

"Books and ideas are the most effetive weapons against intolerance and ignorance." Lyndon B. Johnson

by Eve Zartman and Kris Wallenburg

The freedom to talk about sex, violence, racism, and the inequalities of man (universal meaning) in our society are in jeopardy unless we protect the right to express even those views we do not agree with. This week, Banned Book week (September 28 - October 5), is "the celebration and reaffirmation of the ideals expressed in the Bill of Rights." This week's celebration is to remind us of our basic rights, some of which we take for granted. Our forefathers developed the ideals by which our society functions; we are supposed to be able to read books and express ideas without the fear of persecution. This week many libraries throughout the United States, including the Miller Library, are displaying various banned books in their lobbies. Do you remember the books you read in high school? Some of them may be included on this following list. This is an incomplete list of books that have been banned in various areas throughout the United States, which are presently or proposed to be banned for 1991:

Huckleberry Finn; Catcher In the Rye; Catch-22; Slaughterhouse-Five; Of Mice and Men; To Kill a Mockingbird; Fahrenheit 451; Gulliver's Travels; Charlie and the Chocolate Factory; Where's Waldo?; A Wrinkle in Time; The Color Purple; Don Quixote; Gone With the Wind; Grapes of Wrath; The Great Gatsby; Great Expectations; Hamlet; Oliver Twist; The Scarlet Letter; Canterbury Tales; Macbeth; The Wizard of Oz; Biology Textbooks; The Talmud (the Jewish Bible); Our American Heritage; Brave New World; Animal Farm; History of a Free People; The Lord of the Flies; The Glass Menagerie; Homemaking: Skills for Everyday Living; For Whom the Bell Tolls; How to Eat Fried Worms; I, Claudius; Invisible Man; The Jungle; King Lear; Little Red Riding Hood; Just-Right Family: Cabbage Patch Kid Series; Man and Superman; 1984; The Odyssey; Oedipus Rex; The Old Man and the Sea; One flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest; The Outsiders; Paradise Lost; The Pearl; The Prince and the Pauper; The Red Badge of Courage; Rise of American Civilization; Rumplestiltskin; A Separate Peace; System of Logic; Tarzan; Ulysses; Uncle Tom's Cabin; Watership Down; We the People - History of the US; Webster's Dictionary; Wuthering Heights; The Crucible; The Critique of Pure Reason; The Day They Came to Arrest the Book; and yes, even Trout Fishing in America.

You must have read at least three or four of these books since the fifth grade. Some of the books mentioned in this list must appear preposterous. Can a book about trout fishing really damage anyone?

Remember in grade school and high school, when the majority of these books constituted summer reading assignments and were later openly discussed in the classroom environment? What kind of a country do we live in when we prohibit self-exploration and self-actualization usually brought about by reading books such as Charlie and the Chocolate Factory? Why are people prohibited from reading books that bring about inspiration, imagination and free thought?

However, there are some individuals who, by their actions, exhibit a disrespect for the essence of the Bill of Rights when it is what protects their disrespect. The object of the Banned Book Week is to express open-mindedness and the toleration of ideas that are not necessarily our own. Don't let others chose what you can read, "for Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise there of; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." Celebrate your freedom to read; read a banned book!

Flower Power: Pollinate!

A Possible Birth Control Policy for Bees?

By Jason Truax and Kris Wallenburg

What are flowers? For some people, flowers are a symbol of romance; for others, they are a representation of beauty. And for the majority of us, they are the cause of allergic reactions during different seasons of the year.

But what do flowers represent at Washington College? The most impressive display of this bastion of pollen can be observed from the library terrace. This display, possibly known as the WC Botanical Garden, has attracted many visitors, both of the human and insect species.

This visitor population has increased over the past couple years. The most recent evidence of this was the increased attendance at the Bach luncheon, where the performance of the "Flight of the Bumble Bee" was very auspicious.

The WC Botanical Garden has prospered over the years with the addition of several different kinds of flowers. The polymorphistic flowers tend to appear at selected times throughout the course of the year.

One should expect the appearance of fresh, colorful impatients in the month of August, just before the students return and the occurrance of convocation.

In October, just prior to Parent's Weekend, a new arrangement of flowers on the terrace, usually chrysanthemums, is always evident.

As March comes in like a lion, so do the Easter lilies, daffodills, and tulips that give the campus the appearance of an innocent lamb.

An outbreak of vincas (otherwise known as bright eyes) appears just as the senior class ends its journey through their college education and prepares to dance to the tune of "Pomp and Circumstance".

The morphistic realm of these miraculous plants brings to mind implementing a possible birth control policy for bees - have you ever noticed how many bees there really are?

As animals are protected from inhumane treatment by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelity to Animals (SPCA); we should form a task force to protect plants from inhumane treatment, up-rooting, and pollination by other species (no correlation intended). A species should be able to live in harmony with its "brothers" and "sisters" without having to associate with the annoying man.

So, our first official action as the Society for the Prevention of Cruelity to Plants (SPCP), we call for the convocation of perpetual flower power. We, the plants, on behalf of our distant cousins, request that the horticulture specialists refrain from quarterly decapitating our forefathers, who probably adourned General George's table.

Instead, we suggest that the Horticultural Society of WC plant flowers that appear annually without the necessity to up-root the pre-existing plants; or, adopt a program called Rent a Flower - where WC rents out the pre-existing flowers for weddings, anniversaries, convocations, or bar mitzvahs.

Results from the Kent Super Stars

by Kathy Mullan

The Kent Super Star Competition held from September 16-21 was a huge success as the kick-off activity for the United Way's 1991-92 program here in Kent County. Of the 14 total teams that competed in the various events, 8 of these teams consisted of Washington College students, who enthusiastically decided to participate in this community function.

Not only was the competition a success for the United Way, but also for the 2 particular WC teams that placed first and second in the overall events and finished as the true Kent Super Stars. Sweeping first place was The Annoying Table from Hell! team Part 2: George Jamison, Joel Brown, Brian Coleman, and Bruce Alexander; and turning up in second position (only one point beneath the winners) the Theta Chi team #1: Darren Vican, Tom O' Bara, Scott Verstandig, and Spencer Beck. Both teams received medals for their athletic achievements and excellence in their events.

The other six WC teams earned excellent results and nobly represented our college in their efforts: in fifth place, the Hands Out team (Doug Peterson, Kevin Marshall, Kathy Mullan and John Phoebus) and Laura Green's team (Kate Towery, Kara Weisenbaugh, and Peter Martin); in sixth place, the Stumps - a.k.a. The Washington College Elm representatives (Kris Wallenburg, Emily Daignaut, Julie Greene and Greg Coss); in eighth place, the ZTA team (Rebecca Smith, Natalie Guiberson, Casey Carroll, Kathleen Kwapp and Amy Usilton); and finishing in eleventh and twelfth place, the Annoying Table from Hell team Part 1 (Mary Holmes, Tanya Allen, Tara Kidwell, and Mike Tarrant) and the Theta Chi team #2 (Jeff Lim, Michael Ginns and Kris Murphy).

Congratulations to all the participants—you were all Kent Super Stars for your athletic achievements and determined efforts to support our local community United Way and to prove that WC students have a willing and energetic spirit to complement our Chestertown surroundings.

The next Hands Out monthly event will take place on Saturday, October 19, and we are in need of at least 30 volunteers to help paint various barns and sheds for Camp Fairlee Manor, a local camp for physically disabled persons sponsored by the Easter Seals Foundation. Sign-ups for this activity will begin the week of October 14, and all are encouraged to participate by stopping at the Hands Out table in the cafeteria. Join our efforts in spending a day of work and fun to help a community in need of our service!

Baltimore Artist Carol Wood to Exhibit Work

Carol Wood, whose dark, abstract drawings and paintings have received considerable attention in several recent Baltimore exhibitions, will display her recent work in an exhibition opening tonight at Washington College in Chestertown. The exhibit, in the Gibson Performing Arts Center Gallery, will be on display Thursdays - Sundays from 1 - 5 p.m., and a reception will be held today at 5 p.m. The public is welcome to attend.

Carol Wood's paintings are distinguished for emphasizing movement and texture over figural representation. She titles her exhibit at Washington College "Black Paintings" in a reflection of her use of charcoal and black paint thickly laid over her canvasses to give a strong sculptural effect. She says of these paintings, "unhindered by explicit imagery, the dark sculpted surfaces suggest a metaphor for compassion by orienting the eye toward feeling as much as toward seeing. I am interested in the most immediate kinds of perceptions – in tactile, sensuous things."

Carol Wood, who studied at the Sorbonne and received her M.F.A. from the Maryland Institute, College of Art in 1986, has exhibited her work in fourteen shows in Maryland and Delaware over the past four years. John Dorsey of the Baltimore Sun writes of her work, "here is someone who has a feeling for the beauty of the thing as well as the making of it . . . the best of her paintings show a general visual field rather than a focused image . . . reminiscent of Mark Tobey."

Carol Wood is the second of five regional women artists whose work will be shown at Washington College as part of its celebration of a centenary of coeducation. For more information about the exhibit call (301) 778-2800, ext. 402.

Leslie Workman Lectures On Medievalism In America

by Cindy Young

Those of you who noticed the signs around campus for the recent lecture "Medievalism in America" may have wondered how these two subjects could have anything to do with each other. The lecture was presented by Leslie J. Workman, the founding editor of Studies in Medievalism, who will preside over a conference on medievalism at the University of Delaware. Workman began his lecture by reading from a paper he had written about the factors of the Middle Ages which shaped America from the 17th to the19th centuries, and then answered questions from the audience.

Even though we don't think of our society as medieval, there are many elements which Workman pointed out that were derived from the Middle Ages. Literature, for example, contains many elements of medievalism. Author James Fenimore Cooper created an American chivalrous hero in The Last of the Mohicans. Washington Irving reflected medieval thought in his writing, and Emerson belonged to a Harvard literary club called the Knights of the Square Table.

Even science fiction incorporates some of the ideas of medievalism by constructing alternative societies which are either societies based on technology or the Middle Ages.

The idea of chivalry, which is normally thought of in conjunction with medievalism, has played an important role in American society. Southern chivalry, which was most present during the Civil War, has its roots in medievalism, and the western cowboys resembled the knights. Also in relation to chivalry is the fascination with Arthurian lore, including the Grail legends which are an important part of literature.

The influence of medievalism can also be seen in architecture. Gothic churches were built in Boston and Baltimore and all throughout the eastern coast in the 1840's. Downing, the architect who designed the original Smithsonian building in Washington, D.C. which is now commonly called "the Castle," used a medieval or gothic style, and perhaps we are fortunate that he died when he did in 1843, or our nation's capital would resemble a medieval fortress.

Jazz Extravaganza Opens in Chestertown

by Kathy Mullen

Janes United Methodist Church at Cross and Cannon Streets in Chestertown, Maryland is having its Second Annual JAZZ EXTRAVAGANZA on this Saturday, October 5th, 1991, at Wilmer Park (by the Washington College boathouse and pavilion) from 1:00 p.m. until 6:00 p.m. The EXTRAVAGANZA is sponsored by the Renovation Committee to raise funds for the extensive restoration program planned by the general church body, and its purpose is to restore the church to its former position as a center of community life. The suggested donation for all who attend this fun-filled afternoon is $5, and generous gifts have already been made by: The National Trust for Historic Preservation, the Maryland Historical Trust, the Kent County Historical Trust Preservation, Inc., and the Kent County Historical Society. Chesapeake Associated Architects, Inc. and its president, Peter Newlin, have completed many hours of free service to the project. If all goes well, restoration of the masonry and exterior painting is expected to begin near the end of October. The overall cost of this first phase is estimated at $200,000.

The Extravaganza will feature Randolph Johnson, better known as "JAZZ," the great vocalist and saxophonist. Jazz will conduct his All-Star Jazz Group, featuring Earl Price on the Hammond organ; Roland McGill, as tenor saxophonist; Mario Teoli at the trumpet, and Wayne Morgan on percussions. The group promises to top last year's performance in convincing all who attend to become lovers of all music: jazz, pop, rock n' roll, or classical.

There will be plenty of food and beverage for all: "Tea Party" ribs, fish, chicken and Maryland Crab Cakes, fried potatoes, baked beans biscuits, sodas and assorted baked goodies. As additional activities, an Arts and Crafts table will feature some unusual items, and helium inflated balloons will also be on sale at the entrance of the park. Come on out to enjoy the afternoon and help support the needs of a local church!

The Return of Open Mike Night

by Julie Greene

This past Friday night marked the return of the infamous Open Mike Nite at the Student Center. An obvious newcomer to this scene made a comment which I feel appropriately describes the atmosphere of this series, "Why is it M-I-K-E? It's M-I-C! Don't these people know how to spell?" Whether or not the misspelling of, what Greg Coss has refered to as an "orgasmic" event, was accidental or not, it describes the craziness that goes on during these evenings.

As all Open Mike Nite fans know, the Sacred Cows established themselves at this event last year, and this year promises to introduce more talent of their caliber to the WC campus.

Senior Raphael Koster opened the 1991-92 season with an original called Fire From Heaven, which he played on acoustic guitar. Abrah Wilberding and Tanya Allen provided backup vocals for Raph as he performed Paul Simon's Loves Me Like A Rock. He followed with the Indigo Girls' Blood and Fire and then dedicated Waltzing With Bears to the late Dr. Seuss. Raph deserves much credit for maintaining the flow of creativity Friday night.

Abrah then honored the crowd with her rendition of the Gilligan's Island Theme and on a more serious note, Tracy Chapman's Behind The Wall. Another soloist, Christabel Garcia-Zamor, sang Suzanne Vega's The Soldier and The Queen.

Without a doubt, one of the most memorable moments in Open Mike Nite history will be Chris "Meat" Spezio's lip sync version of Gerardo's Rico Suave. If you missed that one you should whip yourself with a wet noodle.

Chris' act was followed by, appropriately enough, his former roommate, Ciaran O'Keeffe, lip syncing Right Said Fred's I'm Too Sexy. The crowd responded enthusiastically to Ciaran's performance art. Ciaran later returned in a tux to perform an original, Melancholy, on keyboard. When asked what his inspiration for this piece was, Ciaran quietly related his story to this reporter. "I was at Grand Central Station when I saw this young lady standing across the platform from me. I approached her with an inquiry. 'Do you have the time?' I asked. She replied, 'For camel sex, yes, but not for you.'"

Sophomore Scott Graham pleased the crowd with his medley of Billy Joel hits including Captain Jack, Piano Man, and She's Got A Way. Jen Reddish and Katie Degentesh provided backup vocals for Scott. India Henson and Brenda Stanley entertained the crowd with a requested Secret Lovers by Atlantic Star and I Wanna Sex You Up by Color Me Badd.

The evening ended with a series of return performances. Meat came back to lip sync Boyz II Men's Motownphilly. Ciaran did a comedy sketch with a cello, and Abrah again moved us all with Simon and Garfunkel's Cecilia.

While there was a good crowd at this year's first Open Mike Night, all are encouraged to come to the next one, and if you don't want to get up on stage, be an active audience!

Crew hangs tough in Potomac

by Greg Coss

Last Saturday, the men's and women's crew teams discovered just how much water is between them and the powerhouses of big and small college crew. The teams traveled to Washington, D.C. to participate in the 11th Sculler's Head of the Potomac regatta. For those familiar with the Washington area, the rowing was held on a three-mile course that began at the downstream end of Fletcher's Cove, went underneath the Key Bridge and concluded at the Roosevelt Bridge. Within this area Washington would be exposed to some of the best crew teams they will face for quite a while.

Over thirty-five different teams ranging in location from Atlanta to New York competed in the events, and the competition was fierce. Two of the more notable teams in the event were Georgetown (a small college team like Washington) and Navy (big college division). These two schools excel in their respective divisions; they are perennial powerhouses, and Washington rowers were competing with them the entire day. Will Brandenburg competed in the men's open fours competition, John McCarthy and R.J. Eldridge entered the men's intermediate doubles, Leroy Gatell was in the men's lightweight singles, and John Mulvany and Terance McCabe were participants in the men's all comers event to name a few of the male entries for WC. The women entered a scull in the club eights division. In each case, WC was facing teams like George Mason, George Washington, and the Potomac Boat Club and this would take its toll on the confidence of the rowers.

"We didn't go to this event expecting to beat everyone," said crew Coach Mike Davenport. "It was good for us to go there and get our butts handed to us."

Davenport also added that winning isn't always the most important thing. "We faced very tough competition at the Potomac, maybe more than we were ready for," he said. "But really we went to the head of the Potomac for three reasons. We went for a good workout, for a good learning experience for the athletes, and to have fun. We accomplished all of these goals, so I'm quite happy."

Washington faced a lot of big name schools last week and to ask a school the size of 850 students to keep pace with them is a very tall order. But Washington gets its chance for glory October 26, when it travels to the head of the Schuylkill river in Philadelphia. The competition there will be more varied than it was at the Potomac. There will be 60 to 80 crew teams entered as opposed to the 35 they faced last Saturday. This should give Washington a chance to prove its toughness against the other small college rowers. Davenport said that this will be "a nice little test to see how resilient we are, and how hard we can work together as a team after the Potomac journey." He also added that in many of the events the distance the rowers cover is 5,000 meters, but that in real races they only cover 2,000. This should strengthen the team considerably. We will see just how strong the Potomac event has made the WC rowers three weeks from now, when they participate in Philadelphia. If you can find a ride to Philly, come see these guys. They're busting butts for you, so get off your a_ _.

Blenckstone strikes again vs. CU

WC's field hockey team proved themselves worthy of their big win over Catholic at the Salisbury State Sunfest Tournament by duplicating the feat nine days ago, 3-2. This kind of victory is so tough because the other team always looks so forward to avenging a defeat. But before Catholic could think revenge, they had to find a way to stop Washington's superstar two-way threat, Jenifer Blenckstone. They couldn't. As was the case in the first game between the two teams, the senior figured prominently in the Shorewomen's offensive scheme. She scored two goals in this one, including the game winner, and Sophomore Renee Guckert added the other tally as Washington once again was able to hold a one-goal lead over theCardinals. The Shorewomen's aggressive defensive style proved to be the difference, aided by the leadership of Blenckstone. Junior Brigid DeVries was only forced to make eight saves as the Shorewomen served notice once more that they can play well with the lead, recording their third one-goal victory of the season. The Shorewomen's victory was a very big one because they wouldn't have to worry about the tough Catholic squad again. They had beaten them twice and were sitting pretty with a 4-3 record, ready to begin facing their MA Southeast opponents. But the those happy Shorewomen face a major obstacle on their roa to prosperity when they trav eled to Elizabethtown last Sat urday. This obstacle woul prove to be a mountain, a Elizabethtown completely con trolled the pace of the game an shut down Washington, 3-0. Th offense, which in previou games had been quite efficient could not come through, an the defense was not up to pa either. Elizabethtown recorde a whopping thirty-four shots o goal, which indicates how wel DeVries played in goal. He thirty-one saves were only tw short of the school record fo saves in one game, held by Lind Anders in a 1988 game versu Western Maryland. After a bi win against Catholic, the tea may not have been mentall prepared for the strength o Elizabethtown.

Washington had a chanc to even their MAC record at 1- with a home game agains Albright last Tuesday. This wi be covered in next week's issu as well as games at Swarthmor yesterday and home agains Haverford this Tuesday at 4:0 p.m. Come see the Shorewome make the Haverford Fords loo like a bunch of Gerald Fords This is a big MAC rival so if yo get a chance, go see 'em. You' be glad you did!

More Pro Picks from the Shoreboard

by Greg Coss (13-12 record but still stinging after Dallas upset the Giants)

Washington -2 1/2 over CHICAGO. The Bears never should have beaten the Jets, so they're not as good as their 4-1 record might indicate. I also like the Redskins because they have been scalping many different animals this year (Lions , Cardinals, Bengals, Eagles,) so why should Bears be any different? Take Washington and give the points.

CINCINNATI -3 1/2 over Seattle. Seahawks get seasick when they go on the road. I've always bet against the Seahawks, an d I've always won. They've paid for a lot of my dinners in the past, and a nice television set, and for that I like the Seahawks a lot. But not that much. Take Cincinnati and give the points.

Dallas -2 1/2 over GREEN BAY. After last week,, I'll never bet against them again. Besides, I don't want to scare Chris Spezio any more by risking his life. Take Dallas and give the points.

Denver +7 1/2 over HOUSTON. I think Houston still can't believe they lost to New England. Getting last week off wasn't enough, I think they needed thewhole month off after that one. Take Denver with the points.

N.Y. Jets EVEN over CLEVELAND. The Jets looked like concords last week against Miami. They are my darkhorse pick to get an AFC wild card birth this year. Take New York.

DETROIT -3 over Minnesota. I never thought I'd be saying this after they lost 45-0 on opening day, but the Lions will be in first place in the Central Division after six games. Barry Sanders is too hot to bet against also, and Herschel Walker called my mom a homeboy raiser. Take Detroit and give the points.

NEW ENGLAND +6 1/ over Miami. This may surpris a few people, but I think Do Shula may die with exactly th 300 wins he has right now. Tak New England with the points.

San Diego +8 over L.A RAIDERS. I can't help but thin the Chargers are overdue at 5. The Raiders may still be cel ebrating the big win over th 49'ers. They made good trade with S.F. for Lott and Craig now they need to trade awa their owner, Al Davis. Take Sa Diego with the points.

N.Y. GIANTS -9 ove Phoenix. The Giants are read to explode after losing to Dalla last week. Take New York an give the points.

Pittsburgh -6 pver INDI NAPOLIS. The Colts just got new coach. Big deal. They ca try new coaches, new cities play in, or even playing the games wearing women's u derwear. No matter what th do they still stink. Take Pitt burgh and give the points.

KANSAS CITY +3 ov Buffalo. The Bills just came a big win over Chicago and w suffer an emotional letdown this one. Also, to be perfect honest, I think Bruce Smith is total woosy for sitting out t season so far when he has f coatswhich cost more than mo players make. Take points, K

Volleyball Gives, Takes Hits Over 2-Weeks of Grueling Play

by Greg Coss

Over the past couple of weeks, Washington College's volleyball team has both received and given out its share of lumps, but through it all continues to look like a squad that could challenge for third place in the Middle Atlantic Conference. Perhaps the reason that they can finish so high is their difficult schedule.The Shorewomen had a very tough time last weekend at the Salisbury State University Gull Classic, dropping four of five matches. However, these were all matches that the Shorewomen weren't expected to win; they were facing stronger opponents, much like three weeks ago in Gettysburg. Better yet, none of these matches affected their MAC Southwest record, which now stands at 1-1. When the Shorewomen play their other MAC opponents later in the month, they shouldn't see anything tougher than what they saw at Salisbury.

Things looked promising early for the Shorewomen when they took the first game in their tournament opener against Stockton State 15-8. However, the Shorewomen would fall in the next two games, 9-15, 8-15. WC then lost another tough three game match, this time to Allentown. After losing a close first game 11-15, the Shorewomen rebounded to take the second 15-10, only to run out of gas in the third game, 7-15. After losing in two games to both Shenandoah and Salisbury State, the Shorewomen stopped their slide with a thrashing of Lincoln (PA) 15-0, 15-2. WC's volleyball team would seem to be a beaten group at this point, if it weren't for two big wins the week before, particularly the one against Dickinson two weeks ago.

After having just completed their trip from the Gettysburg tournament, the Shorewomen stayed on the road to face Dickinson, their first MAC opponent. Washington lost the first game 15-9, but really did not play very well. This was encouraging, because to be off their game and still get nine points in a game showed that Washington had an excellent chance to win this one. Sure enough, the Shorewomen roared back to take the next three games, 15-10, 15-13, 15-10, demonstrating that they could win the close games. Senior Theresa Sganga made the highlight films when she performed a jump set during the Shorewomen's rally, despite her slow recovery from ankle surgery. This win was a huge confidence booster for the squad, and it showed when the Shorewomen crushed host Marymount three days later, 15-4, 16-14, 15-9.

Despite a straight game loss to Gettysburg that would follow these two wins, the team was starting to look very sharp. It should be noted that Gettysburg is the favorite to win the MAC conference this year and Washington played them very tough in all three games, getting as many as seven points against their powerhouse opponent.

The Shorewomen's overall record now stands at 6-9. But their conference record is 1-1 and the loss was to the best team in the conference. Gettysburg and Franklin and Marshall would appear to be the front runners in the league, but then Washington could sneak in at number three. If they do they have an excellent chance at qualifying for the MAC playoffs. But first they had to worry about an away match with Catholic and Mary Washington Tuesday night, which will be covered in the next issue, as well as WC's big event of the season for volleyball, the WC Invitational. This tournament will be held this weekend at Cain Gymnasium and features powerhouses Mary Washington and Wilmington. Come support a winner this Friday and Saturday. The times for this tournament are unavailable at this point but should be ;ater today. This tournament should prove to have the toughest competition that the Shorewomen have faced this season, so they surely could use your help.

Football: Phi's Surprise

The story of the 1991 flag football season has to be the turnaround of the Phi Delta Theta team. Last year they were 1-6 and scoring only 2.8 points a game, and this was in Division II play. This year, they are one drive away from being undefeated in Division I. The Basic Lambda's (5-0) drove the length of the field in forty seconds to edge the Phi Delt's (4-1), 9-8. The biggest difference between this year's team and last year's is quarterback Rory Conway, who has thrown for eight touchdowns and thrown for another six, making him the obvious pick for REC MVP. It appears that his Phi Delt's will have a chance to avenge their only loss. If the Lambda's beat the Dawgs, the Phi Delt's and Lambda's meet for the title.

Freshman James Alvarez of International House is the newcomer of the year, picking off seven passes and catching four for touchdowns. Along with Greg Mouracade and John Morall of the Lambda's, he rates third in scoring behind Conway and Todd Stephenson of Caroline.

To me, the biggest surprise at quarterback is the performance of junior Dan Kretzer. Not given the talent to work with last year with International House, he wasn't able to make a dent in the REC league superstar list. But this year he ranks number two behind Conway in quarterbacks. My hats off to a good guy and a great athlete who is finally getting the attention he deserves!

But Kretzer figures to play a role only in deciding the Division II title. The Division I title could be decided by how hot Conway gets in the championship game.

Pro Football's Big Upset of the Week:

Tampa Bay will upset the Philadelphia Eagles this weekend, only because the Eagles don't have a legitimate starting quarterback. I don't even think Pat Ryan could start for WC'sfootball team if they started one next season. But when McMahon returns, watch out for a dangerous Eagles team.

Soccer High After Big Tie With F&M

by Chris Vaughn

As Dick Enberg would say, OH MY! The Shoremen struck it big this past weekend as they recorded their first decision that wasn't a loss. Surprising the Franklin and Marshall unit, WC played one from the heart, showing an emotional level which had previously not been seen this season in tying F&M, 1-1.

Andrew "Alf" Prevost said, "This is the first game we actually wanted the ball and had a feeling of confidence and aggressiveness." And how true it was! The new defensive line up, appropriately labeled "The Iron Tapestry," shut down the Franklin and Marshall offense and when one of the few WC holes were exploited they were backed up by the 8 X 12 plywood plank in goal, Greg Miller.

It was a struggle to the end as the WAC was given a break late in the second half when Matt "Rocket" Cairns was taken down in the box. Benji "Gumby" Ward was called on for the penalty shot and authoritatively stuck it in to tie the score at 1-1.

The double overtime came and went as the score remained tied and the Shoremen came off with a renewed attitude.

"It wasn't a win but we've got to start somewhere," said Chris Kleberg.

The boys of WC took on top notch Elizabethtown yesterday and could only hope for the best. Look for the coverage next week. Hope you were there on the Kib Meister to see it.

Miller Library Automates Catalog

by Karyn Iacangelo

The Miller Library's automation of its' card catalog is nearly complete. The process has taken almost five years and has involved many people including students.

Back in 1986, the Miller Library first proposed a program to automate its facilities. This process involved faculty, students and library staff, as well as administration.

The first step was to get funding from the administration which occured in 1988. A consultant was hired to help guide the process. He wrote a report with suggestions as to which system would best suit the library's needs and compiled a list of six different systems.

Representatives for each system were then asked to come and give a demonstration of their system. In the winter and spring of 1989, demonstration were given to library staff, and interested students.

After all the demonstrations had been completed, the list of six was narrowed to four. At that time, the consultant came back and by the fall of 1990, sent out written requests for proposals. Each of the remaining four candidates complied and after the proposals were read, the list was narrowed to three.

With the list narrowed to three, library committee members, including Professor Cades, and Paul Bishop and interested staff visited ten colleges with one of these three systems. Site visits were to Bucknell University, Drew University, Franklin and Marchall College, Lafayette, Millersville State University, Moravian College, St. Mary's College of Maryland, Uniformed Services University, University of Maryland, and Ursinus College.

At this point, committee members sat down to decide what system was best for the Miller Library. By a unanimous decision, the committee decided to go with Innovative Innerfaces. The administration agreed and in August of this year, the contract was signed.

Throughout the whole process of automation, many students were involved. Some of these students have graduated but were a great help. These students are Jennifer Brown, Jennifer Crouch, Lionel Dyson, Marie Ensor, Dianna Holden, Kevin Holland, Karyn Iacangelo, Rose Jarboe, Karen Johnston, Amy Klamberg, Cathy Lease, Carolin Leibig, Debbie Limbrick, Beth Ann Sheppard, Melissa Sirik, Beth Speer, Mary Speer, Jennifer Trappnell and Abrah Wilberding. These students attended the free demonstrations and gave their input to library staff which aided in system selection, as well as having a castin vote in the selection.

Snickers Provides Nutty Evening of Entertainment

by Julie Greene

Snickers Comedy Club premired this past Wednesday night with a severe blow to the campus' funny bone. The Student Center had not been that packed on a weeknight in years.

Comedian Richie Minervini and Gary Valentine, from the East Side Comedy Club in New York woke students up, and then eagerly anticipating future acts at Snickers.

Special guest, Gary Valentine opened WC's new comedy club with a half-hour of material ranging from being a non-smoker because secondary smoke is cheaper to his conclusion that the Polynesian's thirteen letter alphabet must ruin their Wheel of Fortune game.

Richie Minervini, whose credits include Star Search, MTV's Half Hour Comedy Hour, and the Letterman show, had the crowd roaring with his impersonation of a woman trying to dry off in the bathroom with no toilet paper. So that's why they go in pairs.

Both comedians got the

by A. Fessler

The Gender Studies Reading Group is new to the WC campus this year. Students and faculty who gathered at the inaugural meeting on Sunday, October 6th, discussed the group's goals and outlined its schedule for the remainder of the fall term. Everyone is invited to join its Sunday afternoon discussions.

The Gender Studies Reading Group is open to all member of the campus community: students, faculty, and friends of Washington College. It encourages people of all political persuasions and from all fields of study to participate. The purpose of the group is to read and discuss, seriously but informally, in a friendly environment, issues pertaining to being male and being female, and to gender relations.

The discussions will usually be centered on an article and sometimes on a book that group members have decided to read. This Sunday, October 20, the group will turn its attention to selections from Mary Wollstonecraft's A Vindication of the Rights of Women(1792). On Sunday, November 3, two articles from The Gender Reader will provide launching-points for discussion of gender relations in contemporary American culture. On Sunday, November 17, Naomi Wolf's The Beauty Myth will be the topic; on Sunday, December 1, the focus will be on two articles from Harry Brod's The Making of Masculinities, which contains essays from disciplines such as men's studies, philosophy, psychology, sociology, history, anthropology, Black studies, biology, English literature, and gay studies. Even if you do not have time to read the background material, you are welcome to attend the Reading Group's meetings.

Copies of this week's selection are available at Professor Fessler's office door (15 Smith Hall) and on reserve at the library under the name "Gender Studies Reading Group." You can also order your own copies of articles and books by signing up in advance at groups meetings or through Professor Fessler directly. Please watch WAC for more details.

Meetings will be held at the Lit. House at 2:00 p.m.

SGA Bans Smoking in the Dining Hall

At the SGA meeting on October 8, it was decided that smoking be banned in the Dinning Hall, effective Monday, October 21.

The Dinning Hall smoking policy was tabled at the last SGA meeting and was brought up for discussion. President Kevin Kelly began by recommending that the two side wings be designated as non-smoking areas.

Senator Brooke Frank suggested that a referendum process be done, and many other senators reported that an overwhelming majority of their constituents prefered no smoking at all in the Dinning Hall. Senator Christy Albright mentioned that it would be difficult to enforce a smoking policy and that ventilation is poor in the dinning hall regardless of how much smoke there is.

Senator John Phoebus moved that smoking be banned in the Dinning Hall and after further discussion of the possibility of a referendum vote, Senator Myrus called question. At that point, a vote was taken to continue discussion and it passed.

Senator Kujawski explained that usually 35-40% participate in elections, and it was mentioned that it is more efficient if senators poll constituents themselves. Senator Skip Gibson moved for the end of discussion and the motion to ban smoking in the Dinning Hall passed with two opposing votes.

Vandalism At Cardinal Dorms

The lounge of the Cardinal Dormitories was vandalized Sunday morning at 3:00 a.m.

The vandals, after attempto break into a Cardinal dorm, proceeded to throw a brick through the window of the Lounge, destroying the window and damaging the casing of the air conditioner.

Also this weekend a rug cleaning machine disappeared from the lounge of Cardinal. The machine, worth approximately $2,000, was left in the lounge by Buildings and Grounds, which is in the process of cleaning the rugs in all the dorms. It is unknown whether the two incidents are related.

OPINION/EDITORIAL

Plug the Leaks!

Chilly Washington College students may mark October 16 as the day the heat came on. While students who live on campus are probably glad that they no longer have to huddle under layers of blankets to stay warm at night in their own rooms, the problem here is that finances, not weather, govern Washington College's policy regarding heating and air conditioning.

Air conditioners are present in dorm rooms when students arrive in August, and are removed about a month later, in mid to late September. October 15 is the traditional date for the heat to be turned on. In the spring, air conditioners are not reinstalled in the spring until finals are over and students have left for summer vacation. Buildings and Grounds tries in this manner to keep under control the amount of heat and air conditioning being used, and hence the amount of money spent on climate control. It makes sense to minimize spending in this manner, but the current state of campus heating and air conditioning is not economical in the long run.

Roughly half of the dormitiories on campus have thermostats in each room, which by extension means that roughly half do not. Many dorm rooms, in Kent and Caroline especially, become sweltering in the winter. Students frequently are forced to prop their windows open to allow freezing cold air in. Aside from negating the usefulness of the insulating cinder blocks, propping windows is the climate control equivalent of a pre-plumbing method of tossing alternately cold and boiling buckets of water into a bathtub, hoping to chance upon a suitable temperature. Haven't we advanced beyond that? If all students were able to control the temperature of their rooms, the school would wind up saving money. Many people like sleeping in a slightly chilly room, and students who set the temperature thusly would more than offset the ones who like a snugly warm room.

Another problem that many dorms face is improperly insulated windows. Take Reid Hall, for example. Reid is just plain old, and it stands to reason that the windows don't fit their frames properly anymore. Many windows have gaps big enough to drive a Volkswagon through. And though Reid does have thermostats, residents can count on having most of the accumulated heat go literally straight out the window. Even in newer dorms, the abuse that window frames go through, between putting in and tearing out air conditioners and screens all the time, is enough to make them more than a bit drafty.

Admittedly, installing thermostats in dorms that don't have them, and/or replacing or insulating all dorm windows, is a major undertaking. Over the years, however, the increased efficiency of climate control would save more money than it would cost. And as long as Washington College is still construction-happy, we might as well put that enthusiasm to work on a job that is energy-efficient and environmentally sound, as well as cost-effective.

Library Committee Members Deserve Credit

To the Editor:

It was satisfying to see the article summarizing Miller Library's plans for automation in the October 4 issue of The Elm. This year's Elm has consistently focused on matters of importance to the college community; the automation article is a good example. I must offer one addition to it, however.

Paul Bishop and I were invited to join the library committee to help assure that the automated catalog would be available on the campus computer network (it will be!). The real work, however, was done by the library staff, including librarians Tubbs, Hymes, Shoge and Hartley; and the members of the Library Committee over a six year period. In the years that I worked with them, committee members have included Professors N. Smith (chair), Tatum, Locker and Day; students Lionel Dyson, Ed Elfenbein, and Jennifer Golden, and two members of the Board of Visitors and Governors—Mary Wood and Pat Ingersoll. It is the librarians and their staff, and the members of the committee, who are bringing this project to fruition.

On another matter—one correction to the Banned Books article [Oct. 4 issue]: "the Jewish Bible" (called by Jews the Torah and Haftorah) is what Christians call the Old Testament. The Talmud is an ancient collection of commentaries on those writings.

Sincerely,
Steven Cades

Smoking is a Disgusting Habit

To the Editor:

As one that is allergic to cigarette smoke, I do not appreciate attending a social event where I become half choked and have to leave when I cannot tolerate it any longer. I also do not appreciate seeing many of our youth slowly killing themselves, while their passive smoke pollutes the air I and other non-smokers must breath.

Smoking is a dirty, rotten, disgusting habit. It makes one wrinkled and old before their time, and ultimately kills them in the end. It also causes poor circulation. It is faster, and more humane for those non-smokers around you, to stick a gun in your mouth and pull the trigger.

Smoking is a sign of a lack of intelligence and common sense. In this day and age, with all of the evidence and education concerning the unhealthy effects of smoking, there really is no excuse for young people to smoke.

I have no respect for someone who smokes, since they do not respect themselves, nor obviously their bodies. They also do not respect those non-smokers around them. For some reason, many young girls believe that smoking makes them look mature and turns a guy on. Nothing could be further from the truth.

I'm from the Midwest, where the percentage of people that smoke is much less than it is here. In the Midwest, 23% of the people smoke, while here, in what I call Jeffersonia (New York to Virginia to West Virginia), 38% of the people smoke. In the Midwest, less than 10% of those people in college smoke. Looking around at a social event at this college, the number of smokers is over 50%.

In the Midwest, laws against smoking are a lot more common and restrictive. The state legislatures of the progressive states of Wisconsin, Iowa and Minnesota, have passed resolutions, making it a major goal to make their states smoke free by the year 2000. Last May, the University of Wisconsin, effectively, banned smoking in all campus buildings. This is a jump start on the Wisconsin legislature, which is expected before the end of the year, to pass legislation banning smoking in all college and university buildings in the State of Wisconsin. This effectively includes residence halls, I proposed the law back in 1986, as a public interest lobbyist, and have lobbyed hard for it.

Another law in Wisconsin, that I lobbyed for, went into effect last January 1. This law, from what I understand, since I haven't been home, effectively bans smoking in many bars in Wisconsin. The law requires 100% smoke free exhaust systems in all bars. Since these units cost about the price of brand new Mercedes, most bars can't afford them or are not interested in installing them.

The last piece of legislation I proposed before coming

Last week's announced Campus Voices topic was tabled, pending action by the MD State Assembly regarding Gov. Schaefer's proposed budget.

Next Week's Topic:

If you were able to redesign WC's system for registering for classes, what would you pick (arena registration, etc.)?

Editorials on this topic are encouraged, and must be delivered to the Elm office in the basement of Reid or put in the mailbox in Central Services by noon on Tuesday, Oct. 21.

Weekly Absurdity

Weren't the Senate confirmation hearings for Judge Clarence Thomas absurd?

For those of you who have forgotten, the original point of contention about Thomas' appointment was that he refused to reveal his stance on the abortion issue, that during the hearings he was qualifying or even changing positions he had proclaimed earlier in his career, that he had a questionable record on matters of civil rights, and that he had only one year's experience as federal judge.

Even giving Thomas the benefit of the doubt and believing in his good intentions, there is still an enormous weight of suspicion and speculation for Thomas and the Senate to deal with. So, in a fashion that has become typical of this nation's governing bodies, the real issues were neatly sidestepped when law professor Anita Hill came forward and alleged that Thomas had sexually harassed her while she was in his employ. Thus began the saga that pre-empted Saturday morning cartoons and Saturday afternoon college football games. Over this fall weekend, unless you had cable, the Senate confirmation hearings were the only show in town, and that is exactly what all parties concerned were hoping for.

President Bush, by sticking with his chosen man, was betting even odds that he'd come out ahead. Even if Thomas had been turned down, Bush would not have been hurt as much as if the abortion issue were Thomas' downfall.

Thomas himself came out ahead because (whether he was actually innocent or guilty of the alleged harassment) his role was to act moral and responsible and offended by the allegations. He was off the hook in regards to abortion, civil rights, and the other uncertainties that had plagued his hearings.

The biggest winners of all were the Senators themselves, who got two full days of better-than-prime-time air time in front of their constituents and the nation. After these hearings, will be nothing short of criminal for those Senators to spend so much as a dime on re-election campaigns.

The big loser, of course, was the American public. In the days before the vote, Capitol Hill was swamped with calls; voters often couldn't reach their Senators to ask their position or state their own preference. And what about all of those questions the public had about Thomas' qualifications and stances on issues? They will now be answered... from his seat on the Supreme Court.

WC Student Cameraman Views Confirmation Hearings Firsthand

"I was there... but what can I tell you?"

by Geoffrey M. Nelson

I left Friday morning for the long Fall Weekend. I packed the car with laundry and my bicycle and headed towards 301, eager to get away from the hustle and bustle of Chestertown.

This weekend, however, held in store much more than the new autumn colors or brisk air. This was the weekend of the Thomas hearings. This was the weekend that sexual harassment was hammered into everyone's permanent vocabulary. And little did I know that I would witness history being made before the weekend was through.

I arrived at my house in Bethesda, just outside Washington, D. C. a little after nine o'clock in the morning. I unpacked and rested for a bit, but it was not long before I was going over my video camera to make sure all was in working order. I checked the batteries to make sure they were fresh. Did the microphone work? Did I have my headphones or did I leave them at school? For once , I remembered everything and nothing was broken. I had set a goal for myself that weekend. I was going to get into the Russell building and watch the confirmation hearings. In addition to that, I was going to film all the important events.

I called my mother at her office to tell her of my proposed adventure.

" Your going to what?"

" I'm going to get in and watch the hearings, Mom. What's the big deal?"

"There's no way you'll get in there."

" O.K. mom, I'll see you later."

The bet was on.

I drove to the Metro and took the train to Union station. After emerging from the escalator, I walked up to the Russell building. My heart began to pound slightly harder as I saw all the official government cars by the side entrance. Just then, I looked to my right and saw the most beautiful sight. Two network cameramen. The link between the real world and the television. The people that saw the whole world through a different "eye." I walked over to them like a young kid would to a famous baseball player. With cigarettes dangling out of their mouths, their marvelous cameras by their feet, they acknowledged my presence. I was in awe. I asked them how they were doing and what networks they represented. I must have looked like a complete fool standing there with my back pack, tripod, and camera case. I'm surprised they didn't offer me directions to all the interesting sights around the district. Surprisingly, they were quite polite. I told them that I hoped one day to work in television, as a cameraman. Of course they laughed and asked why in the hell I would want to do that. I told them I was there to add footage to my demo reel, to show to a perspective employer. They congratulated me on my aggressiveness as I turned to walk up the stairs and into the building.

At least the first step of my challenge was over. The guard at the front door mistook me for press and let me through without a hitch. There I was. In the middle of the rotunda. What a beautiful building! Soon, the interesting architecture was irrelevant. I unloaded my camera, popped in a tape, and looked through the viewfinder to check the focus. I began to conduct some interviews with some folks that were standing in line for the hearings.

" What is your opinion of these hearings?"

" Who do you believe?"

" What makes you say that?"

That was all of America standing in that line. Almost none of them were from the Washington area. They were all very opinionated, and at the same time, very confused.

But I was to become confused myself. The act of looking through the viewfinder of a camera is an exercise in hypnosis. Everything is black and white. Nothing seems real.

Later, I weaseled my way up to the second floor. The press floor. I was in heaven. I excused myself around all of the sound and video equipment the networks had set up in their respective corners. Everyone gave me a smile. There was an occasional cold stare, but most of the people there were hard at work, staring into small monitors, editing tape to be sent to the network affiliates. Listening intensely to pre-recorded tapes for sound bites. I had never seen so many wires in my life. I finally confided in a C-Span employee that I was not a member of the press, but a student, trying to make a video resume. He smiled and laughed and said that I was convincing but that he was unable to give me any help in obtaining a press pass. I thanked him and moved on. I was eventually stopped by a police officer and was asked to see my credentials. "Oh God," I said. "What am I going to do?" There was nothing I could do.

Lets say I was removed from the second floor.

Luckily, before I was "removed," I managed to get an interview with the vice-chairman of the EEOC, her name I cannot recall.

I was now desperate but I had not given up hope. Too make the story short, through different channels and some faxing, I obtained a press pass from NBC. I was set.

I hustled up to the second floor, dropped off my equipment at the NBC corner, and delicately walked to the door of the Senate Caucus Room. There was the same officer that had kicked me out previously. He glared at the pass around my neck and then into my eyes. I smiled. He opened the door and I entered into America's living room. It was an incredible feeling.

There was Judge Thomas and the fourteen senators in front of him. What an impressive sight! The room was huge and incredibly ornate. The ceilings were at least forty - five feet high, and everything was made of marble. "Incredible," I said to myself. "I cannot believe I'm in here." I walked over to the press side of the room and leaned on a huge marble pillar.

What were the Senators asking Judge Thomas? I couldn't tell you. What were the responses from the Judge? I don't know that either. My mind was whurring with excitement. My eyes couldn't stay on one thing. There was Andrea Mitchell from NBC. And look, Senator Kennedy is just as rosy cheeked as he is in photographs. And all the cameras! The echo of questions and answers lasting for seconds after being spoken. The beautiful green felt that covered both tables. It was all too much to take in at once.

I walked out of the room about five minutes before the committee broke for lunch. I grabbed my camera and equipment and ran downstairs to catch Thomas on tape. I broke through the line of people waiting in line and joined the other cameramen. Here came Thomas. My eye in the viewfinder, I entered another world. The importance of the issue was gone. Anita who? I knew nothing ex-

QUESTION - Do you think Judge Clarence Thomas should have been confirmed to the Supreme Court?

Sharon Bonner

Even though there were certain issues in which I did not particularly agree with Judge Thomas, my respect for him grew throughout the hearings. I was impressed with his persistence and determination not to give up because of Hill's accusations.

Kimberly Coburn

I don't agree with Judge Thomas on many issues, but Anita Hill's charges could not be proven. Both, Hill & Thomas were credible speakers, however in this case, there was no substantial evidence that Thomas harassed Hill. It's quite an accomplishment on Thomas' part to be confirmed after all this hoop-la.

In this country, you are innocent until proven guilty, and he seemed like the lesser of two evils. I think the Senate confirmed him so they wouldn't have to go through the whole process again.

I feel Thomas shouldn't have been confirmed because I feel that Anita Hill's allegations had enough substance to be true.

Although I do not necessarily agree with Thomas' views on many subjects, I did not see enough conclusive evidence in the Hill aspect of the case to warrant his denial.

I feel that Thomas has the qualifications to do the job. However,, with the sexual harassment issue looming over his head, I do not think he should have been appointed.

Thomas Confirmed to Supreme Court, 52-48

WASHINGTON, DC

The verdict is in: Clarence Thomas was confirmed as a Supreme Court justice by a Senatorial vote of 52-48, despite being charged by Anita Hill for incidents of sexual harassment which occurred a decade ago. The testimony, broadcast on television last Saturday, preempted even the cartoons in television ratings; as the nation watched and debated its views on exactly what sexual harassment consists of, what should be done about it, and why many of its victims are afraid to come forward and fight against it.

Within two years, Congress might end all financing of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, a commission set up to ferret out and end discrimination. The agency's staffing and budget have already been slashed during the past decade, and is accused of giving the country what The New York Times refers to as"little more than a display of internal squabbling between conservatives and liberals."

IRAQ

Officials returning from a nuclear inspection team that recently returned from Baghdad have disclosed that Iraq has definitely been working on producing a hydrogen bomb—a weapon even more destructive than an atomic bomb. No Lihium-6—the material needed to produce the bombs, has been found yet, but documents seized from the Iraqis detail efforts to produce kilograms of it.

The Nobel Peace Prize was awarded to Aung San Suu Kyi, an opposition leader who has been under house arrest for more than two years. Despite her house arrest, her National League for Democracy won by a landslide in the May 1990 general election. However, the Burmese junta has arrested most of its leaders and has refused to let it govern. The Burmese regime is one which the Nobel committee refers to as being a "regime characterized by brutality." As of Tuesday, Burma's state press had not reported the award and the government had made no formal response to it, although Burmese diplomats did call it interference in their international affairs.

The trial of William Kennedy Smith is set to start on October 30. The Florida woman who is accusing Smith of rape faced his lawyers for the first time on Tuesday for three days of questioning under oath. Smith's lawyers are arguing that the woman's charges against Smith are false and that she is making them because she has a psychiatric disorder due to past relationships with men and from the emotional impact of multiple abortions.

by Tanya Allen

Josephine hid behind a Lit. House picnic table, listening and shaking as Napoleon and his forces plotted ways of destroying Washington College. "This is horrible!" she said to herself, "Simply horrible! Napoleon's gone mad! He must be stopped! What am I going to do?" As she continued to watch, a mosquito flew forward and said "I say we adjourn– in favor of dinner!"

"In favor of dinner?" Napoleon said, "What's for dinner?"

"Well," the mosquito said, starting to giggle, "You know how there's a few male human-people on second-floor Caroline who own a megaphone?"

"Oh yeah– those really obnoxious males who like to hide in their rooms and peek out of their windows and use the megaphone to harass people in the crosswalk and parking lot; and who enjoy shouting degrading remarks to women walking into the neighboring dorms; and who do this at all hours of day and night– thus depriving people in the neighboring dorms of much-needed sleep?"

"Yeah, them," the cockroach said.

"They're cool!" Napoleon said. Josephine shuddered.

"Yeah," said the cockroach, "And you want to know something even cooler? Some sophomore-writer-girl with brown hair, blue eyes, a high forehead and hypoglycemia had a severe blood sugar drop, took a gun left over from Stuart Neiman, figured out which window the megaphone-people were in, aimed the gun, and wasted them. Security had been warned about the girl, but the only guard they had on duty was that really old, skinny, little one...and he couldn't get to her on time, so...lucky us! We get to feed on bloody carcass tonight!"

"Oh boy!"

"Yum yum!"

"Meeting is adjourned!" cried Napoleon, rubbing his front legs together.

Josephine gulped and quickly flew onto the porch to avoid being seen by the dispersing bugs. She crouched on the floor and shuddered some more. Suddenly she heard a "Psst!" She looked up. An aphid was sitting in a window, staring in at the people inside. "Come here!" the aphid said to her. "Check it out! Some students are having a reading of Gay and Lesbian poetry and prose!"

Josephine flew to the window. A group of 25-or-so students and teachers were sitting around the room, books of poetry in their laps, listening respectfully as one man read from Shakespeare's sonnet #116.

"Let me not to the marriage of true minds

Admit impediments; love is not love

Which alters when it alteration finds,

Or bends with the remover to remove".

"I can't believe they're all homosexual!" the aphid said in amazement, gazing at the people inside. "I thought that guy had a girlfriend– and isn't that teacher married?"

"Stupid," Josephine said, "They're not all homosexual– I'll bet many have come basically to show their support– for literature, and for their homosexual friends who have the courage to say "Hey World, I am what I am."

"...It is the star to every wand'ring bark,

Whose worth's unknown, although his highth be taken.

...Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,

But bears it out even to the edge of doom.

If this be error and upon me proved,

I never writ, nor no man ever loved."

"Aw come on, come on," the Aphid said, "Help me figure this out– which of those people do you think are gay, and which are not?" Josephine ignored the bug as she listened to a man who was making the comment that "It doesn't matter whether-or-not Shakespeare was gay– what matters is whether-or-not what he wrote was true...."

"Come on, come on," said the aphid, "Which ones are gay? Which are lesbians? What do you think?" but Josephine had already flown away from the ignorant bug, muttering, "What the hell does it matter? They're all people, aren't they?" She shook her head sadly, then screamed as suddenly she was grabbed by...NAPOLEON!

Students Organize Poetry Reading

Writer's Union Launches Ambitious Year

by Tanya Allen

The Writer's Union has launched an ambitious year with three student-organized poetry readings. The first reading of the year was a Children's Literature reading organized by Tanya Cunic. Dr. Elizabeth Baer and Professor Audrey Fessler were guest speakers. Dr. Baer opened with a reading of a few modern-day versions of fairy tales, one in which Little Red Riding Hood shot the wolf with an automatic; and then moved on to excerpts from Little Women and Harriet the Spy– two books that influenced literary history by being among the first of their times to portray non-stereotypical female characters. Other favorites were read by students, including The Five Chinese Brothers and an excerpt from Winnie the Pooh. A discussion followed, chiefly about how children today do not seem to be reading quality work, if they are reading at all.

Just-for-fun, Tanya Allen organized a "Cheezy Poetry Reading," at which Twinkies were served and excerpts read from the poetry page in Sassy Magazine; plus a passage by Erika Jong about "The Land of Fuck," and several satirical poems written by members of last year's Bad Poet's Society– who maintain that it takes talent to purposefully write a truly bad, humorous poem.

In honor of "National Coming Out Day" GALA organized a reading of Gay and Lesbian literature, which was attended by about 25 members of the student body and faculty. It is interesting to note that without homosexual writers, at least a quarter of the world's great literature would never have been written.

In general, the Writer's Union tries to hold at least one official literary event every 2 weeks; whether it be a reading, a party, or some other gathering. In addition to these, the Dead Pupa's Society meets every Wednesday night to hold midnight readings. Any sort of literature can be read during these readings, whether it be by a famous author or by the students themselves. Last year one student read a page from the phone book. Interested people should show up at the Lit. House at 11:30 pm Wednesday nights.

Concert Series Features The Peabody Trio

The 40th anniversary season of the Washington College Concert Series continues Friday, October 18th, with a performance by the Peabody Trio. This is the second of five concerts to be presented this academic year for Chestertown audiences in the College's Gibson Performing Arts Center.

As Washington College celebrates its 100th anniversary of coeducation, this concert by the young chamber music ensemble will feature a contemporary work composed by Shulamit Ran, the 1991 winner of the Pulitzer Prize for Music. Excursions, composed in 1980 for violin, cello and piano, was first performed at Brandeis University in 1982.

Born in Tel Aviv, Israel, where she received her early training, Ran came to the U.S. at the age of 14 to study piano and composition. Ran, who has performed extensively as a pianist in the U.S., Europe, Israel and elsewhere, is now professor of composition at the University of Chicago.

The Peabody Trio, winner of the 1989 Naumburg Chamber Music Award, was formed in 1986 in San Francisco and began a full-time residency at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore in 1987. The three musicians come from diverse musical backgrounds. Violinist Violaine Melancon grew up in Quebec and studied at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia and at the San Francisco Conservatory. Cellist Bonnie Thron completed two degrees at The Julliard School. She has performed as soloist with the Orpheus Chamber Ensemble and as a chamber player with Speculum Musicae. Pianist Seth Knopp studied at the New England Conservatory of Music and with Leon Fleiser. In 1983 he and his wife, Violaine Melancon, formed the Knopp-Melancon Duo, winning the USIA Artistic Ambassador Competition in 1986.

Single admission tickets for the Peabody Trio are $10 for adults; children under 18 are admitted free. The performance, sponsored by the Yale Gordon Trust, begins at 8 pm.

Victorian Scholar To Discuss Biography Of Charlotte Bronte

Christopher Ricks, a noted scholar of Victorian literature and the author of The Force of Poetry and editor of several important volumes of Victorian poetry, will lecture on E.C. Gaskell's famous biography of Charlotte Brontë, Monday, October 21 at Washington College. The lecture will be given at 8 pm in the Sophie Kerr Room of the Miller Library at the college, and is presented under the sponsorship of the Sophie Kerr Committee in honor of Washington College's celebration of its centenary of coeducation.

E.C. Gaskell's Life of Charlotte Brontë is, according to Ricks, "one of the great biographies" and is in his opinion "the greatest life of a woman written by a woman." Using the title "Charlotte Brontë, E.C. Gaskell and Disappointment," Ricks will focus on the linguistic as well as religious implications of disappointment that are reflected in Brontë's writing as well as Gaskell's biography. "The word 'disappointment' appears again and again in Brontë and in Gaskell, with profound significance. We can understand that God appoints events, but, ironically, we lack the word that describes a reaction that is opposite to disappointment." Ricks will discuss the implications of this point as they relate to Brontë's life and writings.

Christoher Ricks was educated at Oxford University, where he maintains ties as an Honorary Fellow of Balliol and Worcester Colleges. He served at Cambridge University as King Edward VII Professor of English and Chairman of the English Faculty. He has been Professor of English at Boston University since 1986, and he has been a visiting professor at the University of California at Berkeley, Smith College, and Stanford, Harvard, Wesleyan and Brandeis Universities. He is author and editor of 17 volumes including Milton's Grant Style, The Poems of Tennyson , English Drama to 1710, Matthew Arnold: Selected Criticism, Keats and Embarrassment and The New Oxford Book of Victorian Verse. He is at work on books on Samuel Beckett, T.S. Elliot and Bob Dylan, as well as a new edition of The Oxford Book of English Verse.

Volleyball Gets Red Hot After Slow Start

by Greg Coss

Two weeks ago, Washington College's volleyball team had a record of 6-9, which included disappointments in the Gettysburg Invitational and the Salisbury State Gull Classic. But now the Shorewomen's season has drastically turned around, and it started with great success in the Washington College Invitational.

WC came back home very confident for the Tournament with a timely win over Cathoic University on October 1 which really helped the Shorewomen regain momentum for their home tourney. In a match where WC knew they would be tested, playing on the road against a formidable opponent, they showed real character in edging the Cardinals, 15-11, 16-14, to pull their record up to 7-9. That weekend they would need all the confidence they could get going into a tournament where they were facing five teams capable of defeating them.

The first of the matches was against Widener, and WC came out smoking, taking the match 15-7, 16-14. Then came a very emotional victory for the Shorewomen against Scranton, 8-15, 15-13, 15-12. Then the Shorewomen fought hard for another win, this time over Gallaudet University by the scores of 15-10, 16-14.

The two losses the Shorewomen would suffer in this tournament would come at the hands of the two standouts over the weekend, Mary Washington and Wilmington. But Washington College made both of these teams sweat a little, fallling to Mary Washington 2-15, 9-15, and to Wilmington 7-15, 8-15. The Shorewomen came out of their very difficult tournament with a third place showing a 10-10 record and a lot of momentum for the coming week.

On Tuesday, October 8 the spikers continued their successful homestand at the expense of Johns Hopkins University. After taking the first game 15-11, the Shorewomen breezed in the second one, 15-4. Johns Hopkins surprised WC with its resiliency by taking the third game 11-15, but it was Washington who would take the fourth game 15-7, and subsequently the match. This was WC's third MAC (Middle Atlantic Conference) opponent, and WC's MAC record was now 2-1.

Two days later the Shorewomen took it to Swathmore, winning in three straight games, 15-13, 15-10, 15-11.

Going into the Gaullaudet Invitational last weekend, WC had thus won seven of its last nine matches with an overall record of12-11.

The Gallaudet Invitational was composed of four pools, each pool having five teams. The four best records from the pools would then represent the semifinalists of the tournament. Washington found itself in a very difficult pool. In fact, their first opponent would be Salisbury State, the same team which had knocked off WC a month earlier. Sweet revenge would be served in this one as Salisbury went down in straight games 15-12, 15-13. The Shorewomen had become the masters of pressure by this point. Of the last fourteen games they were involved in where both teams reached double figures, the Shorewomen had won thirteen.

This incredible statistic was marred somewhat in WC's second match of the pool against Methodist, when they lost the first game 10-15. But WC would rally to take the next two by 15-12, 15-11. Helping the comeback were senior Laura McClellan, (six assists, four digs, and four kills) junior Julie Dill, (7 digs and a kill) and freshman sensation Beverly Diaz (2 aces, 8 digs, 2 kills, and 2 blocks).

After finally losing a close one, falling to Gallaudet 12-15, 13-15, WC knocked off Christopher Newport 15-5, 15-12, to win their pool. Diaz contributed significantly with 10 digs and 8 kills, and the Shorewomen were into the semifinals.

Here they would run into a very strong Western Maryland Squad which would bump off Washington 13-15, 8-15. Despite McClellan's 10 kills, Theresa Sganga's 8 assists, and Diaz's 18 digs, WC was stopped, but would recover to defeat Methodist in the semifinal consolation match to earn third place for a second straight tournament.

Washington's record stands at 16-13 as of the Elm deadline, and the team is playing with a lot of confidence in going 10-4 the past two weeks. Results of this week's games will appear in next week's Elm.

Tomorrow at Cain Gynasium at 11:00 a.m. come see old faces and new when the Shorewomen play a match against alumni.

Rugby Dominates Swarthmore

by Ciaran O'Keefe

On October 6, Washington College's Football Rugby Club traveled to Swarthmore, PA to face it's second opponent of the season, Swarthmore College. The team looked mean as they walked onto the field in motley uniforms. Swarthmore College's team had similar colors, hence the mixed uniforms of Washington College (including New Zealand, Ireland, and Australia).

The game started strong with the forwards on both sides dominating the opening minutes. Very soon into the game Washington College began overpowering the opposition in their own half, finally a try being scored by Mark Renzi, who crossed the try zone (similar to America's end zone) to score four (not six) points. The extra two points were converted by Shawn Hamill, leaving the score at 6-0. Almost immeditately Swathmore received a penalty and drove the field to kick for points; now the score was 6-3.

The moment of the match occurred with a powerful run from Dave Snyder, flying by the opposing tacklers in his New Zealand shirt and diving into the try-zone to give Washington a 10-3 lead. In almost a carbon copy of what happened earlier in the match, Swarthmore converted another Washington penalty and kicked for three points to make the score 10-6.

Throughout the game Washington dominated with noticeable runs and moves from everyone on the team. The most noteworthy of those moments included Snyder's run for try, Hamill's agressive leading of the forwards, Stein's deservedly revengeful tackles and Slammer 's textbook kamikaze catch as five Swarthmore players close in on him, hungry for blood.

Despite Washington's noticeable domination, about three and a half minutes from the end of the game Swarthmore scored a try as a result of a dubious call from the referee and carelessness on the part of Washington. They failed to make the conversion and despite an incredibly aggressive ending by Washington led by Dave Brightman, Washington failed to score leaving the final score a10-10 deadlock.

Washington College left Swarthmore in high spirits, avidly recalling personal moments in the game, and with their sights set on a win on October 19th against George Washington (at Worton Park at 1:00 p.m.).

Oct. Starts Auspiciously for WC Field Hockey Team

by Greg Coss

Washington College's success in volleyball was matched by the field hockey team, which won three of its past four games since the last Elm report on them. The first of these games evened the Shorewomen's MAC record at 1-1 and had to give them a great deal of confidence in facing the rest of their MAC opponents.

On Tuesday, October1, Albright was the victim, and it's a game they'd just as soon forget. Washington completely manhandled them, 7-0. Sophomore attacker Renee Guckert registered a hat trick, senior defensiveman Jenifer Blenckstone added two and sophomores Maria Jerardi and Caroline Jensen added the other two. Brigid DeVries was only forced to make five saves as WC lifted its record to 5-4.

Then the Shorewomen registered a huge victory over a much tougher MAC opponent in Swarthmore. On the road for this one, Washington was in a defensive struggle until once again Jenifer Blenckstone came through for them. Her second half goal would prove to be the difference, along with DeVries' thirteen saves, as they held off Swarthmore, 1-0.

Following a tough home loss to Haverford which evened the Shorewomen's record at 2-2, they travelled to Frostburg State for a non-conference battle. With around eight minutes left in the second overtime Caroline Jensen scored, and Amy McCleary assisted, and the Shorewomen had themseves another big victory, improving their mark to 7-5.

The Shorewomen had a game at Johns Hopkins on Tuesday too late for the Elm deadline. Don't miss the home game against Randolph Macon tomorrow at noon.

cept that Judge Thomas was in view and it was all being recorded on my camera. I was being pushed from both sides by other cameramen, trying to get the perfect angle. Thomas quickly left the area and our taping stopped. That was it. It was over. And none of it seemed real. I reviewed the tape and watched it over again and it looked like television. It was almost like it never happened.

One of the cameramen there asked what kind of camera I had and we struck up a conversation. I asked him about his work and some of the most interesting things he had shot. He had been to the Gulf, been shot at by a crazed killer, shot explosions, and lots of world events. He seemed to become a little depressed as our conversation continued. To my surprise, he said how strange it was looking at the world through a lens. I guess my feelings of hypnosis were not felt by me alone. He went on to say how things can get to you after years.

"When filming people getting blown away doesn't bother you anymore, it's time to throw in a children's documentary somewhere," he said.

I did some more filming of Thomas and Anita and conducted some more interviews. I had the time of my life.

Through my own eyes, though, I noticed a lot of ironies in that whole circus of a hearing. Most of the people who you would think know a lot about what is going on, really don't. They are too busy writing, taping, recording, and delivering to pay close attention to the matter at hand. I couldn't remember one thing that was said inside the hearing room Friday or Saturday. There were just too many things happening at one time. Too much activity. The cameramen with their blank stares, senate staffers rushing right and left, and network reporters checking their make-up. It was a three ring circus.

After spending ten hours there on Friday, I left tired and overwhelmed. I went through the revolving doors and out into the street. I was going to meet a friend of mine at bar nearby and get off my feet for awhile. As I walked past the Capitol Building, I listened to the hearings on a pocket AM radio. The differences between the environment inside the Russell building and on First Street were like night and day. I felt like I was in a new world.

Miller Library Computerized Catalog Nearing Completion

by Karyn Iacangelo

The Miller Library is nearing the completion of computerizing its existing card catalog. This process involved library staff as well as students.

This process began in 1988, and involved comparing all the cards in the card catalog to a Database in Ohio called the On-line Computer Library Center(OCLC). Three students helped in this process by pulling cards from the existing card catalog and attaching them to the library shelf list. By the summer of 1990, 50,000 titles had been completed. All of these titles dated from 1960 to the present. The three students involved in this process were Jennifer Morgan, Colleen Blenckstone, and Sara Tubbs.

By the fall of 1990, these titles were ready to be sent to OCLC. It took about four months to ship all of this information and during this period, Ms. Judith Hymes worked on the titles dating before 1960. These titles should be ready to send by today.

Once OCLC received these first 50,000 titles, they were able to compare them to their Database. If any discrepancies were found, these items were flagged before the titles were sent back to the Miller Library. The flagged items are then reviewed by Ms. Hymes, and sent back to OCLC, and this should be done by December. After the flagged items are received by OCLC, and they are told that everything else was fine, two computer tapes will be created for all the titles the Miller Library carries.

These tapes will then be sent to a company in Pennsylvania. This company will then create a tape with references for each title, which will then be sent to California to Innovative Innerfaces, who will send the Miller Library a test Database of 20,000 titles. Miller Library staff will then review the Database and verify titles. If everything appears fine, the rest of the titles will be added to the Database.

The new Database will be located where the Card Catalog used to be. The library staff have placed signs in this location announcing that a change is coming to the Miller Library. There will also be terminals on the top and bottom floors.

"Battleline" Host Speaks at WC

by Sherry Menton

Barry Lynn, former Legislative Counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), addressed the question, "Can the Supreme Court Undo the Bill of Rights?" in a talk Tuesday sponsored by the William James Forum.

Lynn, who currently is the co-host of "Battleline", started out his speech by stating decisively that not only could the Supreme Court take away rights granted to Americans in the Bill of Rights, but that "the worst news is that it's too late to do anything about it."

Currently, about sixty percent of federal judges, and four of the nine members of the Supreme Court, were appointed by Republican Presidents Reagan and Bush, according to Lynn. This year, the Supreme Court may choose to hear four different anti-abortion test cases, and two cases that have the potential to overturn twenty-five years of desegregation of public schools. And the reason such cases can come before the Supreme Court, says Lynn, is because lower courts keep passing the cases along.

"Most judges are white men... there is a built in bias in the legal system," Lynn points

Students Take Trip to International Monetary Fund

by Stephanie Sherwell

Last Friday economic, political science, and international studies majors went to Washington D.C. to visit the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. Profesors Shad and Premo had organized the excursion for students interested in international monetary affairs.

The students visited the International Monetary Fund (IMF) where they viewed a film on the goals of the IMF. Afterwards, the students were able to talk with Bruno J. Mauprivez, a public affairs officer, on more specific points about the IMF.

The main function of the IMF is to loan money to members of the Fund who are experiencing problems meeting their financial responsibilities to other IMF members. The only condition for these loans is that the borrowing nation works to correct their economic problems for their own good and the benefit of the world.

Parking Problem Addressed by SGA

At the SGA meeting on October 15, the issue of parking along Campus Avenue was raised by Senator Emily Daignault. She reported that college boarding college students should not park on Campus Avenue, as local students board and exit along the road and parked cars impair vision which makes for a dangerous situation. Students and faculty should park in the lot near Maintenance instead and also, Kent Circle will remain closed.

Other business that was discussed included the Academic Council Meeting on October 14, to further discuss the Lilly Report. The difficulty in implementing an academic diversity requirement was noted and a letter asking them to describe the range of diversity in their material, will be distributed to faculty members.

Another allocation by the SGA was passed. The Dale Adams Heritage Club requested $150 for a dj November 8 in the Coffee House. Senator Daignault moved for the allocation and the motion passed with two abstentions.

Family Day Tomorrow

The Fall Family Day is an opportunity for new students to welcome their families to the Washington College campus and to Chestertown. It is a chance for families to begin to make new friends and to speak with members of the faculty and administration.

At 10:30 Saturday morning, there will be a presentation by Ms. Ellyn Taylor, the Director of Student Aid. This program will be held in the Norman James Theater in William Smith Hall. Ms. Taylor will help families better understand the financial aid situation at Washington College. She will be available in her office(third floor Casey Academic Center) between 1:00-3:00 o'clock to meet with parents with personal questions.

At noon, there will be a pre-luncheon reception in Hynson Lounge, where parents will have the opportunity to meet and speak with members of the faculty.

Parents and faculty are invited to join their son or daughter for a luncheon in the College Dining Hall beginning at 12:30. Meal tickets will be on sale in William Smith Hall before the morning presentation and at the entrance to the dining hall. Students on a meal plan need only present their ID.

Exchanging Tie-Dyes For Suits and Ties

Student Enviromentalists Battle Legislatures

by Melanie Yiasemide

(NSNS) On its 20th anniversary last year, Earth Day attracted huge crowds and lots of media attention. This year's celebrations, while more subdued, have seen the emergence of a more earnest variety of student environmentalists. Determined to win specific environmental reforms, these students have headed to Washington and their state legislatures to transform their Earth Day ideals into political realities.

"Tie-dye shirts and Birkenstocks aren't the flavor of the environmental movement I'm seeing in the field," says Julian Keniry, Southern Regional Coordinator for Cool It!, the student campaign of the National Wildlife Federation. "Students are willing to put on a suit and tie and play by the rules to get their administrations to take the first step."

Students Fight Observatory Planned for Arizona Forest:

Students from Arizona, North Carolina, Harvard and Yale have all joined in a campaign to preserve a forest threatened by a telescope observatory proposed by the University of Arizona. The students have worked since 1984 to convince federal lawmakers to stop the project.

Opponents of the plan to construct an observatory among 700 acres of old growth forest on Arizona's Mt. Graham say the project violates the National Environmental Protection Act (NEPA). Also threatening the rare red squirrels that live in the area, the proposal violates the Endangered Species Act (ESA), according to environmentalists.

Arizona students have written letters of protest to Sen. Dennis DeConcini (D-AZ) and Sen John McCain (R-AZ). They also have enlisted the support of students at the University of North Carolina, Harvard University and Yale University to write Rep. Walter Jones (D-NC) and Rep. Gerry Studds (D-MA), who are known to be powerful supporters of the ESA.

"This [observatory] could set a dangerous precedent," says David Hodges, a senior interdisciplinary studies major and member of Arizona's SEAC chapter. Hodges says that if the

"Always remember to hold hands and look both ways before crossing the street." -- Robert Fulghum

The view of campus afforded to residents of Reid Hall is particularly attractive – the sight of students and faculty walking up and down the Fire Lane, the smell of newly fallen leaves, the sound of screeching car brakes and the curses of student pedestrians... The Elm staff, working as we do in the basement of Reid, usually with street-side windows open to combat the broken thermometer that keeps the office at a nice even 94°, is in an excellent position to view the traffic patterns of the Rte. 213 crosswalk, and we are not thrilled with what we have seen.

Every year, complaints about the crosswalk are trotted out along with complaints about the Dining Hall food, arena registration or the lack thereof, tuition hikes, etc. ad nauseum. But these issues, old as they may seem, are brought up because year after year they are of pressing concern to the college community, so perhaps it is time to evaluate our pedestrian habits once again.

Many students tend to behave inconsiderately when crossing the crosswalk. They meander into the road without checking to see if cars are coming and without picking up their pace or acknowledging the drivers of the cars. When students have gotten out of classes and many are all heading across the road, they can hold up traffic for minutes at a time because they can't be bothered to jog a bit to catch up with the person in front of them. Those are counts against us.

Much of that behavior is arguably justified by the ill manners of drivers. If you are crossing the street while balancing books and a sick tray, drivers may still honk or yell at you to hurry up. Cars coming down the road may show no inclination to stop, forcing pedestrians to wait at the curb until they are sure they are not going to be run over. Cars speed through the crosswalk area, sometimes far exceeding even the normal posted limit of 25 mph. At the other end of the spectrum, few things are more annoying to a pedestrian than a driver who stops his car ten yards away from the crosswalk when the pedestrian is still ten yards away from the edge of the road, and then honks with impatience when the student does not quicken his pace because the car is waiting for him to cross.

Both sides have some justification to them. However, a little more leniency ought to be granted to offending parties in the interest of keeping town-gown relations amiable. Even students who have been treated badly by motorists sometimes forget to stop at the crosswalk when they themselves are the driver. Let's give drivers a chance to show their good manners by showing them ours.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacation and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammar. Letters must be signed; no anonymous letters will be printed under any circumstances. Students should include with letters their major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive by 8 P.M. Tuesday evening for publication in that week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday evening. The Business Manager is also available from 1:00 to 3:00 in the afternoon on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Letters to the Editor

Smokers Have Constitutional Rights, Too

To the Editor:

In reply to David Serles [Smoking is a Disgusting Habit, Oct. 18], I would like to express my dissatisfaction at the way Mr. Serles presented his argument. While he made valid scientific points he neglected the politics of the issue. This is a country whose roots lie in the fight for freedom of expression and right to do, say, and be as one pleases. Mr. Serles, it is you who is the ignorant party. To say that because someone smokes they are ignorant implies only the reverse. You show lack of respect for the Constitution of the United States if you believe that because something offends you it should be stopped. Who do you think you are, the King of Siam? It is attitudes like yours which keep progress from occurring.

Tobacco was the cash crop that prevented this country from being a quickly-abandoned British colony. People smoke still, and will continue to smoke no matter what anyone says to them, and do you want to know why? Because they like it! People enjoy smoking, just like they enjoy drinking, just like they enjoy breathing. Remember that if someone's personal habits do not agree with yours, you still have no right to judge. You are not GOD!

That you have had to leave social functions due to smoke is your own fault. You are fully aware that people tend to smoke in social situations, just as they tend to eat, talk and drink. You have been on this campus long enough to know the habits of the student body. For you remain oblivious enough to assume that people will not smoke at the next function you attend is asinine.

You have every right to express your displeasure at people's personal habits, but to insist that they stop is wrong. I have encountered smokers who will extinguish their cigarettes when asked politely. I certainly do not see anyone forcing you to smoke against your will. The secondary smoke cannot be avoided, but you have ultimate control over whether or not you inhale. That you categorize all smokers as rude, vile, selfish people is your own prerogative, but a distorted view at that. I know many charming, intelligent, witty smokers on this campus and would rather associate with them than with someone pompous enough to presume that his view is the only view.

Sincerely,
Tara Kidwell

American Library Association Hypocritical

Conservatives Not the Only Ones To Practice Censorship

To the Editor:

Your feature story, Banned Books Celebrated [Oct. 4], desperately requires rebuttal. The authors swallowed whole the self-congratulatory treacle of the American Library Association. Any of the books listed are easily found. In contrast, the publications which, in the view of the ALA, "should not exist," are simply made "non-retrievable," and thereby rendered beyond the reach of anyone.

Through its decisive influence on the Wilson Company, which publishes Reader's Guide, the indexing of conservative publications has been prevented, very often for many decades. There is no way for anyone to learn that these journals— or those who wrote for them— ever existed, had anything to say, or happened to be right when the received wisdom of Libthink was dead wrong.

My million-plus words in print are in the Library of Congress— but if you walked in there, you could never find them. That is what "non-retrievable" is all about. What "some people" say should not be published at all, but if published, Liberals will try (quite effectively) to "censor" them by ensuring that the material is not distributed, reviewed, referred to, preserved, or to be found in libraries.

Many years ago, I gave a subscription to one of these journals to the WC Library, but the Librarian threw it away, rather than allow students to read it. To this day, the Library is severely— and deliberately— deficient in material reflecting American conservative thought. The official reason is that the College is too poverty-stricken to afford the Washington Times! In the entire history of the Library, it has never subscribed to any periodical containing the word "conservative" in its title.

I leave open the question of whether a student who did read, reflect upon, take data from, or reveal himself to be favorably influenced by any such publication would be re-

Additions to Library Article

To the Editor:

I have been pleased by the coverage the Elm is giving the library's automation project. I think it is important for students to know what has happened and what to expect. I think it is also good for everyone to know the role students have played in the effort.

To that end I offer the following correction and additions tot he October 18 article. We would probably have been pleased to have Colleen Blenkstone work with us, but she didn't. The article should have said that Colleen Blakelock was one of the original retro crew. In addition Paul Briggs, Abrah Wilberding, Tamela Pinkney, Karla Pozo, Julia Schneid, Tarin Towers, and Monica Wilen have contributed to the conversion effort, and we appreciate them all.

Sincerely,
William J. Tubbs

Weekly Absurdity

Isn't the whole Supreme Court thing absurd? This column has dealt more than once with the serious absurdities about Clarence Thomas et. al., ad nauseum, so before the whole Thomas thing drops into quiet obscurity (and every person who has to live in this country should be hoping that he does do a quick fade!), let's take a look at the lighter side of the whole spectacle.

All of this came about because the legislature is supposed to ensure that only qualified, fairminded individuals become lifetime members of the nation's highest court. What an unfortunate phrase - it makes it sound like justices are signing up for an American Express card, or are joining the Mafia. Hmm...

As MacNelly's political cartoon (pg. 4) indicates, the witless Senators were more interested in looking pretty on national television, for all their constituents to see, than in ensuring the civil liberties of those constituents. Paul Simon's bowtie nametag is a fashion commentary that could be applied to almost every Senator involved in the confirmation process. Not one Senator raised more than a minor fuss about the fact that Thomas had only one year's experience as a federal judge, and was patently unqualified to sit on the Supreme Court on that basis alone. Heavens, no! Their opinion polls might suffer if the Senators were to actually do their jobs, and they certainly can't allow that to happen. But what happens to democracy in this country when the check doesn't want to balance? (Never mind - the deficit isn't really the point here.)

Yes, the Supreme Court is decidedly tilted to the right. So what? We've always known lawyers and politicians are a bit off-balance, haven't we? And in any case, once the American public figures out that they, as jurors, can refuse to convict "guilty" people if they think the law they are guilty of breaking is stupid, jury nullification and the sensibilities of the average American citizen will mop up the mess the Court makes.

If the lower courts may also be part of the solution as well as part of the problem. "The key to preserving individual liberties is no longer with the Supreme Court, but with individual state courts," Lynn claims.

Lynn maintains that the best approach to prevent rights from being taken away is to begin intensive lobbying of state legislatures now. He predicts that the same day that Roe vs. Wade is overturned (which he believes will happen within the next year), many state legislatures will introduce bills to restrict or abolish abortion. Then, says Lynn, it would be too late to launch a public relations campaign "to prevent the legislature from passing bad laws in the first place."

warded or penalized by the present faculty.

Here's another good question. Wouldn't any publisher relish the notion of issuing a book destined to sell between three and six million copies? Well, not if the message is disapproved of by Liberals, and intended to influence the electorate.

During the hard-fought and very interesting political campaigns of 1964, three such books were published— but they had to be privately printed! And while no student of the political scene of the time should be unaware of the effect of these books, care has been taken to ensure that they "do not exist" in your or any other library!

You used a quote by Lyndon Johnson. One of those books was about him. He didn't like it. He tried very hard to destroy the author, J. Evetts Haley, both financially and in reputation. He directed both the FBI and the IRS to lean on him to the best of their considerable abilities. So do not for one moment imagine that Lyndon Johnson believed the quote attributed to him— or that the American Library Association deplores censorship!

Yours truly,
Dr. Susan L.M. Huck

Elm Editors Wanted!

In our attempts to produce a high-quality weekly student newspaper, the Elm staff has encountered difficulties that we hope to alleviate by reorganizing the Editorial Board. Currently the burden of organizing, writing, and laying out the paper every week rests on a core staff of a half dozen people. We are gratified to hear the newspaper complimented and know that our efforts have paid off; however, more student involvement in the paper is going to be needed if we are to maintain the Elm's current standards.

You do not have to be a writer to participate in your newspaper. Campus organizations - send us press releases about your upcoming activities! Students and faculty - take advantage of our Letters column and our new Classified section! Send us suggestions - we're doing our best to provide what you want to see in the paper.

Many students showed up for the Elm's organizational meeting at the beginning of the year, and we hope they will consider applying for the positions, detailed below, that are now available. Experience is not necessary if you are willing to learn and work hard.

Our reorganization effort, specifically, is aimed at abolishing the position of Editor-in-Chief, effective next semester. Instead, the current duties of the Editor-in-Chief would be assumed by an Administrative Editor and a Managing Editor, who would share equal status on the Board.

The Administrative Editor would act as the Elm's liaison with the college community, duties to include: attending Board of Visitors and Governors meetings, Faculty meetings, SGA meetings; managing all Elm public relations and information contacts on campus; handling all Elm correspondence off campus; assisting section editors in layout; and sharing the responsibility of delivering the paper to Elkton every Thursday evening.

The Managing Editor would be responsible for overseeing the actual content of the newspaper, duties to include: directing editorial policy and writing staff editorials; coordinating the articles for each issue; copyediting articles for content and style as well as grammar; laying out the Op/Ed, Campus Voices, and Issues pages; and sharing the responsibility of delivering the paper to Elkton every Thursday evening.

It would be necessary for the Administrative and Managing editors to work closely so that, on the one hand, the Administrative editor will be able to accurately represent the Elm and serve its needs in day to day relations, and on the other hand, so the Managing editor will not be so bogged down as to be stuck writing articles and doing layout at three o'clock in the morning. Any procedural differences between the editors would be resolved by a majority vote of the Editorial Board, or by appeal to the Board of Publications if absolutely necessary.

Whether or not this restructuring is implemented depends on the response we receive. Because this is experimental, there is no application process per se. Details of the division of duties are negotiable. Anyone interested in the position of Managing Editor, which is a salaried position, should contact Sherry Menton as soon as possible. Final organization of the Board is subject to approval by the Board of Publications.

Also available for the spring semester are the Board positions of News Editor and Sports Editor. Application forms for these positions are in the mailbox on the Elm office door, in the basement of Reid Hall. Both are salaried positions and require a firm weekly commitment. Applications are due no later than November 4.

> "You do not have to be a writer to participate in your school newspaper... send us suggestions!"

Next Week's Topic:

Do you think Roe vs. Wade will be overturned by the Supreme Court before next year's Presidential election?

The Elm encourages students and staff to write us editorials about this topic. Deadline is 7 pm on Tuesday, Oct 29.

Another American Hostage Released; Natural Disasters in India and California

SYRIA

Yet another hostage has been released! On Tuesday, American mathematics professor Jesse Turner was released to the U.S. after spending more than 4 and-a-half years as a captive of Shiite Muslim kidnappers in Lebanon. Eight Western hostages still remain.

INDIA

At least 2,000 people were injured and 675 killed in an earthquake in the Himalaya foothills last Sunday. The quake destroyed some villages entirely and flattened buildings in about 500 other villages.

CALIFORNIA

About 14 people were killed in an Oakland California fire last Monday, including a family of five who died while trying to escape their home. At least 1,800 houses were destroyed. This was one of the worst fires in U.S. history.

TEXAS

Around lunchtime on Wednesday, October 16; 35-year-old George Hennard drove his pickup truck through the window of Luby's Cafeteria and began firing two semiautomatic pistols. 22 people were killed before the gunman put a bullet in his own head. This was the worst mass shooting in U.S. history since a gunman killed 21 people at a McDonalds in California in 1984.

USA

WAC is not alone: public universities and colleges in 30 states are giving their students the biggest tuition increases in eight years. This fall, average tuition and fees at four-year public institutions rose 12 percent; to $2,137 up from $1,908 in 1990-91. The typical four-year public school cost for state residents is $5,488. Total fixed charges for private schools averaged $14,403, after they too raised their rates 7 percent.

(NSNS) Most public and private schools are feeling the end of the baby boom hit with applications dropping by as much as 15 percent. According to the Department of Education, there will be only 2.5 million high school graduates in 1991, down from 2.7 million in 1990. The demographic trend is expected to continue until 1994.

"Josephine!" Napoleon cried, grabbing his girlfriend, "What are you doing here?"

"'What am I doing here?'" Josephine said weakly, "Napoleon! Don't I even merit a 'Hello?'"

"Hello." Napoleon said as it started to rain outside. "Why did you come here?"

"Come where—Do you mean why did I come to WAC, or why did I come to the Lit. House?"

"To the Lit. House," Napoleon said tersely.

"I came to the Lit. House because I was looking for you," Josephine said, "Because I was scared out of my head because I thought something horrible had happened to you because the last time I saw you you started frothing at the mouth and then disappeared and all!"

"Oh..." Napoleon said as a soaked female student stepped onto the porch.

"Goddamned rain..." the student muttered, "I HATE Maryland rain! I just tried to cross the crosswalk, and there was a stream running through it, and the stream had a current, and I got caught in the current and was swept all the way down to historic Chestertown, and none of the shops there were open, so I had to walk all-the-way back to the college, and as I walked all these gross-looking men in pick-up trucks saw me and said to each other 'Ooo! Look! That person female! We male! We have penis! We prove we male and have penis by hanging out of the window and shouting 'Woo Woo Baybeeee!' ' I HATE them! I HATE rain! And I HATE...flies."

Josephine and Napoleon shrieked and clung to each other as the woman spotted them and took a yellow flyswatter out of her pocketbook.

"Napoleon!" Josephine said as they watched the woman advance, "If we don't make it out of this alive I just want you to know...that I love you!"

"Uh, uh, uh..." Napoleon said in fright, "I...I love you too, Josephine!"

"WHAP!" went the swatter. "DIE!" screamed the woman, but the flies had flown to the side just-in-the-nick-of-time.

"Josephine!" Napoleon shouted, "If we do make it out of this alive, I want you to join my movement!"

"What movement?" Josephine shouted back as the swatter went "WHAP!" between them and the woman screamed "I'M GONNA KILL YOU! KILL YOU! KILL YOU 'TILL YOU'RE DEAD!"

"The movement..." Napoleon shouted from across the room, "To destroy WAC!"

"What? Why?" Josephine shouted back, feigning ignorance.

"Because..." Napoleon said, nimbly flying aside as the woman brandished her swatter again, howling "DIE! DIE! DIE! DIE YOU LITTLE FLY!"

"Because they destroyed the Elm!" Napoleon continued shouting, "And because they destroyed the Elm...it's only right that they themselves should be destroyed as well! Listen! It is we—the bugs of the college, who are succeeding in changing this place from being one of the friendliest campuses in the nation to one of animosity! It is we who caused the vandalism of the Cardinal dorms last week—we who whispered into the ears of the vandals while they were sleeping, subliminally prompting them to throw a brick through the window of one of the lounges; and who also prompted other vandals to steal the Cardinal rug cleaning machine! It is we who subliminally convinced the people who trashed Kent last weekend to do so; and we who persuaded three humans to steal the magic memo-board markers of the residents of first-floor Queen Anne and then use them to write obscenities all over the bathroom and hall walls! It is also we..."

"DIE, INSECT-SCUM!"

Napoleon escaped again, "It is also we," he continued, "Who whispered into President Trout's ear the brilliant idea of moving security off campus sometime soon! Ha ha ha ha ha!"

"You're crazy, Napoleon!" Josephine shouted as the swatter went "WHAP!" and missed again as the woman yelled "I'M GONNA KILL YOU IF IT'S THE LAST THING I DO, YOU LITTLE BUGGERS!"

"What do you mean, I'm crazy?" shouted back Napoleon.

"You're crazy, and evil, and rotten, and bad, and...and...and...you're crazy!" Josephine shouted back hysterically. "This is a great school—you can't destroy it!"

"Yeah, right it's a great school!" Napoleon yelled, "Name one great thing about it!"

"Well..." Josephine began, "It... EEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEK!"

"WHAP!"

"HA! I GOT ONE!" rejoiced the woman. "I KILLED A FLY! I KILLED A FLY!"

"JOSEPHIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIII-NNNNNNNNNNNE!" Napoleon screamed.

Environmentalism

Something From The Heart

Describing herself as a writer, former school teacher/ administrator, Elizabeth Buckman, the Development Officer for the Chesapeake Bay Foundation, spoke about Environmentalism, the Chesapeake Bay, the Chesapeake Bay Foundation, and the Internships available to Washington College students.

Elizabeth Buckman described environmentalism as something from the heart, something one feels and not something that is necessarily taught in a classroom. A degree in the sciences is not a requirement for being an environmentalist - William Baker, president of the Chesapeake Bay Foundation, majored in the Humanities; other senior staff members have majored in Psychology, in Theology, and in Law.

The Chesapeake Bay is a vast system that is 64,000 square miles across and approximately 15 feet deep. It is the source of the livelihood of the watermen in seven different states. The Chesapeake Bay is the largest estuary in the world. It needs to be taken care of and it belongs to each and everyone of us. The Bay needs to be protected from over-harvesting so that there are fish, crabs, and oysters left to be harvested in the next year. It needs to be sheltered from pollution which causes an increase in nutrients and eventually a decrease in fish, crabs and oysters. The Bay needs to be protected so when our children grow up they can come to the Chesapeake Bay, catch fish and eat Maryland blue crabs.

The Chesapeake Bay Foundation was founded in 1966 as a small, non-profit organization dedicated to saving the Chesapeake Bay. Since the founding of the organization, the Chesapeake Bay Foundation has implemented an Environmental Education Program, an Environmental Protection Program, and a Land Use Management Program. These programs are designed to further the understanding of the ecological impact that overharvesting, automobile emissions, sewage and chemical dumping have on the Chesapeake Bay as well as in the surrounding areas.

Washington College students have an opportunity to become involved with the Chesapeake Bay Foundation. The Washington College/ Chesapeake Bay Foundation Internships are a way of doing something for the Bay and for yourselves. These internships were founded by a Jessie Ball du Pont Fund grant to Washington College and the Chesapeake Bay Foundation for internships dealing with the Chesapeake Bay. The internships augment the McLain Program and support Washington College interest and intent to foster environmental studies. The internships are under the direction of Dr. Donald A. Munson, Chair of the Biology department and curator of the McLain Program in Environmental Studies.

The interns will be doing important work and not just sitting behind a desk - they will be out there, in the field, making a difference. There are internship opportunities in Land Use, Transportation, Marketing, Personnel, Public Relations, Publications, and many others. The internship begins in the spring semester of the junior year, where you gather all the background material, it is continued into the summer (an eight week period) where you do the bulk of the work, and is completed with the presentation of the write up in the fall semester of the senior year. These internships are available to all students in their junior year, regardless of their major.

Drama Department Presents Sophocles' Antigone

by Tarin Towers

Sophocles' Antigone is a traditional Greek tragedy with universal appeal. Director Timothy Maloney, chair of the Washington College Drama Department, feels the play could have been set in any number of historical periods. He has chosen to set the play in modern times because "It would not be hurt in any way by doing so."

The set, designed by Professor Jason Rubin, implements on-stage seating in the form of an arena, or "theatre in the round." The feeling of Ancient Greece is present in the marble-textured playing areas and furniture. Maloney says that the design serves as "an arena for the confrontation of the play's two forces," characterized by Antigone and Creon.

Jason West plays the ruler of Thebes, Creon. The central conflict is between Creon, who has demanded that Antigone's allegedly criminal brother not be buried, and Antigone herself, who wants to bury her brother. The characters in the play embody the conflict between State and Family, and all of them, as West says, "feel duty-bound to act the way they do. . .The city is war-torn, and Creon has to restore order. While Antigone feels duty-bound by her family, Creon has an obligation to the city and responsibility."

Although many who are familiar with the story of Antigone see her as the force of good and Creon as evil, West feels that this is not an accurate generalization. When he first read Antigone several years ago, he saw Creon as a "bad guy, but after working with Creon for some time, I know he's not quite the evil man." He feels that Creon sees parts of Antigone within himself, and vice versa. All the characters follow their beliefs, which they feel are right.

Maloney adds that the twentieth-centuruy translation by Arnott, which is in unrhymed verse, is exemplary of translations of Antigone. "Any translation which feels a responsibility to the language will translate Creon's lines as chauvinistic, but Greek scholars do not see Sophocles as speaking in a sexist tone. He often used women as an example of a weaker person than authority . . . equality did not exist [in Ancient Greece]." He does not want audience members siding with Antigone just because they feel it is a women's lib vs. chauvinism issue — it isn't, and both sides are equally right. Thus the cuts were made.

Members of the cast include Carey Smith in the role of Antigone, Steph Hess as Ismene, Jason West in the role of Creon, Ed Schroeder playing a Guard, Richard McKee as Haemon, Jason Imber playing Teiresias, and Alex Nader as Eurydice. Playing in the Chours are Martha Kimura, Katie Degentesh, Lisa Woodcock, Tim Madison, Gina Braden, and John McDanolds. Antigone is directed by Tim Maloney and designed by Jason Rubin, with Dale Daigle as technical director and stage managers Melanie Green and Abrah Wilberding (assistant).

Friday Night Fever

by Sara Hunt

Anybody remember how to do the hustle or the bump? Do you still get misty eyed watching Saturday Night Fever or Xanadu? Remember when the word foxy was "in"? Does anyone really miss bell bottoms and white loafers? Apparently so, because last Friday night the coffee house was swarming with people dressed in leisure suits and polyester dresses boogie-ing down to the funky beat of Donna Summer and Blondie. After all it was Disco Revival Night in the Coffee House and those who dressed up got one dollar off the admission price.

"This basically all came about because I love disco," claimed Kim Coburn who organized the event. "We'd had disco nights on the hall before, and wanted to have something like it campus wide and then I realized, as activities director of the C-house, I could actually do it!" Coburn and a rather large group of others arranged everything, including recruiting D.J. Brett Lankford.

Lankford managed to gather a surprisingly wide array of seventies music. Chris Spezio, Amy Caddle, Coburn and even Lankford's father all contributed their old albums, ranging from The Captain and Tenille to The Bee-Gees. "I did it to preserve disco," stated Lankford. "And so that every generation will be able to listen to Andy Gibb without laughing." But could it be done? Could the music of the astrology and Afro generation move the Madonna wanna-be's and Dead Heads of the eighties and nineties?

"It was funky!" seventies connoisseur Phillip Eanes exclaimed. He and his polyester-wearing date knew almost every song and taught quite a few a people how to "bump". Between 150 and 200 people came throughout the course of the evening and those who came seemed to have a blast. "I had the most I've had all year!" said Caddle. Caddle danced during every song, not even sitting out when Barry Manilow was played. The seventies revivalists grooved to the beat of "Y.M.C.A" and "Car Wash", "That's the Way (I Like It)" and "Ease on Down the Road". "People of all walks of life got up and did the hustle together. How often does that type of cooperation happen at Washington College?" Caddle asked.

Not everyone had fun. Two young men got into an argument over a girl, straight out of "Copa Cobanna." The situation was expertly diffused by Coburn. "I wish more people had come. But KA did have a party the same night," Spezio said. The remaining 800 W.C. students could not have been at KA. "I didn't go because the day's too short and the year's too long." joked Joel Brown. "And I am allergic to seventies clothes." Others were more honest. Rachel Demma admitted that she "just hates disco."

Coburn admitted "Basically, disco was a cultural embarrassment for America, but a very interesting phenomena." Disco is one of the few form of music that inspires so much loyalty and contempt and genuine amusement. The heart of the matter is, however, that no matter how silly and inane disco is and was it remains a lot of fun. So while people will still laugh at Andy Gibb- try merely mentioning his name at the next sorority function and see what happens- disco has become America's most unique cultural icon.

Volleyball Suffers Tough Loss

by Greg Coss

Despite winning twice on the road last week at St. Mary's and pushing their record to 18-13, the Shorewomen have to be pretty disappointed today. The team suffered a heartbreaking loss to Western Maryland at home nine days ago, a defeat which puts their hopes of earning an MAC playoff in serious trouble.

Washington returned to Cain Gymnasium in great shape after easily handling Hood (15-2, 15-2) and St. Mary's (16-14, 15-2). A defeat of Western Maryland would have given the Shorewomen the inside track at an at-large bid to the MAC playoffs. The top two finishers from each MAC region get automatic bids, then the at-large bid teams are selected. Washington was shooting for third place in their region with this victory, which would have left them in great shape. But it was not meant to be. A 15-12 loss in the first game took some wind out of the Shorewomen's sails, as they fell in the second game 15-5. But then the Shorewomen made an incredible rally in the third game. Seemingly down and out at 2-13, WC rallied for eleven straight points and a 14-13 lead. But they could not force a fourth game, falling 16-14.

The Shorewomen now are left hoping for a little help from others along with helping themselves. First and second place in the region will go to Gettysburg and Franklin and Marshall respectively. Third place, which would have been WC's with a win over Western Maryland, is now a stretch. The team needs Gettysburg to defeat Western Maryland, which will probably happen. The difficult part for Washington will be to defeat Franklin and Marshall, a game played yesterday which will be covered in next week's issue. If in fact Washington pulled off this upset, their conference record would be 3-2, as would Western Maryland's, but the big win over F&M might give Washington the edge for the post season berth. Regardless, the Shorewomen are favored in the Chesapeake Invitational Tournament this weekend.

Sticksters Stay Red-Hot

Although the Shorewomen have apparently come up short of their goal to reach the Middle Atlantic playoffs this year, they have been on quite a tear as of late. This includes a win and a tie in last week's play, and the tie would have been a loss were it not for Marie Mohler rising to the occasion.

After a 2-0 victory over Johns Hokins which raised the team's record to 8-5, WC returned home last Saturday to face Randolph Macon. Mohler kept the Shorewomen's momentum going by scoring unassisted with twenty minutes left in the first half. Macon retaliated with their first of two late half tallies, this one coming with only five minutes remaining in the half to even the score at one. Although the Shorewomen were narrowly outshot in the half, Randolph Macon had the better scoring opportunities. WC forced the Macon goalie to make only two saves compared to the eight which Washington's netminder Brigid DeVries had thrown her way.

But Mohler would come through again for Washington, scoring a second unassisted goal with around seven minutes remaining in the game. The lead would be short-lived, however, as Randolph Macon's offensive pressure finally paid off with a goal to tie the game at two with only four minutes remaining.

This equalizing goal seemed to upset the Shorewomen, who completely dominated the overtime period. They outshot their opponents 11-2 over the two extra periods but were unable to put one home, and the game ended in a tie, leaving the Shorewomen at 8-5-1.

Washington is 4-1-1 over its last six games and is ready to finish off this season on a continued winning note. Next week's issue will include the results of their away game on Tuesday against Widener which was too late for the Elm deadline. It also will cover their final game of the season, a home match against Western Maryland tomorrow at 1:00 p.m. Come see the sticksters in action one last time. Despite the fact that there season will end tomorrow it's been another successful season for the team and you can send them away in grand style by being one of the 850 students who will show up.

Most Excellent Stuff

By Ciarbo "Big Bad MoFo British Bulldog" O'Kieffe

On Saturday, October 19th at Worton Park, the battle of the Washingtonians took place. Washington College faced George Washington University in the second home match of the Shoremen's season. Washington College was anxious to give their crowd a game to remember.

The opening of the game promised this with the forwards advancing over the opponents after the scrum broke up. With an impressive start it was surprising to see GW score almost immediately with a penalty conversion. The first half contained great rugby with both sides battling it out. George Washington scored two tries but the moment of the match was when Anthony Black scrambled past his tacklers and then ran magestically through the try zone, finger pointing at the crowd and above, finally placing the ball down behind the goal to put Washington College on the scoreboard. The conversion was made by Sean Hamill. The second half saw George Washington leap ahead, the gap lessened by "ICE" who took an impressive solo blinding run and then dove for Washington's second try. Sean again converted, kicking the ball from a difficult corner position. The backs and forwards held George Washington throughout the game but due to three escaping runs by their swift winger the game finished with George Washington winning 22-12.

Morale was not lost when a second game was arranged which included players that had just played for eighty minutes, and several novices (who had only played one game previously) who displayed new talent for the club. The game was just as tough and well-fought as the first game but this time a superb try, sneaked in by Mark Renzi, kept the punter happy and left the final score at 4-0 to Washington College.

Injury medals are given to Christopher R., who fell at the beginning of the first game then recovered to play in the second game, and to Dave Snyder whose aggressive play was missed when he was escorted off the field in the second game.

A special thank you from the Rugby Club for all the people who turned up to show their support. (Ciaran: thanks for saving my this week. You're not so bad for a British dude: Greg.)

Soccer still struggling

by Chris Vaughn

It was another weary weekend here on Kibler as fans saw the Shoremen drop their record to 0-11-1 with two losses on their record.

Their hope, as it has been all season, was to try and come away with their first win. But, as expected, they were denied yet once again.

The first foe they faced was Golden Beacom College. WAC began play with high spirits as they tied the boys of Beacom at 1-1 by a strike from Chris Esther Graham, assisted by John Shanahan. But to no avail, WC was left behind with a final of 3-1 glaring them in the face. "We had good ball movement and opportunities but the luck for us kept going bad," said senior co-captain "Sparky" Anderson.

On top of this, the Shoremen dropped their Alumni game by a score of 5-0. Whether a real part of the season or not, the loss seemed to be a climax of a very difficult season.

The season is coming to an end now so don't miss any of the final games as one of them may be the win they are looking for. They still have two games left here on the Kibby on Saturday November 2 at 1:30 versus MAC powerhouse Johns Hopkins and Tuesday November 5 at 3:00 versus Delaware Valley. Be there! (Thanks for all the help Chris. Ya know, I think you're swell - Greg)

by Greg Coss (22-15 in pro picks with points)

2 reasons why the Redskins will end a six game losing streak to the Giants are, in my opinion, the absence of former Giants coach Bill Parcells and Phil Simms, the quarterback who seems to find a way to beat the Redskins every time. Hostetler has never faced Washington and new coach Rey Handley doesn't know the Redskins' system like Parcells did. Look for the Skins to take it in a very close, come from behind 27-23 victory.

university succeeds, then it has shown that "it just has to come up with the money to lobby Congress and it'll get around the act."

Steve Emerine, University of Arizona Associate Director of Public Information, defends the plan, stating that several artificial structures already exist on Mt. Graham, including a bible camp, log cabins and camping grounds. "I am optimistic that the project is going to be stopped," says Hodges. "There are students out there who are concerned enough to do something about it."

Florida Students Work for Bottle Bill:

In an effort to increase recycling in their state and save resources, hundreds of Florida students are writing letters, lobbying and signing petitions to pass legislation to put a five-cent deposit on cans and bottles sold in the state.

Students of the Florida Public Interest Research Group (PIRG) organized a drive in January and February that gathered approximately 1,800 letters urging Gov. Lawton Chiles and state legislators to support the "Bottle Bill." Students from Florida State University, the University of South Florida and Florida International University were among the campuses that took part in the drive.

The Bottle Bill's proponents say the legislation would promote recycling and reduction of trash by encouraging consumers to return containers to redeem their nickels. Nine states currently have Bottle Bills, but the legislation has been introduced unsuccessfully in the Florida Legislature for fourteen consecutive years.

"Our main effort with the Bottle Bill is to have an effective means of recycling on the books," says Mike Brustad, Florida PIRG's organizing director. "But the retail and beverage industries have consistently fought it – they don't want to be told they have to recycle."

from member nations. The United States is its greatest supplier; therefore, it has more voting power. The IMF is considered a "last resort" for needy nations.

The students' afternoon agenda included a trip to the World Bank, a sister organization to the IMF. After watching another film, which explained the purposes of the World Bank, the students heard a talk on the policies of Latin American countries in regard to the World Bank. The next report, given by the chief economist for Southeast Asia, Dr. Aragwala, was on the World Bank's involvement in Asian countries and what effects it has had on their economies.

A popular topic the students wanted to discuss with all the lecturers was the IMF and World Bank's policies toward the issue of environmental harm in relation to economic growth. Dr. Aragwala informed the group that the World Bank can advise countries as to what would benefit their economy and the ill effects of certain policies, but they cannot force their members to adopt environmentally conscious policies.

The World Bank "exists to enhance the quality of hundreds of millions of individual human lives." The Bank consists of four different agencies. The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development loans money at the market rate and gives training and technical advise to developing countries. The International Development Association provides poor countries with interest-free loans and technical advice. The International Finance Corporation works with investors interested in private sector enterprises in foreign countries. The Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency was recently created to protect investments in developing countries.

More Students Stressed Out, Survey Shows

(CPS) – Significantly larger numbers of college students are seeking counseling for depression, stress, eating disorders, and substance abuse at a time when schools are cutting back mental health services, says a University of Florida psychologist.

Eighty-five percent of directors of college counseling centers throughout the nation reported an increase in serious psychological problems among college students in the past 10 years, said James Archer, who has written a new book called "Counseling College Students."

"I'd say it's a significant increase, and it's been steady," said Archer, director of the counseling center at the University of Florida.

The type of disorders treated at the centers ranged from counseling for depression, stress, alcohol and drug addiction to problems stemming from physical, mental, and sexual abuse. College students also are susceptible to loneliness, feelings of alienation and pressures to get good grades and jobs.

"It's not as easy as 10 to 15 years ago to get a job with a college degree," he said.

Being away from home, students also may discover for the first time that they have difficulties relating to their peers or professors because they come from abusive families.

Archer said it was difficult to tell whether the disorders are actually increasing or whether students are more willing to seek counseling because such problems are more openly discussed. The result is the same: More students are turning to counseling centers for help.

Most colleges are cutting health services, including counseling, for lack of funding. In tight budget years, "services to students are cut at a greater rate than academic programs. Counseling and mental treatment centers get cut to a greater degree," Archer said.

That was why Archer said he decided to write the counseling book, which focuses on way that college faculty and staff can help pinpoint troubled students and talk with them or refer the ones with serious problems to professional counselors.

The idea is early detection to prevent despondent students from turning to suicide, alcoholism or drug addiction, Archer said.

New Yorker Writer Gives Alternative Look at Colombus

Poet and New Yorker staff writer Alastair Reid offered an alternative, irreverent view of the impact of Christopher Columbus' "discovery of America" in a lecture in the Sophie Kerr room yesterday.

Reid's lecture, sponsored by the Lecture Committee of Washington College, was titled "Waiting for Columbus." In this 500th anniversary of Columbus' first voyage across the Atlantic, Reid discussed Columbus' "invasion" of the Americas as the supreme example of European imperialism and disregard for indigenous cultures, rather than celebrating Columbus as a pioneer and humanitarian.

Reid's particular interest in Columbus' voyages began when he was living in the Dominican Republic, near the probable site of one of Columbus' first landings. Struck by the irony of the poverty of the Hispanic people living in the region, Reid began to see that the European incursion on the "New World" was a destructive and not a beneficial one.

Alastair Reid has appeared twice before at Washington College, to give readings of his poetry and his translations of the poetry of Pablo Neruda and Jorge Luis Borges. He is the

by Karyn Iacangelo

On October 28, Sane/Freeze hosted a lecture given by Peter Deccy, a member of the National Office of Sane/Freeze. His lecture was titled "Problems With Peace in the 90's," and focused on the Busch administration, economic conversion, the defense budget, and Arms trade around the nation.

Members of the Washington College Sane/Freeze Organization will be attending "The International Working Conference on the Arms Trade," in New York City on October 31. The conference will run until November 2, and will feature talks by well known members of the U.N., as well as members of the National Sane/Freeze Organization. These talks will be given at the United Nations and the Riverside Church. The vision underlying the conference is a world without war. They will be discussing current proposals to monitor, to control and to reduce the global production and transfer of arms and examine the obstacles which prohibit the implementation of a global arms restraint system. Some of the speakers include, Rev. William Sloane Coffin, President Emeritus-SANE/FREEZE, and Abdul Aziz Said, American University, Washington D.C.

"Sane/Freeze," is a new organization that has come to the Washington College Campus this year, and was founded by Anne Veiga. This organization is a grass-roots-based national organization which is concerned with environmental peace and nuclear disarmament. It is the only environmental peace organization with a voice in the United Nations(U.N.).

One issue that Sane/Freeze members have fought hard for is the Peace Economy Campaign. Sane/Freeze called for the transition from a Cold War economy to one based on

Self-Defense Class Responds to Student Safety Needs

Almost every woman in this college has walked alone somewhere, whether it be on or off campus or even in any hometown. Most women do not recognize the danger that they could be in. Many women take the attitude that nothing will happen to them, but it can! Women need to be aware of the dangers around them and the harm that men can inflict, whether it be assault, rape, or even murder.

On Saturday, October 19, the first of a two part self defense class was held in the Norman James Theater. Duane Dieter, a very charismatic individual, was introduced to the few that attended as an accomplished martial artist with nine black belts. He discussed possible dangerous situations women could be involved in and demonstrated escape techniques. Mr. Dieter is the director and chief instructor of Dieter's Academy of Martial Arts located in Easton and Cambridge. He has helped one Washington College student regain self-confidence and fortitude after being raped last May. During the two hour session held on Saturday, Mr. Dieter discussed basic techniques and the advantages and disadvantages of certain weapons.

This past Saturday, October 26 at 1:00 pm in the Cain Gymnasium, Mr. Dieter and students of his academy demonstrated escape maneuvers, hitting techniques, and worked with individuals so they would feel comfortable applying them. The class was beneficial to all that attended because becoming aware of possible danger and learning what precautions to take are the best modes of self-defense. Another session will be offered in the Spring if there is sufficient funding and attendance is encouraged.

OPINION/EDITORIAL

Have You Seen Him Lately?

Larry Agran

Do you recognize this face? As one of the many relatively unknown Democratic Presidential candidates, he ought to be carrying the American Express card so he'll be treated like a President wherever he goes. The point isn't whether you recognize him, but that you, as part of the Washington College or greater Chestertown community, had the chance to meet Larry Agran this past Saturday at a coffee social in the Casey Academic Resource Center.

Hadn't heard of the coffee social? That's not surprising, very few students did. A handful of flyers announcing Agran's visit were posted in the Dining Hall and Bill Smith and the CAC only one day ahead of time. The opportunity to meet a Presidential candidate doesn't come along every day, and even were he not to receive the Presidency, or the nomination even, Agran is still an important figure on the political scene, and well worth getting up before noon to see.

That no press release informed the Elm of Agran's visit is admittedly a part of why we are upset about the lack of advertising, but it is not the major reason. The nation's highest political office is a matter of interest to everybody. Many students would probably have liked to attend the coffee social, but didn't hear about it because of the low key, last minute publicity. If Mr. Agran's visit to Washington College was scheduled at the last minute, leaving no time for a publicity campaign, perhaps a brief announcement could have been made in the Dining Hall to inform students who do not habitually check the notice boards.

One of the things that Washington College believes is an important component of a liberal education is out-of-classroom experiences. It is unfortunate that students were not given a real chance to take advantage of this unique chance to learn more about America's politics and politicians.

Letters to the Editor

Fine for "Mandatory" Date Rape Talk Discriminatory

To the Editor:

I am being subjected to a preposterous injustice and I don't want others to "quietly" accept it happening to them! Two weeks ago, a poster was erected in my hall (Minta Martin 2nd floor) stating that on October 17th there would be a mandatory meeting for all female students that attended Washington College, and any men who felt like coming, considering the subject of date rape. Being anti-social, uninterested, in addition to having planned the night as a study session for a major test I had the following day, I ignored the sign. On October 23, I received a fine in the mail, demanding that I pay money for missing this meeting. I have two major problems with this.

First of all, having just paid the first half of the 17,000+ a year tuition, I find it absurd that this educational facility demands more money from me for not attending an extracurricular activity of private interest. Having paid this exorbitant amount, I find that all I really have to do is eat at the Dining Stall, defecate, attain A's, and die. This facility has no right whatsoever to demand me to attend any meeting which is not directly related to either my academic performance, financial state, or disciplinary action that is to be taken against me.

My second problem with this is that not everyone has to pay this absurd fine. After having spoken to many girls about campus, a great deal of them who decided not to attend the meeting did not get fined. In addition, this fine is highly discriminatory. Why was attendance not mandatory for men? Could you imagine the laughter, and then the anger they would express after being fined for not attending such a meeting? It also seems a pertinent point that no rapes (to my knowledge) occur on this campus perpetrated by women- so wouldn't it have been more logical to make it a men's meeting, anyways?

I am not paying my fine and I certainly hope any others who received such a ridiculous demand make their anger known. If the college has construed this as "an undercover" lucrative process, maybe they should have thought twice before purchasing the 1/4 acre of Kentucky Blue Grass tat now fills our student parking areas. Act now or your parents could find a mysterious unnamed bill, called "Miscellaneous Additional Charges"!!

Sincerely,
Christabel Garcia-Zamor

Hands Out's Painting Praised

To the Editor:

This is an open letter of thanks to the thirty students of the Washington College Hands Out Program who volunteered their time last Saturday to paint the Pump House at Easter Seal Camp Fairlee Manor.

Their good work will help us to stretch our maintenance budget farther and ultimately contributes to our ability to serve children and adults with disabilities.

Thanks to the students and to Washington College for fostering this program which does such good work in Kent County!

Sincerely,
Johnson Fortenbaugh, Jr.

A Response To Tara Kidwell Concerning Smoking

To the Editor:

This is a reply to Tara Kidwell's letter to the editor [Oct. 25], which was a reply to my letter to the editor entitled "Smoking is a Disgusting Habit" [Oct. 18].

From a political point, I have no problems and agree that smokers have a right to smoke, as part of freedom of expression. Smokers have a right to smoke, as well as the right to kill themselves by smoking. You don't have the right to take me with you, though. The problem is that your right clashes with my right, as well as the right of others, not to have to breath [sic] your second hand cigarette smoke. Your smoke endangers our lives. The Supreme Court, years ago (when they still commanded some respect, before Reagan and Bust started stacking it with their cronies), ruled that health and safety does overrule some examples of freedom of expression. The specific example cited by the court was shouting "fire" in a theatre. Our case is no different.

One of the greatest national embarrassments and acts of stupidity, is the federal government subsidizing tobacco growers. I have and I will continue to challenge this. The federal government spends millions of dollars every year to help tobacco growers stay in business. It spends millions of more dollars to educate people on the evils of tobacco. This tobacco growers handout must end.

I have just as much of a right attend [sic] social events on this campus as you do. I shouldn't have to leave a social function because of cigarette smoke. I don't leave social functions because I want to, but because I have to. I'm fully aware that many people do smoke at social events, and I do not have to like it. This is why i [sic] expressed my opinion on the matter in the form of a letter to the editor. One thing that would relieve this problem is if the Coffee House had proper ventilation. In fact, it really has no ventilation, except opening the doors.

Although it would be nice if smokers would stop smoking period, but [sic] that was not what I'm asking. I was expressing my opinion, exercising my rights and indicating the situation in the Coffee House concerning cigarette smoke is not acceptable to me and other people. I was also in [sic] expressing my personal opinion of cigarette smoking as more of

Isn't it absurd that our commendably over-efficient Groundskeeping staff doesn't let us enjoy the beauty of fall?

I refer, of course, to leaves. Even with the loss of the elm tree, there remains an abundance of trees on this campus, and the spectacle as they stopped photosynthesizing and turned colors was truly lovely. Even yours truly, sunk in concerns about midterm grades and term paper proposals and when are those inter-library loan books coming in anyway, still was struck by how pretty the campus looked, bestrewn with rainbow leaves. If you were equally preoccupied, drop by the Admissions office and take a look at the new brochures, which seem to all feature pictures of the campus in the fall.

Many people have childhood memories of raking leaves, which wasn't much fun, and of jumping in the piles thusly created and having colossal leaf-fights, which was a lot of fun. But as soon as a significant number of leaves had fallen – I mean enough to completely cover the ground you walk on, not just scattered leaves occasionally crackling crisply underfoot – the Groundskeepers showed up with their giant leaf-sucking machines to sweep away all that potential fun.

Now, with so many trees around, it is completely understandable that you have to work quickly and constantly to keep pace with or stay ahead of the stuff that's constantly falling. (Come to think of it, that's a lesson that DC snowplows really need to learn!) But wouldn't it be nice if we could arrange to not pick up the leaves from some area of campus, a portion of Bill Smith lawn maybe, and then have a great big leaf fight? That would a great way to relieve stress, and much more energetic and not nearly as expensive as getting drunk and tossing desks out of windows!

CAMPUS VOICES

QUESTION - Do you think that Roe vs. Wade will be overturned before the next Presidential election?

Andrea Nolan
Columbia, MD
Freshman

I hope not. We have to try th retain some sort of individual freedom. If it is overturned we will just have to fight back. But then again, 5 out of the 9 justices are Reagan/Bush appointees and the counry is already going to pot as far as freedom is concerned.

Elanor K. Shriver
Glyndon, MD
Junior

I should hope not! It should be up to the individual. It would be unfair to allow a people on the Supreme Corut to change this right women have earned.

Amy Osborne
Marietta, OH
Sophomore

I hope not but I think it will. It is an issue that will br brought up in the very near future and if the Republicans maintain their power it will be overturned. However, they must also think how George will be affected in the next election.

Harry Charles Rienholt
Baltimore, MD
Sophomore

Well, I would have to answer that with a "no." If it is overturned it would be a terrible, terrible mistake.

Tina Dayhoff
New Windsor, MD
Junior

If they do, it'll be the biggest mistake the government has ever made. But then again, we're talking about the Bush administration, so anything that restrictive is bound to get support.

Spence Lack

In the immortal words of the great prophet Benjamin T. Hinkle, it's a taste fish... I've nothing against it.

Why Roe vs. Wade Should be Overturned

by Sherry Menton

In the next year, there will be at least four chances for the Supreme Court to decide to hear or not hear abortion rights cases. Aside from the much-publicized Pennsylvania case, additional cases have been passed along to the Supreme Court from Utah, Louisiana, and Guam. So sooner, rather than later, a case will be heard, and the vote will surely counter the Roe vs. Wade decision.

Amy Osborne makes an interesting point in her response to Campus Voices, when she suggests that the members of the Supreme Court might take into account the impact that their decision would have on George Bush's reelection campaign. Perhaps I'm more cynical, but I hadn't before considered the possibility that they would do that because, as lifetime appointees, they no longer need to care about what George Bush thinks of them.

Why, then, should Roe vs. Wade be overturned? Whatever your personal beliefs on the abortion issue (and by now all the arguments are so old that everyone pretty much knows what their beliefs are), you should support the abolition of Roe vs. Wade on the grounds that no governmental agency, be it legislative or judicial, local or national, has the right to interfere in the treatment of a patient by a doctor.

Now, I realize that this broad wording also includes euthenasia, experimental treatments, and other illegal medical practices, but abortion is a different matter. Any law touching on abortion rights is, by nature, unconstitutional. Euthenasia laws and the like are designed to protect the rights of citizens of the United States. A developing fetus is not a citizen. It cannot vote. (On that basis alone, the legislators should lose interest in the abortion matter, since the fetus isn't going to vote for or against them.)

It would indeed, as the students above expressed, be a great tragedy for Roe vs. Wade to be replaced by anti-abortion rulings. It would be an even greater victory for Roe vs. Wade to be replaced by nothing at all.

Wanted: Editor-in-Chief

by Sherry Menton

Since the offer made in last week's Elm for a co-editorship garnered no response, I am forced to say that I will be resigning as Editor-in-Chief of the Elm at the end of this semester. Academic considerations have made it necessary for me to take this step, since it would be impossible for me to spend any less time on the Elm and still produce the sort of high-quality newspaper that Washington College is coming to expect.

Besides myself, the News and Arts editors are leaving for similar reasons, and the Sports editor is graduating. Applications for section editorships are available outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall. The application form gives the due date as Nov. 4, but all applications will be held over until a new Editor-in-Chief is chosen, so that person can select his own staff.

Position descriptions for the section editorships have appeared previously in the Elm (basically, overseeing articles for that section and laying out the section's pages are the primary responsibilities), but I would like to briefly list the duties of the Editor-in-Chief, so that interested students will have a better idea of what they are applying for.

The Editor-in-Chief has editorial control over the paper, including the right to provide the staff editorial of the week (or, less often, to delegate this to someone else) and the right to make the final decision of what gets printed and what doesn't. The Editor-in-Chief oversees or delegates the assigning, proofing, and copyediting of all articles, and is responsible for the layout of the op/ed pages. Basically, the Editor has the right to organize the nitty-gritty, weekly management of the paper however he or she desires.

Other benefits of being the Editor-in-Chief include a standing invitation to monthly faculty meetings and obligatory attendance at quarterly meetings of the Board of Visitors and Governors. If female, the Editor-in-Chief has the option of taking (along with a roomate) the first floor Reid apartment, traditionally reserved for the Elm Editor. A monthly salary of $200, plus extra for layout pages and photos, accompanies the position.

To apply for the position of Editor-in- Chief, just send a letter expressing your interest to Prof. DeProspo, Chairman of the Board of Publications, by November 15.

I will be happy to answer any questions applicants have about the responsibilities of the Editor. Whoever is chosen Editor will be trained for at least one issue of the paper this semester, and I will freely offer my assistance in training section editors once they are chosen. I am willing to help with miscellaneous duties on the Elm next semester, but only if I am so asked by the new Editor.

The Board of Publications is now accepting applications for

Editor-in-Chief of the Elm

for the Spring Semester.

A letter indicating your interest in the position should be sent to Prof. DeProspo,
Chairman of the Board of Publications.

The deadline is November 15.

Next Week's Topic:

Do you think that relocating their offices off-campus will have any impact on Security's services to the campus?

Editorials on this topic are welcome.
They can be sent to the Elm through campus mail, Quickmail, or dropped off in the basement of Reid Hall.
The deadline is Tuesday, November 5, at 9 pm.

ARTS & ENTERTAINMENT

Dire Straits Falls Short Of Reputation

by Raph Koster

Dire Straits
On Every Street
Warner Bros. Records
Produced by Mark Knopfler and Dire Straits

The return of any band that once laid claim to the title of most popular in the world is probably something to be feared. If the Beatles managed to have a reunion critics and listeners alike would be scared stiff to judge the quality of the music they produced. Almost inevitably, the reunion of a band whose members have ranged far and wide is somewhat disappointing. Think of the Stones, who were as noisy as ever but not interesting. Of Genesis; actually, it would be better to not even think of Invisible Touch.. Of Yes, who with their last two (three, if you count the overblown Anderson, Bruford, Wakeman and Howe) albums have given every sign of sliding deeper into a mire of two-thirds pop, one-third pretentiousness. The results seem always to be a patchwork, lacking in cohesiveness, in craft, in commitment.

Well, way back in the year of We Are the World (remember that?) Dire Straits was the most popular group in the world. They had three number one singles under their belt, a number one album, Brothers in Arms, with accompanying sellout tour, and a slew of Grammy nominations, which they all lost to Quincy Jones and Michael Jackson. Their album well deserved the praise— from the sticky "Walk of Life" to the rowdy and sly "Money for Nothing" to the far superior "The Man's Too Strong" and the title track, it was an entertaining, smooth, occasionally loud and even socially conscious album. Then Dire Straits vanished. We saw leader/ singer/songwriter/guitarist Mark Knopfler flirt with soundtrack scoring (The Princess Bride) and with country/ folk blues (the wonderfully mellow Notting Hillbillies, and Neck and Neck recorded with Chet Atkins). Now they're back.

Well, you know there's a problem when half the review dwells on past glories. The influence of the country is clear, on tracks like "When It Comes to You" where it works, and on tracks like "Ticket to Heaven" where it doesn't. In fact, can we ignore the fact that this song exists? Even standout tracks only deserve the tags "clever and catchy." There are no blistering solos on this album— instead, everything seems almost quietly tasteful. Basically, the album never catches fire.

This is not to say that there aren't high points. There's a wonderful lounge blues, "Fade to Black." There are plenty of mellow, relaxing melodies framed with exquisite guitar solos. But somehow even the rowdier songs, like "Heavy Fuel" and "The Bug" seem mellow and quiet. And the few moments of acerbity— like "that's a musical doorbell, it don't ring, I ain't kiddin'/ it plays America the Beautiful and ties a yellow ribbon" from "My Parties"— don't make up for the lack of energy in the rest of the album.

If you're a diehard Dire Straits fan, an admirer of Knopfler's sure touch on a guitar, or in a relaxed mood, check out On Every Street. But if you liked "Money for Nothing", you'd probably be better off trying the greatest hits compilation and maybe asking a friend to dub off two or three songs from this album. The full package, despite its twelve songs, just sounds a little thin. You end up by wishing that Knopfler remembered where the distortion knob was on his amp.

Drama Department Presents A Dream Play

by Cindy Young

The latest drama production is A Dream Play, by August Strindberg. As the title suggests, this is not your ordinary play. According to Director Dei Riegal, it is "largely incoherent, but follows a logical form within a dream."

It tells the story of the daughter of a god who comes to earth and becomes involved with the lives of people undergoing painful events. The people in the play are looking for something to make them happy, but they are looking for something outside of themselves, and this does not satisfy them. The daughter has come to tell them they can become happy and liberated like her, if only they let go of everything and look for happiness within themselves.

"It's a hard play to direct," said Riegal, as A Dream Play is essentially Strindberg's autobiography in play form. It contains a lot of symbolism, but is also funny and philosophical. The set is done in black and white, quickly painted, to reflect the idea of the play that the world was better before a copy was made, and that we are living the copy and the original is somewhere else.

Members of the cast include Tanya Cunic, Rachel Demma, Melanie Green, Stephanie Hess, Jason Imber, Tim Madison, Richard McKee, Cleo Patterson, Chris Rommel, Ed Schroeder, Roxanne Schubert, Carey Smith, Tony Squires and Abrah Wilberding. Tarin Towers is the stage manager and the play is directed by Dei Riegal.

A Dream Play will be performed on November 7-9 in Phoebes under the stage in Tawes Theater. Reservations are required (ext. 269).

Bermuda Revisited

As Washington College students embark to this mysterious and primitive isle, feelings of uneasiness ran through their minds while they enter the Bermuda zone. Their anxieties are set aside when they see the tranquil turquoise waters, clear blue skies, and Dr. Munson waiting eagerly for them to get through customs (well, then again, not all their anxieties - they are graded).

This trip is the lab component for one of the sections of the Society, Ecology, and the Chesapeake Bay course, Biology 200 which is offered in the Spring semester each year. Students spend 7-10 days in Bermuda at the Bermuda Biological Station for Research exploring the coral reef ecology.

Amidst all the fun and the folly, students are required to gain some knowledgeable insight about Bermuda and its coral reefs. Students are lectured to by various members of the Bermuda Biological Station community and by Dr. Munson. The lecture topics range from Bermudian geology to subtropical marine environment.and include mangrove swamps, corals and coral reef fishes, fauna and flora of Bermuda, and plankton dynamics.

Everyone should be reminded that suntan lotion (waterproof) is a requirement for this trip. Most of the daytime is spent in the field (water) and some in the lab. Students snorkel in many different locations including Ferry Point, Nonsuch Island, South Beach, Harrington Sound, and North Rock. In the lab, students entertain themselves by identifying basic structures and functions of corals, tunicates, sea cucumbers, and various other specimens collected at the various field sites.

If you are interested in going this year, Dr. Munson will be talking on Monday, November 4, at 7:30 in the Dunning Lecture Hall about the course. This course is open to any interested student.

A belated apology to the K.A.s: the author did not intend the Josephine column of September 27 to implicate that any member of K.A. are rapists--the moth mentioned was supposed to represent a basic generic moth at a basic generic party. Since the Josephine satires are usually set at specific places on campus, and since K.A. gives some of the most visible campus parties, the author chose to situate the story at Middle Hall. The author also wishes to apologize in advance to any Lit. House people who might think that, since Napoleon's forces are having their meetings at the Lit. House, the author is implying that all Lit. House people are anarchists and want to see the end of WAC. Another apology to anyone named Josephine, or Brenda, or Charlie, or Napoleon, who are upset that the author is using their names in this coloumn. Additional apologies to other sensitive individuals who are over-identifying with bugs.

Does Tuition cover travel expenses to Security?

by Jason Truax and Kris Wallenberg

What is a vacation? What is the purpose of security? These are probably the two most asked questions for any student attending Washington College. They are also the necessities of college life - a vacation and a feeling of security.

What is a vacation? A vacation, as defined by the Random House Dictionary, is a "period of rest or freedom from regular work, study, etc." Now one might ask, what is a break? A break is a "a brief rest, as from work." A rest is "a period of inactivity, repose, or tranquillity." So, in all essence, a break is defined as a brief period of inactivity, repose, or tranquillity - as from work which is more commonly known as a vacation.

Now we ask you - what is a vacation at Washington College? This question has always baffled us for we were under the impression that a vacation was a period of rest or freedom from regular work or study.

What we do not comprehend is how work appears to reproduce and breed just prior to the said vacation. This athenaeum had an increased polymorphistic population that should have depreciated over Fall Break. What we, the serfs, are interested in is whether or not the Lords of the Manor enjoyed the break?

What is the purpose of Security? Security is the "freedom from danger, harm, care, or anxiety" and the purpose of Security is to protect students from danger, harm, care, and or anxiety.

In case you are not aware - Security has moved to a new location to gain space. While Security acquired more space, there happens to be this incredible void between their newly found abode and the campus. The term "abroad" has taken a new and intimate meaning.

Before, students, when in dire need of help, had to travel to Spain (i.e the Spanish House) which was a central location in this idiosyncratic bureaucracy (commonly referred to as WACO or WC). Now, students must venture onto the autobahn or join the diplomatic core to reach the Arcadian Embassy - be assured that you will be required to carry your passport.

The serfs pose this question to the Lords of the Manor - how can a fort be protected when the imperialistic Arcadian knights have colonized abroad? Will this colonization lead South campus out of the Dark Ages and into the light?

Mid-East Peace Talks Begin

SPAIN

The Middle East peace conference opened on Wednesday. The conference, brought about by a U.S.-Soviet diplomatic effort, involves Israel, Syria, Lebanon, Jordan and the Palestinians. The main issue of the conference is: who will control the lands seized from the Arabs in 1967. Before leaving for the conference President Bush was quoted as saying "I don't want to get people's hopes too high because there's a long, long way to go before we have the makings of– or have an agreement for– peace in that troubled corner of the world."

WASHINGTON, DC

After 2 years of negotiating, the Senate has finally come up with a job-discrimination proposal that Bush might actually sign. White House chief of staff John Sununu told reporters "We finally were able to get language accepted that eliminated the prospects of quotas...I spoke with the president. It appears the proposal is acceptable and if there are no additional changes to what is there, the president is willing to sign that bill." The rights bill is intended to make it easier for victims of job bias to win lawsuits and collect damages. Unfortunately, the new bill still has caps on damage awards for women. Under the new bill women will still not be treated the same as victims of racial discrimination who, under current law, are entitled to unlimited damages.

SOUTH AFRICA

On Saturday, South Africa's most prominent black resistance movements, the African National Congress and the Pan-Africanis Congress, made a consensus on negotiating with the white-minority government, agreeing that a conference of all political parties should be held as soon as possible to work out methods for the transfer of power to the country's black majority. After meeting with officials earlier this week, the ANC predicted that the conference could be held before the end of November.

YUGOSLAVIA

The Serb army is continuing a four-week siege on the Adriatic port of Dubrovnik. There are 50,000 people trapped inside the Croatian city, and are running low on food, water and medicine. They have been without normal water, electricity and phone service since the siege began. Many inside still want to fight on, fearing that the city will be taken over by Serbia. Fighting in Yugoslavia has claimed between 2,000 and 3,000 lives since Croatia declared its independence in June.

The Professors World Peace Academy, an arm of the Rev. Sun Myung Moon's Unification Church, proposed on Oct. 9th a $50 million take-over of the financially strapped University of Bridgeport. The group said it wanted control of the school's board of trustees to create a worldwide network of universities striving for international harmony. The University of Bridgeport turned down the Moonie's proposal last week. The Rev. Moon has also offered to buy the financially-strapped state of Connecticut, but this offer shall probably be turned down also.

a commentary. The intention of my letter to the editor was to stir people up and to do that, I had to use the tone that I did. The result hopefully, is to get smoking banned in the Coffee House. Smokers could still go outside and smoke themselves to death if they so wish.

Finally, people that know me know that I'm can [sic] very outspoken at times. In order to get people's attention, I go for shock value to stir people up and get them off their apathetic butts. The negative feedback on this issue was extremely limited, and the positive feedback was far greater.

Law Students Protest Thomas Confirmation

by Jennifer Safrey

NEW HAVEN, CT (NSNS) Four student groups at Yale University Law School organized a press conference to protest the confirmation of Judge Clarence Thomas to the Supreme Court and to show support for Anita Hill, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

The conference was held on October 16, two days after Thomas' confirmation, and gave representatives of Yale Law School Women, the Collective of Women of Color and the Law, the Yale Journal of Law and Feminism, and the Women's Committee of Law and Liberation an opportunity to speak out on the procedure the U.S. Senate followed during the Thomas hearings. Also involved was a representative from Brother to Brother, a black men's organization.

The groups holding the conference also wrote a joint statement which included three demands: that the Senate start taking sexual harassment seriously; that Democrats take an active role in nominating future Supreme Court justices; an that the American people elect more men and women of color to the Senate.

"The members of the Judiciary Committee ... failed to investigate [Hill's] allegations seriously," said E. Christi Cunningham of the Collective of Women of Color and the Law at the press conference. "Black women have always been called liars and fantasizers ... and we have not been believed."

Tory Clawson, a member of the Yale Journal of Law and Feminism, says the groups are starting a letter-writing campaign to senators, informing those who voted for Thomas that they are outraged and telling those who voted against Thomas that they are pleased.

"The hubbub has died down, but we don't want it to be forgotten," says Clawson. She also says that the groups are working to insert a provision in the Civil Rights Act of 1991 that includes penalties for those guilty of sexual harassment.

Field Hockey Finishes Strong

by Greg Coss

Maybe the field hockey team didn't do everything they wanted to do this year. They didn't repeat their performance of last year's qualifying for the MAC play-offs when a win over Haverford or Elizabethtown could have done it. But they did do just about everything else in finishing 10-5-1, including winning their final two games of the season, 3-2 over Widener and 1-0(2OT) over Western Maryland.

Fresh off a solid previous week, the sticksters travelled to Widener on October 22 to try to keep the momentum going. Eleanor Shriver did just that, scoring on a pass from Caroline Jensen with 12:42 left in the first half which gave WC a 1-0 lead. However, Widener retaliated with only 38 seconds remaining in the half to even the score at one.

But as Coach Diane Guinan would admit later, "We finished a lot stronger than we started." With 25:49 left to go, Caroline Jensen put WC ahead again, scoring on a rebound in front of the net. But three minutes later the game was tied again. However, WC would untie it for good just a minute later, as Jen Blenckstone, on a free hit, caught Widener's defense out of position and fed a pass to Renee Guckert, who put home the game-winner, making the final score 3-2. Coach Guinan saw this as a very heady play by a couple of her stars, but also added that Jen Rupert played a fine game.

"Jen played real well, and she's made great strides in her first year of college hockey," she said. "Her game has come a long way during the season, which she deserves because she studies the game very hard."

Washington then dominated Western Maryland, though the score wouldn't show it. In the first half Washington had several opportunities to score in the 17 shots they recorded, but they couldn't put any home. In the meantime, Western Maryland could only put together four shots, but they stayed strong and tied at half. Coach Guinan admitted that "this has always been a big rivalry, which is why they hung in there with us. We outplayed them in the skill department, but they played with incredible aggressiveness to compensate for that."

Washington continued to dominate in the second half, but also continued to fail in scoring a goal. The frustration continued through the first overtime, but Marie Mohler ended it in the second overtime, (sudden death) scoring off a rebound of a Jen Blenckstone goal only 1:21 into the final extra period. This goal ended Washington's season on a very nice note and gave them a final #5 ranking in the South region of the NCAA III teams (includes schools from Virginia, Maryland, and Delaware). Coach Guinan said that Maria Jerardi really stood out in this game, as well as Brigid DeVries in goal and of course Marie in getting the game winner. Then I asked Coach Guinan to sum up the season.

"It's tough not getting back to the play-offs, particularly for the girls who remember what it was like to be there," she said. "But we lost some key people, and finishing 10-5-1 and fifth in the region is certainly nothing to be ashamed of. We did quite well for having such a young group."

Washington's season is over, but for some of the players it goes on. Washington is a member of the Maryland/Washington Field Hockey Organization, which chose eight of WC's players to play for it's Southeast Regional team competing in the Southeast tournament at Essex College November 16-18. If these players can stand out in this tournament, they could be selected for the national tournament. Those who play very well at nationals have a shot at making the United States Field Hockey Association's Olympic trials. So the regional tournament in Essex could be used as a springboard for glory for our eight players chosen. The players who made first team for the Southeast Regional team are senior defensiveman Jenifer Blenckstone, junior attacker Amy McCleary, and sophomore attacker Caroline Jensen. Second team selections were Heather Mayr, Renee Guckert, Maria Jerardi, Elizabeth Olivere and Eleanor Shriver. Congratulations and good luck in Essex. Also congratulations to the entire team.

Volleyball Wins Chesapeake Tourney

by Greg Coss

The Shorewomen have ended their 1991 volleyball season in excellent fashion. The feisty Shorewomen responded to tough losses by winning the big Chesapeake Invitational Tournament in strong fashion.

Washington College would travel to an October 22 date against Wilmington. They were facing a team loaded with experience and fan support. Wilmington posed problems for the Shorewomen because they had six seniors. These elements, combined with the lengthy road trip WC was still on, contributed to the 6-15 loss they suffered in the first game. As Coach Penny Fall put it best, "At that point, we were still in the van."

However, the players would recover by winning the second game 15-12. Although they would eventually lose the third and fourth games 12-15 and 11-15, Coach Fall was very pleased.

"They're [Wilmington] tall seniors who are very smart on the volleyball court," she said. "But we didn't fold. This was a great match for us."

Coach Fall had hoped that this match would give WC a lot of confidence going into the big match with Franklin and Marshall. But WC fell to F&M in three straight games, 4-15, 8-15, and 9-15. Bad officiating also played a role in determining the lopsided outcome. But if there was a bright side to the loss, it was that the Shorewomen had gotten the bad game out of their system. The Shorewomen needed perfection for the Chesapeake tournament held last weekend.

Goucher would be an early test for WC in the tournament. After taking the first game 15-11, WC lost the second 9-15, but rallied to take the third 15-11.

At this point Washington was on a roll, and it showed in their pasting of Notre Dame 15-5, 15-11.

After rolling over a Hood 15-2, 15-9, it came down to the battle of the unbeaten. Washington and Marymount were both 3-0 in the tournament, and were ready for action. After some furious action in the first game, Washington College found itself behind 11-14. They rallied to win the game 16-14, and cruised 15-1 in the second thanks to Laura McClellan's eleven service points. On their comeback in the first game, Fall said "This group has an incredible ability to raise their game an extra level when the pressure is on."

The Shorewomen (22-17) had reached their goal of winning the tournament. Laura McClellan and Theresa Sganga were named to the all-tournament team as the icing on the cake. Fall was particularly pleased that Theresa was finally recognized. Congrats to all on a great season. Tomorrow at 1: Haverford. See ya there!

WAC Gets Whipped by Widener, 4-0

by Chris Vaughn

In case you haven't noticed and judging by the attendance you haven't, WC has managed to lose a few more. I think it was a surprise to us all to hear of the Shoremens' loss to Widener last Tuesday. WC travelled up to their turf and came back with the goose egg still intact. Now 0-13-1, they have just 2 games remaining to rid the big 0.

At the risk of sounding like a broken record, the men of WC played their usual style of soccer: domination turns into frustration. With the loss of key offensive players Chris "Paper Machet Head" Graham, who suffered a concussion after a collision with the goalie, and Caperton Beirne, who pulled a hamstring, things quickly dissipated and fell apart. Widener began hounding the net and putting WC on the defensive side for the rest of the contest. The final result: 4-0 Widener.

The Shoremen went up against Haverford this past Wednesday and will face Hopkins here on the Kib Saturday afternoon at 1:30. I hope youcan make it! If you can't, it will be covered in the next issue. Their final match against Delaware Valley, which is here this Thursday at 3:00, will really be the one you won't want to miss. Catch what could be history in the making!

Work Opportunities Abroad

College students wanting a unique way to build their resume with international experience while having the opportunity to travel and live in different cultures are turning to the Work Abroad program sponsored by the Council on International Educational Exchange to cut through the governmental red tape and get students legal permission to work overseas.

Increasingly, graduate school admissions officers and corporate recruiters are seeking people with international experience as it provides a broader perspective.

"If a person thinks studying abroad is a cultural experience, wait till he tries working abroad! The different work ethics and attitudes to which you must adapt to teaches a person the pros and cons of the American system," commented a University of Virginia participant on the Work In Britain program.

More than six thousand U.S. students each year benefit from the program, receiving permission for temporary work in Britain, Canada, Costa Rica, France, Germany, Ireland, Jamaica, and New Zealand.

Students discover that finding a job abroad is much the same as it is at home. By contacts or researching to prearrange a job before departure, most students secure work soon after arrival.

"Working abroad was the best and most exciting thing I've ever done. I went with nothing to a foreign country and started a life all by myself in one of the most expensive cities in the world, and I made it," said a University of Michigan Flint participant on the Work In Britain program.

Most jobs available are unskilled in variety - in bars, restaurants, stores and hotels. But, with research and preplanning, past participants have prearranged such positions as financial analyst, legal assistant, intern and research assistant in large corporations that often have U.S. offices.

"The area I lived in was beautiful in landscape and people. And, because I had a career-oriented job, I feel confident of my future employment opportunities," said a Work In Germany participant from the University of Kansas.

The Work Abroad program is open to U.S. students who are 18 years of age or older and are enrolled full-time in a U.S. college or university. The only cost to students is the program fee of $125 and airfare to their destination.

For more information and application forms, write or telephone the Council on International Educational Exchange, WA-R, 205 E. 42nd Street, New York, NY 10017, (212) 661-1414 Ext. 1130.

peacetime priorities. The group's campaign was launched in 1989 and has focused grassroots pressure on Congress to cut the military budget and to reinvest its resources to meet human needs. Activists for Sane/Freeze collected and presented House Budget Committee Chairperson Leon Panetta(D-CA) with over 50,000 postcards carrying this message. This action helped Sane/Freeze win his support as well as the support of his counterpart in the Senate, Jim Sasser(D-TN).

Through its network of chapters, Sane/Freeze has taken the lead in pulling together local and state coalitions of community organizations dedicated to changing federal spending priorities.

Sane/Freeze's second major national organizing campaign brings together a coalition of peace and environmental organizations workshop to clean up the Department of Energy weapons factories in an attempt to keep them shut down. This organizing effort and lobbying paid off when Congress cancelled funding for two new plutonium plants and funding for the clean up of existing plants was increased by $340 million.

Another major concern of Sane/Freeze is Economic Conversion. This country spends 52% of tax money on the military whereas only 12% is spent on non-military interests like education and housing.

Social concerns such as homelessness, education, AIDS research, and the search for new energy sources seem to have taken a back seat to nuclear weapons technology. Economic conversion is a means to encourage military reductions while retraining displaced personel and providing for a gradual shift to peace time industrial concerns. Conversion also offers a plan to use military resources for pressing civilian needs.

Room Ruined in Kent House Fire

by Kris Wallenberg and Julie Greene

This past Wednesday evening between 7:30 and 7:40 a fire broke out in the creative arts hall of Kent. No one was hurt.even though most personal belongings in room 212 were destroyed. One room was ruined by smoke, fire, and water damage; another room suffered water damage. The rooms sustained little or no structural damage; however, the North wing residents have been enduring the stench of the smoke for the past few days.

Nancy Whiteman, an RA of Kent, was alerted to the possibility of a fire when resident Dawn Jarboe smelled smoke. Ms. Whiteman went down to the North end of Kent to observe smoke protruding from one of the rooms. She proceeded to knock on the door to determine if anyone was in the room. When no one answered she felt the door and the handle, which were not hot, then she opened the door. A thick, black cloud of smoke rushed out of the room upon opening the door.

"I didn't see any flames in the room," Whiteman said, but she decided to reach in to turn on the light to make sure no one was unconscious in the room. Her hand was slightly burned when she touched the area around the light switch. She shut the door then ran to call security. While she was calling security the dorm's fire alarm activated itself. Security called Kent Central, which dispatched aid. Ms. Whiteman, with the assistance of Lionel Dyson, evacuated Kent House.

Fire Departments from various towns arrived on the scene shortly after the alarm sounded. Chestertown dispatched three engines, a truck, and an Air and Foam unit; Centreville assisted with a rescue squad and a truck; Church Hill had one engine on the scene; Rock Hall dispatched an engine and truck to Kent; Kennedyville assisted with an engine and a utility truck; and Kent and Queen Anne Rescue Squad had two trucks.

Ed Maxcy, Associate Dean of Students, stated that "I'm very happy that Nancy Whiteman responded so professionally, that we have this excellent volunteer fire department that responded so quickly, and most importantly that no one was injured." 'Maureen McIntire, Dean of Students, said that "we are lucky, again we are lucky that there was an RA around." Jerry Roderick, Head of Security, responded that we are "extremely lucky and fortunate -the fire was contained in one room."

Fire Marshall Richard Powell stated that the "cause of the fire appears to be the misuse of a candle." According to Dean Maxcy, the Fire Marshall stated that the fire could have been caused by a lamp cord, an electrical cord, or a candle and that the fire was not cause by a building wiring problem.

"Misuse of Candle" Is Unlikely Cause of Fire

by Julie Greene, Sherry Menton, and Kris Wallenberg

Based on our own observations during our age for the Elm, we believe the procedures implemented in the wake of the fire were not as stringent as they might have been. We further think that the physical evidence makes impossible one of the possible causes of the fire.

After examining room 212 and ensuring the proper ventilation of Kent House, th Marshall said the residents were allowed back into the dorm. Why should an investigation into the cause of the fire be put off until morning simply to placate the sixty-odd residents of the building who wanted to get back into their rooms? Residents of the building should have been notified of the possible risks involved. In a statement made Thursday morning, Reed Raudenbush, Director of the Physical Plant, said that all wiring in Kent is enclosed in steel conduit pipes, in accordance with building codes, and that "based on a visual examination, it was clear that the conduits were intact," and thus the building was safe for occupation.

Around 9:30 p.m. the Fire Marshall and Security departed without sealing the room, and stated that maintenance could clean up the mess in the morning. The floor's R.A. asked if the occupants of 212 could gain entrance to their room to salvage what they could. They were permitted. Without having completed a thorough investigation the authoritative forces allowed the occupants of the burned room to enter the room and handle and even discard evidence.

An electrical short may have caused the fire.

As we photographed the room, we noticed that he room was still on. Why was the heat left on in Kent? If the heater had been fine before the fire, it certainly wasn't afterwards. It was located in the corner of the room that sustained the most damage; the entire left side of the heater had pulled away from the wall. Even if shutting off the heat meant relocating everyone in the building, or everyone on the west side of 213 for that matter, precautions should have been used.

The Fire Marshall may have allowed the burned room to remain open because of his judgement that the probable cause of the fire was the misuse of a candle. After discussing the events of the evening with the residents, witnesses, and people involved in the evacuation and aftermath of the fire, we have come to the conclusion that the misuse of a candle is a quick answer to a much more complex situation.

Nancy Whiteman, the R.A. who alerted security to the fire, said that the door was not hot to her touch, but that she almost burned her hand feeling for the light switch on the wall inside the room. Metal conducts heat faster than cinder blocks, yet the doorknob was not hot, and the area surrounding the light switch was. When we called Fire Marshall Powell for a follow-up report on this information, he stated that this could have been due to the smoldering fire. A smoldering fire is slow, combustible and keeps heat in the room. He still felt strongly that the misuse of a candle that was found under the bed was the probable cause.

Following up on this, we returned to room 212 where we located the "candle" which "probably" caused the fire. If that candle caused the fire it would not have been intact, identifiable, nor sitting on a section of the radiator where no damage from smoke or fire was evident. There were two lit candles that had been put out, in the presence of witnesses, before the victim left. Unless the candle managed to spontaneously relight itself, and the once-again burning candle and its gallon jug holder were knocked over by a very stiff breeze, all in the five minutes between when the occupant left the room and when the fire was noticed, there is no way for a candle to have caused the fire.

The bubbles in the tile floor, the bubbled paint on the wall, and the smoke patterns throughout the room indicate that the origin of the fire was across the room from where the candles were located. Also, the wooden chest the candle was on was virtually unharmed.

Several items from the room, includign the bed, were thrown out of the window by the firemen. It would appear that this evidence was not deemed important enough to have been protected from scavengers, but then again neither was the evidence in the unsealed room. One of the objects discarded out the window was a lamp which had been attached to the headboard of the burned bed. Not only had half the mattress been burned to dust, but this headboard, which was still attached to the lamp, was severely burned. The metal clamp which held the lamp to the headboard had melted into two pieces and most of the insulation on the cord had been melted away to show burned wires; however, the plug was still intact. The positioning of the metal clamp on this headboard coincided with the fire lines and with the smoke lines. From this information, we hypothesized that the heat of the fire was probably, somehow, conducted by a short in the lamp, a section of the lamp wire several inches from its plug, and possibly even the radiator. Raudenbush stated that one theory he has is that the cord to the lamp was caught behind or wrapped around the bedpost, and the friction eventually rubbed away the insulation around the wire. He stressed that this is only a theory, and that it and the candle theory are still under consideration.

Other than Fire Marshall Powell's statement about the fire appearing to be caused by a disregarded candle, fire officials have made no official comment about their investigation.

No one was injured in the th fire that destroyed the contents of one room and left another water damaged.

A Note To the Reader...

Due to the immediacy and importance of our cover story this week, the regular news coverage has been placed on the back page. This week's layout had already been prepared, but was moved due to the priority of the fire in Kent House. The news article pertaining to the fire was written Wednesday night through Thursday morning and contains information available as of Thursday afternoon at 1 p.m. Due to press deadlines, any relevant information and follow-ups will be covered in next week's issue.

The article entitled "'Misuse of a Candle' Unlikely Cause of Fire" is an editorial, not a news story, and appears on a news page for expediency's sake.

The Elm staff would like to express their gratitude to the following individuals for their aid to us in getting this to press on time and for their help at the scene: Fire Marshall Richard Powell, Chief of Security Jerry Roderick, Deans Maxcy and McIntire, Nancy Whiteman, Sue Czechowski, Katie Degentesh, Kristen Johnson, Raphael Koster, and the residents of Kent House.

OPINION/EDITORIAL

Departmental Rules Impede Success of Distribution Requirements

As we go to our advising appointments and begin to select courses for the spring semester, many WC students, especially freshmen and sophomores, may be confused about the requirements of the distribution system. This is not surprising, because even if you understand the reason for having distribution and for having it count for thus-and-such much of your curriculum here at WC, the eccentricities in distribution requirements in the individual academic departments make no sense whatsoever.

It is plain to see why distribution exists. It is an integral part of a liberal education that students gain experience in as broad a range of classes as possible. Distribution forces students who would otherwise emerge themselves in the department of their major, never to be heard from by the rest of the campus, to gain this wider experience that is the goal of a private liberal arts college.

Understanding the specific requirements of distribution is no problem, either. A total of six year-long sequences in four distribution areas seems reasonable – it would not even take three semesters to complete.

What does emphatically not make sense with the distribution system, however, is that there is no standardized criterion for which classes can and can not be applied to distribution. The Philosophy department is the most lenient; any two courses taken in combination can be applied to distribution. Only the first year science classes (General Biology, etc) can be applied to distribution, but this is logical, because those classes are prerequisites for the upper-level courses.

It is less logical for the introductory Political Science class to be the one offered for distribution credit in that department, when other courses in the department have no prerequisite and do not conceptually depend on the intro class.

So too in the Art department, where the courses offered to fulfill distribution are Intro to Western Art in combination with Intro to Visual Design or in combination with any upper-level art history course. Since the three-hundred level art history courses do not list Intro to Western Art as a prerequisite, why is it not possible for students to take two upper level art history courses to fulfill distribution? Does the Intro class have some mystical role in broadening a student's experience (which is the raison d'etre for distribution, remember) that is not readily apparent?

It makes even less sense that a sequence in Calculus and a sequence in Computer Science cannot both be used to fulfill distribution because they both happen to be taught out of the same department. A year's worth of Calculus can be combined with a year of Logic, however, because Logic I and II are taught out of the Philosophy department. We are not allowed to double-concentrate in the same department because it defeats the purpose of a broad education, yet the current policy would rather students take the similarly-premised Calculus and Logic courses than one or the other along with Computer Science, which is an entirely different discipline. At the same time, students may take two full-year sequences of a foreign language (a discipline that also falls under the Formal Studies category) and have them both count towards distribution. This double standard is applied in an attempt to encourage students to continue their study of foreign languages, and while this is an entirely commendable effort, it discriminates against students with strong science and math backgrounds who want to take both Calculus and Computer Science for distribution credit.

What is required are a few blanket clauses in the distribution program to standardize departmental requirements and level the playing field for all WC students. One clause should state that students who have prior experience in a discipline should be granted advance placement and allowed to take upper level courses for distribution. This should occur with the advisor's permission, since they have the student's high school or transfer records, and not require the lengthy process of appeal to the Academic Standing Committee, as is currently the case. The distribution offerings in Formal Studies should be changed so that Computer Science is considered a different discipline than other math courses, even thought they are taught out of the same department.

It is time to take another look at the manner in which the distribution process is carried out. Rules should be changed to make it easier for students to achieve the wide range of course experiences that a liberal education demands, without all the headaches of being obliged to take unwanted and unnecessary courses.

Letter to the Editor

"Multiculturalism 101" Flyer Displays Intolerance

Dear Editor,

Tonight, as I was leaving the dining hall, I saw a sheet of paper posted on the corkboard there. It contained a cartoon lampooning the potential Democratic candidates for president. It also contained a blurb denouncing, in a sarcastic manner, the concept of 'multiculturalism'. What these two items had in common is another subject, and the cartoon I have no problem with, aside from the fact that I disagree with it. In the blurb itself, I found flawed logic used to defend the author's closed-mindedness, and, by including the cartoon, it would seem, the entire right-wing's closed-mindedness toward other cultures. This is a response to the author and the person who posted the blurb and cartoon.

The blurb cited two Americans who had gone to Pakistan in order to help the Afghan refugees living there. It goes on to say that they were accused of armed robbery, and that the Islamic Courts sentenced them to the amputation of an arm and a foot. The author of the blurb then used this fact to sarcastically denounce the concept of understanding others: "So let's have another one of those great big, throat-rasping cheers for 'multiculturalism.'"

Perhaps these Americans really did commit armed robbery. These judges most likely reviewed the facts and testimonies and then found the Americans guilty. If this is the case then the Court was not being closed-minded. Americans have, I've been told, a tendency to think that they can do whatever they please in another country, disregarding its laws at whim. The author seems to assume that the charges were trumped-up and that these Americans could not possibly have committed this crime, (being American has never stopped anyone from committing a crime) and, I admit, this could also be the case. It is not implicit from the facts given that the judges made no attempt to understand these Americans.

Whether the case against them was real or not, the author was wrong to immediately assume that we should not attempt to understand these, or any other people, because they are not making the attempt to understand us. The author uses the assumed closed-mindedness of a court from another culture to justify his or her own closed-mindedness. Might I remind the author that when you assume, you make an "ass" out of "u" and "me". Feel free to make an ass of yourself, but please do not make an ass out of me and my country. Our country has been made an ass of too much already, mostly by its own citizens.

With the advent of a World Community, mutual understanding becomes imperative, as these two Americans so dramatically found out. Perhaps if they had been exposed more to other cultures, in the form of a multicultural education, they would have learned how to behave in a foreign country and to understand the Pakistani culture. "When in Pakistan, do as the Pakistanis," is still a good idea, and how can you do that if you do not know their customs? Multiculturalism in the American educational experience will help us to deal, in a positive manner, with the emerging World Community.

To us, the Pakistani laws may seem cruel, but is forced amputation really any worse than imprisonment? Their laws are an outgrowth of their culture and they have the right to impose the laws they want, just as we do. When we are in their country we must follow their laws, or pay the consequences. If they wanted to change their laws, then they would. The author denigrates their entire culture by saying that Americans should be immune to Pakistani law while in that country. The author, and myself, would expect (I hope) a Pakistani immigrant to obey our laws or face the consequences.

To the author of the blurb entitled "Multiculturalism 101", and to all those who agree with him or her, I would like to say, please do not make the 'A' in 'U.S. of A', stand for 'Assholes', to the rest of the world. Instead, make the attempt to understand the other people in this world. Their cultures, no matter how strange, cruel, odd or disgusting they may seem to us, are no better or worse than our own.

Think about it,

Campus Flyers Stir Debate over "Political Correctness"

by Sherry Menton

The ideological conflict highlighted by the above letter is in no way unique. In fact, nationwide the debate is heating up between conservative students' efforts to protect freedom of expression, and progressive students' efforts to rid their campuses of insensitive and hurtful expression towards women, minorities, and other student groups.

This debate can be illustrated best by what is happening with increasing frequency to one of the simplest, most obvious, and most common forms of expression on college campuses – the campus flyer.

Recently, members of the Black Student Union and the Hispanic Society at the State University of New York at Fredonia ripped down what they considered racist flyers from public bulletin boards on campus. The flyers were being used as a recruiting tool for the student-run group called Project Environment. They portrayed a white male pumping liquid into the ear of a bug-eyed black male with the caption, "Environmental problems bug you?"

Sensitivity was also an issue for two female students from Glassboro State College who saw an Alpha Phi Delta fraternity advertisement for Rush week, a flyer with a photograph of a nude woman posted in their Student Center. The Dean of Glassboro asked the fraternity to apologize in a letter to the school paper, and the day the apology was printed, they posted a new flyer depicting an old woman wagging her finger at the Alpha Phi fraternity and calling them "a bunch of godless heathens."

CAMPUS VOICES

QUESTION - Do you think that relocating their offices off-campus will have any impact of Security's services to the campus?

Wendy Kraus

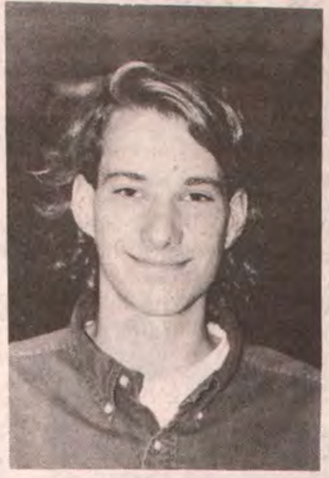
Yes, I think Security moving their office will impact on campus. They're never around when we need them when they're on campus. What's going to happen when they move off?



Michael Mucha

In my opinion, Security does absolutely nothing but give tickets anyway. Whoops, I forgot about fining people for having fun.

No, it's not that great of a distance and the new communications system should be adequate in insuring security and availability.

Yes, I believe that relocating their offices will lessen the efficiency of their purpose.

If those golf carts can handle the trek, it shouldn't make much difference. Those high-tech walkie-talkies always make responses to the troubled hundreds at WC so expedient. I just hope they don't forget where campus is.

Complain, Complain: Moving Security Shouldn't be a Big Deal

Frankly, I was surprised by the sort of responses we received to the Campus Voices question this week. Only one person interviewed thought that Security's performance will not be impaired by the move, and the five who thought that it would were not gentle in stating their views. I think perhaps we need to get a grip on ourselves here.

We have spent the better part of the semester complaining both verbally and in print about the isolation of the Cardinal Dormitories. Cardinal is poorly lit - which problem, by the way, will soon be solved thanks to the generosity of Mrs. Betty Casey - and cut off from the rest of campus. There is no easy way to contact Security from Cardinal since there is no pay phone yet. Several times the Chestertown Police have had to enter campus to break up disturbances out by Cardinal. With Security that much closer, they will be able to head off problems before the police have to teach students a lesson that's more expensive (per hour) than a WC education.

Certainly, it is less convenient now for residents east of 213 to reach the Security offices. There should seldom be need to do so, however, since telephones abound and Security is a telepatch away.

While I have some sympathy for students who are chagrined by Security's penchant for ticketing cars (after having survived three semesters of car-owning residency, I just got my first ticket this week), they do considerably more, and we would do well to remember that. Too many cracks about Security's uselessness and you may find yourself high and dry when you call in a theft or vandalism (or need to have your room unlocked).

In any case, the location of Security's offices is pretty much irrelevant. In my experience, Security officers are rarely at the office in Spanish House because they are out patrolling the campus, and not in golf carts, as one student indicated. Maintenance workers use carry-all equipped golf carts to transport heavy equipment between buildings; Security, generally, does not.

Student Press Law Center, a non-profit organization working against the censorship of college newspapers, stated, "The First Amendment doesn't allow government universities to censor based on the content of the material in question."

Washington College is not a government university, and we are doubly blessed in having what appears to be a more polite, if not tolerant, student body. The fact that WC as an institution is already politically correct enough to have banned unnecessary mailbox flyers last year may contribute to WC's non-participation in the latest college trend - intolerance.

Peace Talks Conclude Peacefully

MADRID

The Middle East peace conference is so far a U.S. diplomatic triumph, as last week Israelis and Palestinians talked across the negotiating table as equals for the first time. The two sides ended the first phase of the Middle East conference peacefully, and might resume negotiations in two to three weeks. However, Yasser Arafat, leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization, was quoted as saying "If the negotiations do not lead to a positive outcome, we will continue the jihad," or holy war, and the Palestinian uprising will "go on, wave after wave."

MOSKOW

Bread lines grow longer and longer as the Soviet Union comes closer to complete economic collapse. Russian President Boris N. Yeltsin is preparing to make a series of tough economic reforms that will, at first, make life harder for the average person. He is hoping to free prices from state control by the end of the year, which will cause some prices to quadruple. The newspaper Kommersant predicted that each person will have to earn 680 rubles a month to subsist. The average wage now is about 400 rubles a month. The head of the Russian KGB says that the situation is so serious that rioting could erupt across Russia within weeks.

MARYLAND

Even after the plan for $450 million in cuts and 1,500 personnel cuts is set to take effect in November, Maryland still faces another $150 million budget deficit this year. This could mean another round of reductions in aid to schools, social programs and local governments, plus more employee firings, depending on how state officials decide to balance the budget.

MAINE

President Bush's family compound in Kennebunkport, Maine, was severely damaged by a fierce storm that blew up along the Atlantic coastline Wednesday, sending 30-foot waves crashing over the compound. It is not clear yet whether the compound can be restored. The damage was so bad that "We're talking boulders in the living room," said White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater.

Fund For American Studies Program Helps Students Gain Appreciation

by Rachael Fink

It's early November, not even Thanksgiving yet, but it is a good time to start thinking about how to spend the summer. Right now, the sun and having free time may seem far removed but the season will change quickly and plans should be made. Every year around two-hundred college students plan to and do spend their summer in Washington, D.C., working and learning.

The program is called the Fund for American Studies and is held for six weeks in June and July. The six weeks include an internship with a local business, credit classes given by Georgetown University and numerous chances to make contacts and learn the ins and outs of the nation's capital. Three different institutes are offered to students each year : The Institute on Comparative Political and Economic Systems (ICPES), The Institute on Political Journalism (IPJ), and The Bryce Harlow Institute on Business and Government Affairs (IBGA).

ICPES offers internships with national political leaders in the U.S. Congress, foreign embassies, government agencies, law firms, think tanks, or other private or public politically involved organizations. The Walter Judd Policy Lecture Series, along with other events, provides access to top government officials and policy experts. Four afternoons a week classes are held. Comparative Economic Systems includes a theoretical comparison of the market economy and central planning, as well as analysis of Marxism and Communism. The second course, Comparative Political Systems, is a comparison of the political systems in Western Europe, former Communist bloc countries and the United States. Both classes are taught by experts in the field and complement the internship experience well.

The Institute on Political Journalism includes two full days and three mornings of internship per week in a Washington news bureau of television of radio network, magazine, newspaper, public policy organization, federal government agency or with a Member of Congress. Guest speakers to IPJ's evening dialogues and site breifings include among others Jacqueline Adams, CBS News, Lou Cannon, The Washington Post, and Helen Thomas, United Press International. The classes, Economics in Public Policy and Ethics and the Media, held three afternoons a week go indepth into two distinct and fundamental aspects of journalism.

The third institute offered by the Fund for American Studies studies the role that American businesses are playing in the forming of national policy. IBGA internships have been sponsored in the past by Procter & Gamble, MCI Communications, Phillips Petroleum, and others. Business and Government Relations is a class that examens the history and philosophy of the business-government relationship. The second class held by IBGA is Power and Values in Organizations. It is an analysis of the effect of personality type preferences on organizations and society's shared beliefs about individual and organizational values. This institute also includes a weekend workshop of simulations and power exercises designed to illustrate these issues to the students and help them to discover their own sources of power.

All of the Institutes has specific admissions requirements and require at least one full year of undergraduate study. If interested, information can be obtained from The Fund for American Studies, 1526 18th Street, N. W., Washington, D.C. 20036. Plan a summer. Plan an adventure.

Hollaender Fellowships

Oak Ridge Associated Universities is now accepting applications for the Alexander Hollaender Distinguished Postdoctoral Fellowship program.

Sponsored by the U.S. Department of Energy (DOE) and administered by Oak Ridge Associated Universities, this prestigious program offers fellowships in the energy-related life, biomedical, and environmental sciences as well as other scientific disciplines. Fellows will have the opportunity to conduct research at participating federal and university laboratories in the United States. Research topics include health and environmental effects associated with energy technology, biological and environmental processes, physical and technological research, and applications of energy sciences and technology.

This program was established in memory of the late Dr. Alexander Hollaender, the 1983 recipient of DOE's Enrico Fermi Award and former director of the Biology Division at Oak Ridge National Laboratory. Dr. Hollaender is known for his many outstanding contributions to biological research as well as his support of education and training. Since its inception in 1986, the Hollaender program has awarded 38 fellowships, and up to five new fellowships with a first-year stipend of $37,500 will be awarded in May 1992.

Applicants must have received a doctoral degree or equivalent in an appropriate discipline within the two years prior to the beginning of their appointments. Selection is based on academic records, recommendations, compatibility of background and scientific interests with the needs of the research center, and the availability of funds, programs, staff, and facilities.

These fellowships are open to all qualified U.S. citizens and permanent resident aliens without regard to race, sex, religion, color, age, handicap, national origin, or status as a disabled veteran or veteran of the Vietnam era.

Deadline for the Alexander Hollaender Distinguished Postdoctoral Fellowship program is January 15, 1992. To receive an application packet, write to Science/Engineering Education Division, Oak Ridge Associated Universities, P.O. Box 117, Oak Ridge, Tennessee, 37831-0117, or call (616) 576-4805.

by Tanya Allen

WAC HELL is a wonderfully horrible place! (said Big Fly as he lead Josephine into another torture chamber, commonly known as the fitness center. inside the fitness center were lines and lines of dead wac alumni, holding little white slips of paper, upon which were listed four or five wac courses, plus an advisor's signature.)

what's going on here? (asked josephine. a huge square appeared on the wall as an overhead was turned on. a gigantic shadow of a human hand moved across the square, holding the gigantic shadow of a pen. the hand began writing, in careful, neat letters,) 'CANCELLED: BIO 200 10, 11, 12, &13 Society, Ecology & Chesapk Bay.' (a scream was heard from the line of humans.) 'CANCELLED: ENG 316 10 The American Short Story.' (another horrible scream was heard as dozens of students began banging their own heads with notebooks) 'CANCELLED: PSY 321 10 SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY.' (even more students began weeping and gnashing their teeth.)

this...is the ultimate form of torture. (Big Fly said.) this...is known as...arena registration.

MEANWHILE:

Back in the real world, the students and staff and bugs of Washington College were confused. It was the end of the WAC as they knew it. First the Elm had been chopped down, and now the Elm—the college's student newspaper, was in danger of disappearing also, unless new editors could be found in time. The school had lost its symbol, and was now in danger of losing one of the main things that brought unity to the school: the newspaper that connected the faculty, all of the various cliques of the campus, the student's parents, and the administration. What was to be done?

Napoleon and his forces started whispering into the ears of the faculty, all of the various cliques of the campus, the student's parents, and the administration. "Trout!" they whispered, "Trout!"

And suddenly, Trout mania came upon the school! A fountain, made for the purpose of holding various drunk people and Trout, was built in between Bill Smith and Gibson! The paper, in hopes of attracting new editors, renamed itself The Washington College Trout! All of the students acquired a new favorite pastime: saying "Chuck Trout" really fast 10 times in a row! The bookstore began selling Trout tee-shirts, Trout coffee mugs, Trout stationary and stuffed animals! One female student began carrying a Trout-shaped pocketbook around, and a highly respected psychology professor began wearing fish neck ties! The school was given a new motto: "Carp et diem, Seas the day!" The college also got a new official school song, sung by Beatles:

Now shake it up baby
(Shake it up baby)
Twist and Trout!

"Beyond the shadow of a Trout," Brenda-the-butterfly said, "Something fishy is going on...."

Concert And Art Exhibition Highlight Women Artists

English pianist and composer Elaine Hugh-Jones once asked the famed conductor, Sir Thomas Beecham, why he didn't play her music. "You're a woman," he replied, "and there are no women composers."

The Washington College Community Chorus will help to disprove this false belief when it performs music of three centuries by ten women composers in its fall concert, Friday, November 15 at 8 p.m. The concert under the direction of Associate Professor of Music Kathleen Mills, will be held in Norman James Theatre of William Smith Hall at Washington College in Chestertown, and is free and open to the public.

"From A to Z: Celebrating Women Composers" is part of an ongoing series of events celebrating the 100th anniversary of coeducation at Washington College. The concert will feature composers from Renaissance Italian Vittoria Aleotti to contemporary American Ellen Taaffe Zwilich, the first female to be awarded the prestigious Pulitzer Prize for musical composition. The chorus will perform several pieces by Felix Mendelssohn's sister Fanny Mendelssohn Hensel, whose musical talents, although comparable to her famous brother's, were discouraged by her family and only lately have been reconsidered.

Of literary interest are settings of three poems by Oscar Wilde, composed by Emma Lou Diemer, and settings of a number of poems by the contemporary American "Black Mountain" poet Robert Creeley, by Libby Larsen. Additional works include the Kyrie from a Mass composed by Amy Cheney Beach and the seasonal "Thanksgiving Song" by Ellen Taaffe Zwilich.

Guest percussionist Dale Trusheim, 1972 graduate and former Director of Institutional Research at Washington College, will be joined by pianist Professor Garry E. Clarke and student flutist Greg Hickman in the Larsen works. Alumni performing vocal solos include Diane Landskroener, Gina Braden, John McDanolds and J. S. Edward Tatnall. The chorus will be accompanied by harpsichordist Robert Tyson, gamba player Tom Anthony and a flute trio in music by several 17th-century Italian composers. For more information about the fall chorus concert phone 778-2800, ext. 358 or ext. 402.

The Incidental Image will be exhibiting photographs by Constance Stuart Larrabee at the Gallery at the Chestertown Bank, 211-213 High Street, Chestertown. The exhibit will be open through December 2, and the hours are Monday-Thursday, 9 am-3 pm, Friday, 9 am-7 pm, Saturday, November 30, 1-4 pm.

Lectures Range From India's Caste System to Chesapeake Bay

John Cumberland, Professor of Economics emeritus at the University of Maryland and a Visiting Professor of Environmental Economics at Washington College, will lecture on "Saving the Chesapeake Bay: An Environmental Perspective," Monday, November 11 at 4:30 p.m. The lecture, sponsored by the Joseph McLain Program in Environmental Studies, will be given in the Dunning Lecture Hall at Washington College in Chestertown. Admission is free and the public is welcome to attend.

Professor Cumberland enjoyed a distinguished career as an economist at the University of Maryland, and has concentrated recently on environmental issues related to the economy. He has taught and lectured on economics and the Chesapeake Bay at Washington College and the Heron Point Laboratories in Cambridge, and in the spring semester he will be teaching a course on Environmental Economics at Washington College.

The Goldstein Program in Public Affairs at Washington College will present a two-part lecture series on "South Asia in Transition," Monday, November 11 and Tuesday, November 19. On Monday, November 11, Arjun Appadurai, Chair of South Asian Regional Studies at the University of Pennsylvania, will lecture on "Ethnicity and Caste in Contemporary India." The lecture, which is free and open to the public, will be at 7:30 p.m. in the college's Hynson Lounge.

Dr. Appadurai, a cultural anthropologist who has written extensively on the caste system in India, will explain the evolution of the caste system and its importance to Indian religion and culture. He will address such contemporary issues as the impact of the caste system on modern politics, the women's movement, and a changing social structure in India today.

The second lecture of the series, "Democracy and Discontent in India," will be given by Atul Kohli of Princeton University on November 18.

The Women's Issues Group is sponsoring a lecture by Dr. Ralph Surette, Ph.D. on "Power and Control in the Workplace," on Friday, November 15 in the Casey Academic Forum. It will address the topics of power sturggles and gender and authority and resistance to authority. The lecture begins at 6:30 pm and discussion will follow at 7:30. For more information on the lecture or the group in general, call Lynn Clifford at 778-2800.

A Dream Play Set Down In Phoebes

by Cindy Young

For those of you who aren't familar with various drama terms, Phoebes is the area under the stage in Tawes Theater, where the latest drama production, A Dream Play, will be performed this week. It may seem rather unusual to have a play underneath a stage instead of on a stage, but according to director Dei Riegal, the nature of the play calls for something a just little bit different.

August Strindberg, the author of A Dream Play, had his own theater built, the Intimate Theater, which was very small, as the name suggests. The traps of the stage will be open down in Phoebes', and the characters in the play will have a lot of space above them that is unused. All of the black space will be used as a chalkboard, and during the course of the play, the characters will draw their own set. Everything, costumes and set, is done in black and white. Due to the pillars which partially block the view of the audience seating, everyone will see a different view of the play and may see some parts clearly, but not others. The total atmosphere will give the play a dream-like quality, as the name suggests.

Phoebes' has been used for drama productions in the past, such as Vinegar Tom and Apple Tree, and years ago there was a group called Phoebes' Productions.

A Dream Play will be performed on Friday and Saturday. Reservations are required, and seats still available. For reservations call ext. 269.

This Week's Shocking Pro Picks

by Greg and Ms. Greene

This week's pro picks will be done differently. "Jules" Greene is calling me a fraud. She is an aspiring sportswriter with a lot of nerve. I have decided to give her a little paper time and allow her to make predictions with me, despite the fact that she thinks the Super Bowl "is a big event on the Pro Bowler's tour" and Lord Stanley's Cup "is a new brand of athletic supporter." God, I'm glad I didn't ask her who Magic Johnson is@*??6669! Anyway here be the picks.

Atlanta +11 over WASHINGTON. "I loved Gone With the Wind, and I'm still fuming over the Braves loss. Ms. Greene is a big Falcons supporter. (They will lose by less than 11 and I agree, though on different terms.)

NEW ORLEANS +4 over San Francisco. The new Niners quarterback is Steve Bono, and upon discovering this Ms. Greene said "That guy and Cher were funny as s—t! Wait a minute, did he ever play football?" We both say take New Orleans with the points.

GREEN BAY +8 over Buffalo. Ms. Greene likes the Bills. She says that "with a skull cap, Jim Kelly looks just like the bald-headed dude on the new Star Trek show." She says take Buffalo and give the points but I say back the pack and take points.

HOUSTON -8 over Dallas. I say take Houston and give the points. (They will win by more than 8) A confused Ms. Greene said, "I thought that show was cancelled already, but I think J.R. Ewing is a hell of a quarterback.

Pittsburgh +1 1/2 over CINCINNATI. There has been team dissension in that Coach Sam Wyche was chosen over Bengal QB Boomer Esiason to play the part of the grapes guy in a new Fruit of the Loom underwear commercial. Ms. Greene said, "Oh, man, that's harsh. Whoah! Are they having any more auditions for the other fruits? I always wanted to be the plum." We both say take Pittsburgh.

Philadelphia +1 1/2 over CLEVELAND. Ms. Greene said it best when she said, "Why does McMahon wear that visor? He's hot but I can never see his face. I'm not quite as excited over McMahon but I say take Philadelphia too.

Detroit -3 1/2 over TAMPA BAY. Ms. Greene's response: "Oh c'mon dude, they're playing Tampa Bay. My grandmother could beat Tampa Bay. In addition to the foresaid comment, the Lions have averaged 39 minutes of ball possession a game, and the play of their middle and outside linebackers has been exquisite." I agree. Take Detroit.

Indianapolis +13 over N.Y. JETS. I think the spread is too much, but Jules said "a dyslexic person could pick the Jets and still win on the point spread." She says take the Jets (NY wins by more than 13 or 31) and I say take Indy (they lose by less than 13).

L.A. RAMS +4 over Kansas City. The Chiefs always seem to have problems against the NFC. Jules thinks Jon Robinson needs a hair transplant. She suggests "Chiahead." I say take the Rams (they will lose by less than 4), Jules says go Chiefs (they will win by more than 4).

Seattle -1 over SAN DIEGO. "Why is it only one! Is it grandmother's day in Seattle and Dave Krieg's lettin' old grandma call the shots?" said a P.O.'d Ms. Greene. We both like the Seahawks, and Jules especially likes the cute little birdhead on the helmet. (Chris Vaughn donation.)

MIAMI -7 over New England. I feel Miami's defense is coming around, therefore I have to like them by more than a touchdown. Ms. Greene, on the other hand, exclaimed, "All I care about is just seeing Danny [Marino] with his isotoner gloves, but no other clothes." But unfortunately, that won't happen until Christmas. So she likes NewEngland to keep it under 7.

MINNESOTA -3 over Chicago. Ms. Greene went into a frenzy on this one, telling of a psychadelic dream she had where she was drowning in grape soda and being eaten by purple trolls like the ones in the "Billy Goat's Gruff." Therefore she finds it difficult to root for squads with Nehi grape-like uniforms. She likes Chicago with points and I like Minnesota.

Ms. Greene's big college upset pick: "West Virginia over Miami or I Cheese Whiz wrestle The Fridge for 20 minutes."

New-Look Swimming Gets Early Test in Goucher

A press release submitted by Kim Lessard

Washington swim mentor Kim Lessard will rely on a strong senior class and a promising crop of newcomers to battle their way through another tough MAC slate in '91-'92.

Two-time All-American senior Kasey Carroll will lead the women with help from classmates Leslie Newcomb and Joan Colton. Carroll will again be a force for the Shorewomen in the long distance freestyles, the individual medleys, the butterfly, and relay events. Newcomb is an accomplished breaststroker, holding school records in two events, and Colton has great endurance in the fly events.

Sophomores Mimi Devlin and Jennifer Green head the underclassmen, each coming off brilliant freshman debuts. The twosome placed in five individual events in last year's MAC championships. Fellow sophs Magdelena Fuchs (a member of all three relay records last year) and Ramsey Bigham, and junior Karen Prendergast also figure to contribute. Incoming freshmen Amy Draper (Lake Forest (DE) High School), a sprint specialist, and Deidre Swinden (Wissahicken (PA) High School), a butterfly/backstroker, could have an immediate impact, along with Beverly Diaz at breaststroke. Also joining the team are a pair of upperclass crew members, Nancy Whiteman and Stina Sturges, and junior field hockey star Eleanor Shriver. All three have had previous swimming experience and should help add to the depth of this year's squad.

The men will be paced by co-captains Brian Basso, a hard working freestyler whose leadership paid dividends for last year's inaugural squad, and Troy Petenbrink, who can swim a variety of events. Juniors Jarrod Wunderlich, a record holder in three events, Andy McKim, a breaststroke specialist, and sophomore freestylers Alex Nasjletti and Mike Frey return to give Washington an experienced nucleus. An impressive list of recruits, including David Cola (a YMCA national qualifier out of Dover (DE) High School), Tyler McCarthy (Shepaug Valley (CT) High School), Jason Campbell (Middle Township (NJ) High School), Tim Whittier (Bridgton (ME) Academy), Chris Freishheim (Abington (PA) High School), David Czeka (Huntington (NY) High School), and Mike Bowman (Newport Prep (MD) High School) figure to provide immediate help in the Shoremen waters. Coach Lessard believes that "we will see quite a lot of records set in the first meet. Saturday will be an interesting contest since the men lost to Goucher last year." Be there tomorrow at 1:00 in Casey.

Washington Has a Sailing Team?

by Keith Daniels

Yes, we do have a team, although most people are unaware of this fact. It has been in existence for the past three years and this year is the team's best so far. This year's team currently centers around six core members: Freshmen Jason Campbell and J.K. Delahay, Sophomores Wistie Wurts and Michelle Vandernat, and Juniors Keith Daniels and John Wyman. Team Captain Wyman is the only returning member from last year. The sailing Sho'men are coached by former Olympic sailor Dave Pratt.

The team competes intercollegiately in Area C of the Mid-Atlantic Intercollegiate Sailing Association, and has been to three regattas this fall season as well as hosting another. Washington College hosted another invitational regatta last weekend on Saturday, November 2. It began at 9 a.m. at Truslow boathouse. Racing continued the rest of the morning and into the early afternoon. The Sho'men soundly defeated both visiting teams from Salisbury State and George Washington Universities to take the honors in both the Laser and intercollegiate 420 classes.

The team is also looking for more members in order to expand the program for the spring season. No experience is necessary, just a sincere desire to join in the camaraderie of competitive sailing. If you are interested in joining the team, please contact either John Wyman or Dave Pratt at the boathouse at extension 324.

Stunning Sting in Soccer Finale!

by Chris Vaughn

In the immortal words of Gomer Pyle — Surprise, Surprise, Surprise!! That's right, they may have waited for the final call to do it, but the Shoremen finally took one! The losses of two out of their last three games, one to #12 Haverford and one to MAC foe Hopkins, are unimportant because the real focus belongs on the big, BIG win versus Delaware Valley.

It was early in the first period when the WC boys, excuse me . . . men, took hold with a strike by John "Flipper" Seal. The WAC fans, who endured intense, bitter, freezing, cheek reddening, down right mildly cold weather, wouldn't see another score until the second period when Caperton Beirne plowed one home and then was shortly followed by a stinger from Gilbert Orser. The nets remained settled as the final score showed the Shoremen had managed to rack up a few and double their season tallies with a victorious final of 3-0. On top of that, the Iron tapestry managed to shut out an opponent for the first time this season.

It was a reversal of fortune if you will! It's just too bad this possible win streak started at the end of the season. I shed a silvery tear as one of the fans said, "Notice how the reddish brown sun clips behind the barren trees represent not only the end of a day, but the end of a memorable game and the end of an unbelievable season."

Kent Circle Open

by Karyn Iacangelo

The SGA meeting of November 5 provided Dorm senators a chance to voice their opinions as well as their residents opinions on the smoking ban. The issue of parking was also discussed and Senator Emily Daignault submitted a parking report which was approved by the executive board. Also discussed was the issue of carry-out trays used in the Dinning Hall.

Senator Skip Gibson brought up the motion to have the smoking ban reviewed. A vote was taken and smoking will still be prohibited in the Dinning Hall.

Senator Emily Daignault submitted a parking report which stated; "The Kent Circle Lot will open up to public use on Friday November 8. The lot will consist of three repainted Handicapped spaces, and the regular spaces. The reopening of this lot was decided by President Trout and the Executive council of the school on October 23." "A stop sign will be placed at the top of the Dorchester Lot, where it turns onto the driveway towards the Cardinal Dorms. This problem was well known by the administration and they have communicated that the sign will be there soon." The final point made in the report was,"The current dilemma of the amount of parking in the Reid, Minta Martin, and Queen Anne/Caroline area was discussed at length. A number of options are being considered."

Concerning the issue of sick-trays in the dining hall, a survey will be sent out to see what students want. At the Products Show last week, the students polled stated that they want the same kind of tray that exists now. Senator Stephanie Lee announced that there will be another products show in two weeks.

Along with these three issues, Senators Lynn Clifford and Lisa Pruett discussed the NACA Conference that they attended with Student Activities Director, Terri Turmel. They had the opportunity to attend various workshops on Leadership Training and Education.

The CIA also discussed their upcoming trips to Washington D.C., for the "Circa 1492 Exhibit, and to New York for Christmas shopping. These two trips will be on November 16th and November 23rd respectively.

The Kent Circle Lot will be closed on Friday afternoon and will be reopened on Saturday afternoon,due to a prior commitment for a Hodson Hall event.

State Budget Cuts May Be Good for WC

by Sherry Menton

At the faculty meeting held this Monday, President Trout as part of his introductory remarks stated that the "whopping tuition increases" that will have to be instituted by state universities in Maryland in order to combat the state's budget cuts could be good news for Washington College. As public education becomes more expensive, the repercussions may translate into increased interest in Washington College and other private institutions.

Ten architects are currently under consideration for the contract to build a new classroom building and renovate Bill Smith Hall, according to Professor Cades, Faculty Representative to Buildings and Grounds. That number will be narrowed down to four, and those four will be invited to campus to tour the sites, after which they will submit formal proposals.

It was announced that Professors Creegan, Anderson, Horne, and Shivers have been granted sabbaticals for next year. Faculty enhancement awards, which assist the selected professors in their out-of-the-classroom scholarly endeavors, were granted to Professors Wagner, Kirtchner, Schultz, Clarke, DeProspo, and Kaplan. It was also announced that Professor Emilie Amt has been awarded a book contract for her manuscript about the lives of medieval women, that Professor Jay Wright has recently had one article published and another accepted for publication, and that Professor David Newell was recently interviewed on the Voice of America.

Security Moves Off-Campus

by Jason Truax

In order to obtain more space, Washington College Security is moving to a new location, the old Kent County Recycling Center behind Cardinal A, and adjacent to the Kent County Health Center. The move should be completed by the middle of next week.

Currently, Security occupies only two rooms of the Spanish House. The Director of Security, Jerry Roderick, shares his office with a work study student, and his secretary, which tends to make conducting confidential interviews extremely difficult. The other room is an officer's lounge with a small closet-like room for making campus keys. The space that Security is vacating will be turned over to the Dinning Hall which also is cramped for space.

The new location should allow for better efficiency due to a larger working environment. The new location will consist of two offices, a separate room for making keys, and a reception area which the secretary and work study student will share.

Students may be concerned about Security's accessibility to campus, but Director Roderick assures that this will not pose a problem. There will not be a significant change in Security's performance. Things will be positive in that the work environment will improve, and the ability to react to campus emergencies will not decrease. Up to this point, response time to emergencies has been good. Even though Security is now located on Washington Avenue, their vehicles will have no problem pulling out because they will not have to pull out across lanes of traffic, and Security will have no problem getting to the scene. The Security vehicles use will become more prevalent.

Planned for the near future are exterior phones which will be placed at strategic locations around campus, including inside the Spanish House's back door which will remain open 24 hours a day so student's can call Security while remaining safe. When a student dial's security's extention, 310, it will go to the office and if closed, the call will go to the officer's radio who is on duty.

Security officers must make judgments as to how serious some calls are. Priority will of course be given to the most serious, being cases of student endangerment and criminal offenses, and in most of these cases, the police respond as well.

Director Roderick reports that it is the student's responsibility to report any strange happenings. According to Roderick, this is the kind of environment that makes for a crime safe community. The biggest successful factor for a Security Department is not what they are doing, but it is whether or not the community that they are working in, works with them.

More ConstructionUnderway

by Karyn Iacangelo

As students walk from Bill Smith to the Casey Academic Resource Center to get their mail, they may have noticed the obstructed pathway they are forced to take. Construction has once again begun on the Washington College Campus.

The planned walkways should be completed by Thanksgiving according to Reid Raudenbush, Director of Physical Plant for the Maintenance Department and should give students their freedom once again to roam where they please between Bill Smith and the Casey Building.

Sod is also going to be placed around the walkways. The sod was obtained from Anthony's here in Chestertown. It is being used in placed of grass seed because it is too late for the grass seed to germinate.

Dr. Baer Returns to Present Lecture About Women Diarists

As part of its celebration of a century of coeducation, Washington College will present Dr. Elizabeth Baer lecturing on "'A Little Piece of a Secret:' Four Virginia Women Diarists," Wednesday, November 20 at 7:30 p.m. in the Casey Academic Center Forum. The lecture is free and the public is encouraged to attend.

Elizabeth Baer, who is on leave as Dean and Provost of Washington College, is at work on a book on the same subject as her lecture, under the auspices of a grant from the Virginia Foundation for the Humanities. Much of her recent research and teaching has been devoted to the subject of women's autobiography.

Dr. Baer will discuss the diaries of four Virginia women written between 1787 and 1882. Lucinda Lee, an ancestor of Robert E. Lee, wrote about a number of visits to Virginia plantations in 1787. Lucy Beck kept a diary as a teenager in Front Royal, Virginia, from 1861-1865; her writings include reminiscences of several Civil War battles, and the appearance of Robert E. Lee on her family's porch after the battle of Gettysburg. Georgiana Gholson Walker, wife of a Confederate blockade-breaker, also kept diaries during the war as she travelled, often in great personal danger, with her husband from Richmond to Bermuda, Nova Scotia and England. The fourth diary, from 1882, is by 14-year-old Daisy Williams, who died of pneumonia in 1884; her family founded Sweetbriar College as a memorial to her.

Baer's talk, which will be illustrated with slides, will include readings from the diaries, a discussion of the women's lives in a historical context, and an exploration of the ways in which such diaries can be used by historians to understand women's consciousness. "The diaries provided these women with a private means to rail against the stereotypes of the 'Southern Belle,'" says Baer, "we can see their independent personalities evolve beyond the normal expectations of such women in society."

Economic Solutions to Saving the Bay Proposed

by Julie Greene

This past Monday afternoon Dr. John Cumberland, Professor of Economics, emeritus, University of Maryland College Park, spoke on "Saving the Chesapeake Bay: an Economic Perspective." Professor Cumberland will be a Visiting Professor of Environmental Economics at Washington College in the spring. He has also lectured at Horn Point Laboratories in Cambridge. Currently, Cumberland has an office at the Chesapeake Bay Laboratory on Solomons Island.

Professor Cumberland reported that although protective laws have been passed and millions of dollars have been spent on the Bay, it has not recovered sufficiently from the damage it has received in past decades. The amount of pollution and oyster beds dying has increased, and by 2020 a 20-25% increase in the population who will want to settle on the water near the Bay and its tributaries will add to the degeneration of the Bay.

Cumberland stressed four basic factors contributing to the deterioration of the Bay: pollution; the mismanagement of fisheries; the increase in population near the Bay; and state and government programs.

The first, pollution, damages the water quality. One of the fundamental' laws of thermodynamics implies that we cannot get rid of waste once it is created. The problem is what we do with this waste. Currently the absorption of pollution by air and water is treated by the public as a free good.

Cumberland mentioned that pollution is an externality. An externality, according to economist A.C. Pigou's Welfare Economics is a transaction that affects third parties and involves extra costs which no one pays for directly. Pigou's solution to this problem was to tax externalities. Cumberland agrees that taxation and not regulation would be the better option. Taxes would give manufacturers incentive for research and development of safer products and production methods, and place incentives on consumers to buy more environmentally safe products. For example, a tax on gasoline would encourage consumers to purchase more environmentally sound cars, which would get better mileage. A problem with taxation is determining where the tax should be placed. He admits taxation is not a popular remedy and that is one reason economics is called the 'dismal science.'

The second factor contributing to the deterioration of the Chesapeake Bay is the mismanagement of fisheries. The heart of the problem economically is the absence of property rights to the fisheries. Pareto optimality states that to warrant the introduction of an improvement, the benefits must provide enough advantages to compensate any losers. If the rights were transferable, watermen could use, sell, or pass them onto their heirs.

Again management is being regulated, but inefficiently. Current regulations include limiting seasons for oyster harvesting and regulating gear and technology. Greater attention

OPINION/EDITORIAL

A Practical Look at the SWO

The Sophomore Writing Obligation is an institution that has been oft-discussed in Elm's of past years, and this year's staff would like to propose yet another change in the Writing Lab requirement.

The Writing Lab serves a vital purpose. Many students will not submit a paper for a grade without first taking it to the Lab for the comments and criticisms of a tutor. Sometimes these people can't get the appointment times they need in order to have their papers critiqued because sophomores who are out to fulfill their obligation, not to get genuinely wanted assistance, are cluttering up the appointment calendars of the tutors.

Abolishing the SWO is definitely not an option. First of all, many students who now are obliged to attend at least three hours of sessions would not, if left to their own devices, take advantage of the Writing Lab at all. No matter how good the writer, there is always something to be learned that students who would scorn the Lab would miss out on.

The real question, then, is if a Sophomore Writing Obligation is the best way to ensure that all students have the opportunity to gain additional insight into their writing style and assistance on graded works. The Elm believes that SWO is not the best way to achieve this goal. During the course of a four year sequence of college, the average student is going to run across a few courses that are very challenging to write for. Unfortunately, there is no guarantee that these will fall conveniently in the sophomore year.

A general requirement of three hours of Writing Lab time (or five or six or however many hours) to be completed by the time of graduation would be more helpful. The ability to pick and choose which papers to seek out assistance with would be of greater benefit to students who are reluctant to take advantage of the Writing Lab. The levelling out of chances at appointment slots would help students who regularly consult the writing tutors.

The danger inherent in this system is that some students will let slide their obligation until their senior year, and then have to scramble around making nuisances of themselves in frantic attempts to complete the graduation requirement. A painless solution to this is for faculty advisors to keep tabs on how many hours their advisees have attended the Writing Lab, in the same way they check to be sure that distribution requirements are well on their way to being fulfilled. Twice a semester students would thus be reminded of their obligation and warned if they were in danger of delaying appointments too long.

Changing the SWO to a general graduation requirement is admittedly a plan that caters to students who, for whatever reason, choose not to take full advantage of the service offered by the Writing Lab. We at the Elm are pragmatists, however, and believe that in enabling such students to get help on papers when they most need it, obligatory (and somewhat perfunctory) appointments will instead be viewed as valuable assistance.

Letters to the Editor

Commentary, Not Censorship, Motivated Letter

To the Editor:

It seems, from your article and comment on my letter of last week (Nov. 8, "'Multiculturalism 101' Flyer Displays Intolerance"), that you have misread my intent. My goal was not to censor the person who posted the flyer entitled "Multiculturalism 101", but rather to prove him or her wrong. In no way was I attempting to censor the author of the blurb, or the person who posted it. I merely wished to express my own arguments as to why these people are wrong, which is why I put, "Think about it," before my name. I could have very easily ripped that poster down, but I left it there, with the intention of responding to it, because I believe that stifling a bad idea is not the way to remove it from our culture. Instead, our culture must stare these ideas down, and come to our conclusion about them, through open discussion. I intended my letter of last week to be an admittedly small step in this process.

Also, don't let anyone fool you into thinking that the Republicans and any other sundry conservatives are really attempting to protect your right to free speech. They have a vested interest in censorship, to protect themselves from the literature of the various liberation movements that threaten conservative white-male power. On the other hand, the "Progressives" have a vested interest in free speech, namely because they are the ones trying to be heard and to gain a voice for themselves and other groups without a solid political voice. While there are a few instances of Mark Twain's, The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, being banned in public schools by liberals who feel that the use of such words as "nigger" would offend black people, the book has been banned far more often by those, almost invariably conservative people, who disapprove of the positive depiction of Huck and Jim's friendship.

Campuses, and the rest of the world will only be rid of, "insensitive and hurtful expression towards women, minorities, and other student groups," when everyone understands the power of words, and chooses not to hurt each other with them, and not to hurt each other at all.

That sounds unlikely, doesn't it? Well, that's the goal of 'multiculturalism', the understanding of other people, so that ultimately, we will not hurt each other. Perhaps, humanity will never reach this goal, but maybe we can lessen the pain we inflict on each other, through mutual understanding.

Again, think about it,
Justin Cann

[Editor's Note: By running the article "Campus Flyers Stir Debate over 'Political Correctness'" along with Mr. Cann's letter to the editor, the Elm did not mean to imply that his comments regarding the multiculturalism flyer were intended as censorship; rather, the article was meant to illustrate that political flyers have become a hot topic on many college campuses other than ours, and that by comparison Mr. Cann and Washington College students should be congratulated for their fairness, broadmindedness, and "non-participation in the latest college trend - intolerance."]

It Just Might Kill us to Cut EMS Funding

To the Editor:

The following essay is an attempt to personalize some very grave statistics that may spell life or death, disability or recovery to a significant segment of the Maryland population, particularly the young. They are the most frequent victims of trauma. By printing this, I hope that people will understand the ramifications of these budget cuts in terms of their potential impact on them and their loved ones.

Sincerely yours,
Prof. Penny J. Fall, NREMT-A

The air is crisp and clear, after the passing shower, with just a hint of the aroma of wood burning... the sun has descended enough to require headlights, but a sliver of the auburn sunset still lingers in the rearview mirror... a perfect autumn evening. How the dog got there, transfixed in the beam of the headlights, is irrelevant, but your reaction is... foot slammed onto the brake, steering wheel yanked to the right to avoid it... and the wet leaves acting like an escalator moving your vehicle inexorably toward the trees.

For many years I have been involved with prehospital emergency care, as an Emergency Medical Technician riding an ambulance, working in emergency rooms, and as a First Aid instructor. I've seen the results of such a scenario over and over again. Nobody wants it, and few expect it, which is why it is labeled an accident!

For more than a decade, with the birth and maturation of the Maryland Institute of Emergency Medical Services Systems (MIEMSS), Maryland residents have been sheltered under the umbrella of the best trauma care anywhere in the world. With Dr. R. Adams Cowley at the helm and Shock Trauma as its flagship, MIEMSS plowed its way through the rough seas churned up by the skepticism and doubt that often accompanies that which is new and different. However, by staying the course, they delivered trauma victims to a safe harbor of the highest level of expertise and an incredible record of success. If you, as a multi-trauma patient, are delivered to a definitive care facility, such as Shock Trauma or a regional trauma center within the "Golden Hour", you have a 90% chance of living versus 50% or less if you arrive at a regular emergency room.

The bumper crumbles first, as bark chips fly into the air, leaving the grill and fender vulnerable. Metal twists as the force generated by the impact careens through the car frame towards the passenger compartment. Its arrival is punctuated by your forehead spiderwebbing the windshield. Like a plastic animal's head on a spring your brain dances the mambo against the rough interior of your skull, and your other vital organs slam against your bones. Your limbs flail away in another weird dance smashing into almost every sharp angle within reach. ("Damn, I should have worn my seat belt.") You know it's only seconds, but is seems like forever before the cascade of noise, impact, and pain delivers you to the blessed peace of unconsciousness.

If such an event happens to you in Maryland during the next few months the following chain of care should occur:

The first link is the person who finds you. Hopefully that someone is trained in first aid, or, at least, can assess the gravity of your predicament, and knows how to call 911.

Once the call is received at Central Alarm, even as the dispatcher is still writing down the particulars, the alarms have been punched alerting the ambulance and fire companies that they are needed. Also, if the information warrants it, Syscom, the state-wide emergency communications network, joins in by getting the State Police Med-Evac helicopter off the pad and on its way.

Consequently, as your grip on life becomes more tenuous, the expert resources of a highly trained, technically sophisticated network of emergency systems are converging on your location.

The white shaft of light "hurts" and you start to try to brush it away, but the pain brought on by even the attempt at movement quickly cancels that idea. As the "fog" begins to lift you are aware of the gently touch and voice that seems to belong to the shadow off your left shoulder. It has a name... you are not alone. Their calming competency is translated into every word and subsequent motion... the IV needle stings as it is inserted into your vein, but pain is relative at this point... the traction stabilizing your head and neck is uncomfortable, but surprisingly reassuring... and when you are moved, packaged better than the most wanted Christmas present, because of the synchronization of the hands that lift your backboard it causes no fear. As you are transported towards the intermittent noise of the helicopter a new face appears, and with it again the serenity invoked by competency.

> "If you... are delivered to... Shock Trauma... within the 'Golden Hour', you have a 90% chance of living versus 50% or less... at a regular emergency room..."

These are the first few steps of the MIEMSS protocols of care, an uninterrupted chain of specialized services, which offers the trauma victim the best possible prognosis: EMTs & Advanced Life Support specialists extricating you front he wreckage and stabilizing you at the scene; the aviation medic continuing your care as you cross the Bay and enter the night skies over Baltimore; and finally the hurried, but gentle "hand-off" into the waiting arms of the Shock Trauma team.

When you look up surrounded by masked faces you feel a little like a quarterback in the middle of a huddle, but you are not calling the plays. Actually, except for the nurse near your head, who is explaining everything that is happening to you as well as taking your medical history, there is very little conversation. Obviously the plays have been practiced many times, and everyone knows their positions without additional coaching. This fluidity of motion continues form the highly specialized admitting area, into the operating room, and then up to the epitomy of intensive care units, where state-of-the-art nursing care is practiced on a one-to-one basis.

The preceding is a somewhat simplistic journey through a very complex, finely tuned process. However, it is this marriage of humanity and technology that works, and together bring about the 90% survival rate alluded to earlier.

That is the good news, and now the bad news... the best trauma care system in the world is about to be decimated, because of the proposed budget cuts brought on by the State's financial woes. At this time, November, 1991, 63% of the present EMS budget is on the chopping block. Nothing is sacred, whether it is EMT training and certification at the local firehouse, that helicopter trip to the appropriate care facility within the Golden Hour, or even Shock Trauma.

If we allow such massive cuts to take place the 10-year-old son who takes a "header" over the handlebars of his bike, the grandfather lying beneath his overturned riding mower, the mother sprawled unconscious on he concrete floor at the bottom of the cellar stairs, or the college student sent flying by the car at the crosswalk will have few, if any, options. We will be going back to the future, to the "swoop and scoop" brand of care, and the "hearse as the ambulance" mentality.

What to do? What MUST we do?

1. Each of us must come to the realization that this is not a select constituency issue, but has the potential of involuntarily effecting any man, woman, or child living in or passing through the State of Maryland.

2. Each of us must contact your legislators and Governor William Donald Schaefer and let them know, in the strongest language possible, of our concerns and downright fear at the removal of this safety net.

3. Each of us must give generously to the local rescue squad and/or fire company, so that, at least, the "front line troops" can afford to remain current in both training and equipment if the present state funding is lost.

Finally, it may mean "biting the financial bullet" and finding alternative ways to support this life saving system... an EMS trust fund with monies gathered from various sources, such as an additional penny/gallon on the gas tax, or $0.25 per month on the phone bill, or a means to actually earmark a small portion of our state "tax bite" to this fund...

Whatever the answer is, think of it as taking out an insurance policy on yourself, your family,your friends and neighbors. If you do, as the early seatbelt ads use to state, THE LIFE YOU SAVE MAY BE YOUR OWN!

QUESTION - Do you think that Washington College is attentive enough to the potential health and safety hazards in its dormitories?

Tanya Allen
Trumbull, CT
Sophomore

I think that the college could be more attentive— especially because when one has a problem after regular school hours it's often hard to get a hold of health service people, counselors, & even RA's— Health Services should be open on weekends, especially.

WASHINGTON COLLEGE

Greg Coss
Bethesda, MD
Senior

I think that the Colege should raise some of its safety standards. The dorm rooms should all have smoke detectors, and they should be checked regularly.

Curtia Arnold
Edgewood, MD
Freshman

I think Washington College is attentive enough to health and safety hazards in dorms. The only ones who create problems are the students and we should be more aware of the hazard we create everyday.

Victoria Homan
Chestertown, MD
Freshman

I can't really say [about dorm safety] because I live off campus, but I think it was a bad idea to move security off campus.

Heather Feezer
Sophomore

I think that the colege does not take enough safety precautions. THey don't check our appliances or anything before we start [school].

Greg Hickman
Huntingtown, MD
Senior

I think that they're doing OK, but there's always room for improvement.

US-European Boycott Attempts to Halt Violence in Yugoslavia

NETHERLANDS

The U.S., in an effort to stem the fighting in Yugoslavia, has joined the European economic sanctions against Belgrade; suspending trade concessions, banning imports of Yugoslav textiles and striking Yugoslavia from a list of aid recipients in Eastern Europe. The U.S. will also cosponsor a U.N. resolution that could lead to an oil embargo. In a speech at the conclusion of a meeting of the European Community, Bush addressed the problems of Yugoslavia in the context of growing nationalism in Eastern Europe, along with two other elements that could be dangerous: an inability to move into a period of peace following the Cold War and failure to meld divergent forces into cooperative trade agreements.

Magic Johnson, star of the Los Angeles Lakers, announced last week that he had just discovered that he was infected with the AIDS virus and was quitting basketball. He has now become a spokesman for AIDS prevention, helping young people "understand that safe sex is the way to go" and telling the country not to be afraid of HIV-positive people. Johnson indicated that he had gotten the virus through heterosexual sex. Doctors say that it may take 10 years or more for Johnson's AIDS symptoms to show up, although when they do they will invariably lead to the full disease and death.

It is said that by 2000 there may be 40 million people infected with the virus.

why are these poor people in WAC HELL? what are their sins? (josephine asked as she and Big Fly flew over another section of WAC HELL– one in which students were trying, in vain, to get across the construction in between bill smith and gibson.)

well, (said Big Fly, pointing to people randomly) that hippieish one over there once illegally read poetry in the graveyard at midnight; and that frat guy there smoked a cigarette in the college dining hall; and that girl who just got her shoes muddy from the dirt around the construction brought food into the library once; and that guy with the glasses stole several street signs; and those 4 over there refused to give blood during a blood drive; and that short blond chick once stole change from her roommate because she was hungry and wanted to buy a snickers from the vending machine; and that one over there used her mystic harold a bit too many times.

yeah, one of those' magic dollars' used to fool the vending machines into giving free food. all the other people are here because they committed the sin of drinking alcohol when they were under the age of 21.

horrors!

shocking, eh? i can't believe anyone would do something like that. but, come now, it is time to show you WAC HEAVEN. follow me! (the two flew up, up, up, up, up, up, up, up, up, up, up, up, up, up, up, up until they came to a classroom door.)

this is it? (josephine asked) do we go through the door?

no, (said Big Fly,) just read the sign on it. (there was a little note tacked to the door which read 'prof. __________'s 2:30 class cancelled, due to a regrettable illness.' as josephine read the sign she felt an incredible rush of bliss....) HEAVEN. (Big Fly said, nodding.) this is WAC HEAVEN.

Meanwhile,

The WAC bugs were giggling over the recent fire they had caused on second floor Kent by rewiring one of the lamps in room 212; and over the alarm they had pulled in Caroline the night after; and over the trouble they had brought to WAC by subliminally bringing on Trout Mania. Because of Trout-Mania the campus had become divided into 2 groups: those who were "pro-fish" and those who were "F.I.N.S.," which stood for "Freedom to Ingest Nautical Species." The pro-fishes raged every time the dining hall served fish– staging demonstrations, waving pictures of fish still in-the-sea and carrying bowls full of goldfish, while the F.I.N.S. stubbornly defended their right to eat fish. Tensions were mounting as a rumor spread, saying that the dining hall might be serving fresh lobster soon....

Middle Eastern Symposia Comes to WC

by Rachael Fink

Starting Wednesday, November 20, Washington College students will have the unique opportunity to hear and talk with some of the nation's leading experts on the Middle East. Several groups on campus are sponsoring The Washington College Middle East Symposia Series. Funding has been provided by the W.C. Lecture Series, the Sophie Kerr Committee, the Louis L. Goldstein Program in Public Affairs, the W.C. Women's League, the Eugene O'Neill Literary House and the International House. Topics under discussion will include everything from trade and politics to women's roles in the Middle East.

The first day of the Symposia Series will include two lectures by Washington College professors. At 9:45 a.m. in the Sophie Kerr Room of the Miller Library Professor Don Wierda, a lecturer in the Business Department, will speak about trading with the Arabs. The title of his lecture is "Getting your Products to the East." Professor J. Wright will also be speaking on Wednesday about trade with the Arabs. Wright, an Assistant Professor in the Department of Business Management, will speak on "Banking and Risk Management in the Arabian Gulf." This lecture will be held in the International House at 4:30 p.m..

The topics under discussion Thursday, November 21 will deal with "The Complexity of Middle Eastern Politics." The O'Neill Literary House is sponsoring a lecture and book signing by Dr. Fedwa Malti-Douglas. Dr. Malti-Douglas, the Director of the Comparative Literature Program at the University of Texas at Austin will be speaking on "Nawal El Saadawi: Leading Egypt's Women Writers" in the Casey Academic Center Forum at 3 p.m. The lecture will deal with Malti-Douglas's upcoming book concerning Nawal El-Saadawi's The Fall of the Imam. This is one of the most controversial novels ever published in Egypt. Professor Malti-Douglas's 1991 book Woman's Body, Woman's Word has been praised highly as the definitive source on the use of feminine imagery in Arabic literature. She has published numerous other books and edited two collected works, all of which have vaulted her to the position of one of this country's most notable Arab-American scholars.

Thursday's second lecture will be held in the Casey Academic Center Forum at 4:30 p.m.. The lecturer, Alan Douglas is currently teaching French and Middle Eastern Studies at the University of Texas at Austin. Professor Douglas specializes in Francophone political influences on Northern Africa and the Middle East. He has written several books, including From Fascism to Libertarian Communism: George Valois Against the Third Republic and Arab Comic Strips: The Politics of an Emerging Mass Culture, and he will speak on "The Comic Minority: Les Beurs in Strips."

The third lecture on Thursday is titled "The Papacy and the Middle East," and will be given by George Irani, Chair of the Franklin College Department of Political Science and Director of the College's International Studies Program. The lecture will be held in the Casey Academic Center Forum at 7:30 p.m., and will cover Irani's most recent book of the same name. Dr. Irani gained much of his expertise concerning the Middle East as the Director of the Center for Mideast Studies at the College of Saint Rose, as a writer for the Catholic Near East Welfare Association and as a correspondent for Italian State Television covering the Lebanese Civil War. Some of Dr. Irani's other publications include numerous articles on the Middle East, Lebanon, and Southern Europe as well as several books.

Friday's lecture series, titled "Women in the Middle East" is being sponsored by the Women's League of Washington College. Both of the lectures and the panel discussion will be held in the Sophie Kerr Room of the Miller Library. A Middle Eastern Buffet will be held in Hynson Lounge at 12:30 p.m. All events are free to students but a $15 charge to the public will cover the Friday series which includes the Middle Eastern Buffet.

The first lecture, at 10:30 a.m. is titled "Sara and the Hyena: Laughter, Menstruation and the Development of a Double-Entendre." The speaker, Suzanne Pickney Stekevych, has a reputation as America's outstanding young orientalist. She has published a book, Abu Tammam and the Poetics of the Abbasid Age, and several articles on Arabic Poetry. These articles include "The Abbasid Poet Interprets History: Three Qasidahs by Abu Tammam;" The Archtype and Attribution in Early Arabic Poetry;" "Pre-Islamic Panegyric and the Poetics of Redemption;" and "Toward a Redefinition of badi' Poetry."

Ms. Al-Tarrahi, a member of the Embassy of Kuwait will give the second lecture at 11:30. "Under Siege: Women and the Liberation of Kuwait" will examine women's roles in the Persian Gulf War.

The final event scheduled for The Washington College Middle East Symposia Series is a panel discussion, to be held at 1:30 p.m. The topic, Women in Today's Middle East will be discussed by Professor Janet Kestenberg-Amighi, a Visiting Assistant Professor of Anthropology, Lauri King, a former Aid of Middle Eastern Affairs for Senator George McGovern and Professor J. Wright.

South Asia in Transition

by Eve Zartman and Jason Truax

How would you react if you were told you were beneath someone - not do to your actions - but due to your lineage? A person cannot control his/her birth or what family he/she is born into. Without a chance for a rebuttal, a person is are labeled for the rest of his/her life. This issue was discussed at the forum "South Asia in Transition: Ethnicity and Caste in Contemporary India," sponsored by the Goldstein Program in Public Affairs. The guest speaker was Dr. Arjun Appardurai, the Chair of the South Asian Regional Studies Department at the University of Pennsylvania. He explained India's caste system and described the more modern conflict of ethnicity, which presently plagues the society.

The caste system has been in effect in India for many centuries. It is a system that puts individuals into definite social levels. The lower castes are representative of workers and peasants. The middle castes are the more educated and are more financially independent. The upper classes, the highest being the Brahmin, are the religiously faithful. If people are good during their lifetime they are reborn into a higher caste and eventually reach Nirvana or heaven, where the soul finally rests never to be reborn again. People marry within their caste, associate only within that caste, and basically have no reason to do otherwise. But even this traditional structure is undergoing change. The government is attempting a more democratic method of affirmative action in which certain government jobs are reserved for lower castes. The middle and upper castes are upset because jobs are being taken from their hands. Since people are willing to kill over their caste, putting this plan into effect will wreck India's national community.

The ethnic differences once celebrated in Indian society are now looked down upon. India has become a more democratic society because of British colonialism. The British tried to establish a majority in a "land of minorities." The people of India are predominantly Hindu, and the world tends to think of India as a fundamentalist Hindu nation. But the concept of India as a nation with the Hindus as its majority is young. The Hindus have only been united under one identity since the 17th century. Until then, the idea of an "India" did not exist. Because of their control of the government, the Hindus have become more extremist in their views and have enforced the political thoughts of the Hindu majority.

This extremity has in turn inflamed the ancient debate between Hindus and Muslims. These two faiths have fought over religious shrines for years and the debate can never be resolved by theologians or anthropologists. Although the debates still continue, there will never be a winner. The more present problem is that they are now at a more fervent level because of the extreme religious fanaticism majority/minority politics has brought out.

It is hypothesized that the government is attempting to bring out nationalism and suppress sectionalism for the well being of the nation. The method that they are using seems to be causing much conflict. With the changing caste system and the religious fervor causing more conflict, most people seem to feel very uncomfortable and tense about their environment. The people who are supposed to be educated are those who question the changes the most. It is not that they believe they are the powerful majority and that all minorities should be suppressed because every caste and ethnic group in India is a minority. It is that they believe the idea of minorities should be praised - which is the idea they were raised with. As the government tries to group people into larger groups, their goal is to someday group them into a nationalist throng.

Open Seating for Seascape With Sharks and Dancer

by Rachael Fink

For a senior there is nothing more exciting than the completion of the Senior Obligation. One senior is about to be so excited. Next weekend, November 21 - 23, Beth Skinner will finish her senior project. As a Drama Major Beth has had to direct a play to be performed for the public. Other Drama Majors have done the same in the past several months. Ten Little Indians and The Dream Play were both senior projects by Drama Majors. To fulfil her senior obligation, Skinner has chosen to direct Seascape with Sharks and Dancer, by Don Nigro, author of The Reeve's Tale, and The Curate Shakespeare As You Like It.

Seascape with Sharks and Dancer is two act play set in a beach house in late fall. The only two characters are Ben, writer/librarian in his late twenties and Tracy, a girl, about twenty who Ben has rescued from the ocean. Without giving away too much of the plot one can only say that Ben and Tracy develop a rather strange relationship based on love, understanding, and a little self-depreciation. While Seascape is a story about love it does not have the typical romantic boy-meets-girl plot, and it is guaranteed to surprise and entertain.

The stars of this show are Debra Boyer and Steve Brown, both active in the theater but never before on stage. Boyer is currently taking the Acting One course under Dale Dagel. Brown has worked on many shows previous to this one, hanging and adjusting lights, operating the light board and numerous other technical jobs. Both are very excited, if a bit apprehensive about their first stage role.

Assisting Beth Skinner in the production of this play are Heather Lynch, as Stage Manager in charge of organization and continuity backstage, Deidre Riegel, Set Designer, Jason Imber, Technical Director, and Jason West, Carpenter all helping to design and build the set, Shan Driscoll, Lighting Designer making sure there are no shadows on the actors faces, Stephanie Hess and Tarin Towers are both in charge of locating properties needed in the course of the play, Ed Schroeder is the Soundboard Operator, Tony Squires, make-up, Tim Madison, Violence Coordinator, the program and poster art is being done by Steve Brown and Amy Cadle, Karyn Iacangelo is the House Manager in charge of the distribution of programs, Richard McKee is Assistant Stage Manager under Lynch and Rachael Fink is Skinner's Assistant Director advising on the creative aspects of the production. Many other people have and are helping to put together a successful show, so many that it would be impossible to mention each one of them even in passing. In a brief interview Skinner expressed a wish to thank everyone for their help and support.

The show start at eight o'clock on Thursday, the 21 of November and runs until Saturday, the 23. Tickets are free to the public and do not need to be reserved as Skinner elected to have seating in the house of Tawes Theater rather than on stage, as has been done with several of the previous senior productions. Everyone is encouraged to come and is promised a night of entertainment. Parental guidance is suggested as profanity is used and the subject matter is of an adult nature.

Men Set 12 Swimming Records

by Kim Lessard

The men broke twelve school records and held on to the end, but eventually lost to Goucher, 104-98. However, a year ago the Shoremen dropped a sixty point decision to this very same team, making this year's narrow loss encouraging.

Freshman Dave Cola led the men with two outstanding individual first-place finishes and two records in the 100 and 200 meter freestyle events. He joined Tyler McCarthy, Chris Freisheim and Jarrod Wunderlich for a first-place finish and school record in the 200 meter free relay. Tim Whittier won the 200 meter individual medley and finished second in the 100 meter breaststroke, breaking school records in both races. Jason Campbell added two second-place showings in the 50 meter freestyle and 50 meter breaststroke, also breaking two school records.

Freshman Chris Fresheim took nearly five minutes off the 1000 meter freestyle record and placed second while Jarrod Wunderlich eclipsed one minute off the 500 meter freestyle former record in finishing second. Troy Petenbrink added an important third in the 500 meter freestyle while Brian Basso added a second in the 100 meter butterfly and third in the 50 meter freestyle. Tyler McCarthy placed third in the 100 meter backstroke. Dave Czekaj took third in the 1000 meter freestyle.

The 200 meter medley team of Tim Whittier, Jason Campbell, Brian Basso and Tyler McCarthy broke the school record by 15 seconds. It was an exciting start. The men proved they will be knocking on the doors soon of the schools that have had programs for years. They swam very well with five men qualifying for the MAC Championships. Last year no members of the men's team qualified. It's a young team that will keep improving.

Rugby Learns A Lot In 3-Week Stretch

by Ciarbo "Mad Dog Mohawk" O'Keeffe

This week's article covers a three-week span of games for the Washington College Rugby Football Club. The team learned more in these three weeks than it had learned previously throughout the entire season.

The first game was in Philadelphia against Billy Whitemarsh, a well established men's club who was in the national league a couple of years ago. Washington played with valor thanks to noticeable flash photograph-type plays from Seth Engel, who skated by his opponents to score a try, and to the forwards who dominated the game. Despite a substantial loss, the team looked towards the next weekend when they played Wilmington Men's Club.

This particular game was played against the backdrop of the Rugby World Cup Final (England vs. Australia). Wilmington Men's Club was also an established men's club, but Washington learned from the previous game and put up a brave fight with excellent tackles from all players. The player of the game medal had to go to Steve Dadzi, who scored his first try for Washington College in his first game. Again Washington lost and they left the field with the Rugby World Cup Final looming over their heads too (England 6, Australia 12).

The last game in this series was against St. Mary's College, at last a college team. Washington braved the cold weather and a sloping field to compete on the same level as St. Mary's. There was tension throughout the game as both sides attempted to score a try. There was a consistent battle between the fullbacks as they kicked backwards and forwards, psychologically taunting each other. A textbook try was scored by Washington as the ball was passed down the line to Anthony Black, who sprinted for the tryline to lift Washington spirits sky-high. The final score had Washington losing by a try and conversion, and a penalty kick. It was a great game and if the series follows sequence, the home game on Saturday the 16th at 1:00 p.m. against York will prove to be the best of the season. See you there and thanks to everyone who attended the Rugby Benefit.

Editor's Apology

Last week in my pro picks I used Magic Johnson's name in a joke. I am very sorry and hope that no one thinks that I intended to offend this great person. I had no idea that Magic Johnson had acquired the HIV virus when the joke was made, because the paper was completed on Wednesday night. The next day Magic made his announcement. It was an incredible coincidence that makes me wonder about what's going to happen next. With luck like that, I'm waiting to be attacked by an armadillo on 213's crosswalk.

Shorewomen Swimmers Fall Just Short, 103-102

by Kim Lessard

The Washington College women's swim team experienced a heartbreaking loss to Goucher, 103-102, in front of a packed house at the Casey Swim Center last Saturday. The team battled head to head with their opponent up until the last individual event, the 100 meter breaststroke, which Goucher used to take an insurmountable six point lead. But WC didn't quit, as the free relay team of Amy Draper, Ramsey Bingham, Magedelena Fuchs and Jen Green won in the final race, leaving the Shorewomen just one point shy.

Although the Shorewomen were defeated, the squad still had many bright spots to show for their efforts. The 200 meter relay team of Jen Green, Leslie Newcomb, Dede Swinden and Mimi Devlin placed second, and right behind them were Karen Prendergrast, Beverly Diaz, Joan Colton, and Nancy Whiteman, swimming in her first meet.

A strong event for Washington was the 1000 meter freestyle, which it used to take a temporary lead in the meet. Two-time All-American Kasey Carroll took the event while Leslie Newcomb came in second and Stina Sturges placed fourth. The same trio would later post identical finishes in the 500 meter freestyle. Mimi Devlin won the 200 meter freestyle and Magdelena Fuchs came in third. Mimi also placed third in the 100 meter butterfly and Fuchs took third in the 100 meter freestyle.

Freshman Amy Draper placed second in the 50 meter freestyle and 100 meter butterfly. Ramsey Bigham placed third behind her in the 50 meter freestyle and fourth in the 100 meter freestyle. Nancy Whiteman added second in the 100 meter freestyle and fourth in the 100 meter breaststroke.

Jen Green, Karen Prendergrast and Dede Swinden all had personal best times in the 100 meter backstroke to finish second, third, and fifth. I felt it was a tough won to lose, but we didn't have the bodies. The women swam great with 10 already qualifying for the MAC championships in February. We are a good team and will keep improving. Their next home meet will be Wednesday against Salisbury State at 6:00 p.m.

I'm Taking Over

by Ms. Greene (edited for publishing)

Hi everybody, my name is Ms. Greene and I'd like to start my job of picking games by first explaining why I am taking over for Mr. Coss. He is worthless and weak. He knows as much about football as Telly Savalas does about The Hair Club for men. He knows as much about football as David Duke does about "It's Showtime at the Apollo." He knows as much about football as Roseanne does about singing. The chances of him ever beating me in pro pick selections are about the same as Jeffrey Dahmer performing the next comedy act at the Coffee House and titling his performance "Tearin' Ya Apart at the Seams With Laughs, Then Eatin' Ya For Desert Wtih Whipped Cream and a Cherry on Top." In sum, his predictions stink. He went a puny, pitiful 5-7 last week and I was a brilliant7-5. He was so humiliated and subsequently subservient to me that I was able to make him clean my Dog Fifi's poopies (with a reach toothbrush, it took 2 hours and I gave him a five minute break) without a single gripe. Since I am runnin' out of space I will make my prediction: Take Wash. over Pitt. unless you be illiterit.

WC Students Attend NIRSA Conference

by John E. Kelly

On Friday November 8, 1991, Washington College students Joan Colton, Margret Doyle, Kristy Hilgartner, and John Kelly attended the National Intramural-Recreational Sports Association Region 1 conference in Baltimore, Maryland. The conference was held at the Towson Sheraton with over 150 participants attending and representing schools from the University of Maine to the University of Maryland.

Participants attended lectures covering such topics as "Student Leadership Training Programs," "Risk Management and Campus Recreation," and "Water Aerobics." Washington College's own Director of REC Sports, Dennis Berry, was a featured speaker and gave a lecture entitled "Posted Warning: How Effective are Your Signs?" Mr. Berry's lecture discussed the degree of liability schools have in warning participants of dangers and hazardous conditions associated with recreational sporting facilities.

The four students who attended this year's conference were surprised at the level of importance intramural and recreational sports programs held at other institutions, especially the larger universities. Also, the conference enlightened the students to the size of the recreational sports field and the many opportunities that abound within that field. Many schools offer graduate assistantships where the student can pursue post graduate education and work part time as assistant REC Sports directors. Washington College alumnus and All-American basketball player Timothy Keehan is involved in one of these programs at Mount St. Mary's College in Emmitsburg, Maryland. Mr. Keehan will be graduating from Mount St. Mary's this spring with a Master of Business Administration.

In general, the conference was an excellent opportunity for the students involved and provided them with new and challenging ideas to implement in WC's REC Sports Program.

Chesapeake Bay

needs to be paid to oyster students instead of trying to manage the fisheries from a distant bureaucracy.

The third factor of deterioration is the excessive population of people living on or near the water. Their use of garden and lawn chemicals damages the Chesapeake Bay, as does their waste.

Cumberland noted that the private price for water does not reflect fully the ecological cost of the water. The public only pays enough to compensate the seller in the open market. As before, management is through regulation.

One way to counteract this growing waterside population would be to place impact charges or taxes on those who live on the water. The problem with this theory is how to measure the damage residents have on the Bay.

"Externalities from industrial development are considerably more than those from residential development," added Cumberland. There is no longer a justification for putting industrial or commercial developments on the water. Two myths about why it is considered acceptable are that it broadens the tax base and that we cannot stop progress. To find out if the tax base is being broadened a cost-benefit analysis needs to be done. Concerning the second myth, what is progress? Polluting the Chesapeake Bay.

He listed the fourth deteriorating factor to the Chesapeake Bay as government programs. He stated that, "government agencies have their own agendas," such as "increasing their budgets, protecting pensions, and protecting their programs." John Cumberland noted that economist James Buchanan, a past winner of the Noble Prize in Economics, implied that these energy, military, and infrastructure programs are not necessarily in favor of public interest. Nuclear energy is heavily subsidized by the government; however, if a meltdown occurred it would infect the entire Bay.

Professor Cumberland stressed that an interdisciplinary program, including economists and scientists, is needed to save the Chesapeake Bay. Neither can do it alone. He further professed that education is the key to the agenda to saving the Bay. "Perhaps today's students can set an example for environmental management in the United States."

Cumberland praised Washington College for the recent incentives it has provided for environmental studies. These include the addition of the environmental economics course in the spring which was encouraged by Professor Davy McCall, Chairman of the Economics Department, and the Joseph McLain Program in Environmental Studies, coordinated by Dr. Donald Munson , Chair of the Biology Department and curator of the McLain Program. It was the McLain Program in Environmental Studies which sponsored Professor Cumberland's lecture. He also thanked President Trout for integrating these programs.

Library Automation a Reality

by Karyn Iacangelo

The Miller Library's automation system is now a reality and will be operational at the end of January according to Mr. Bill Tubbs, head of the Miller Library.

All the terminals have arrived and will be placed in strategic locations throughout the library. Three terminals will be placed on the first floor where the Card Catalog used to be. Two of the terminals will be equipped with printers. There will also be a terminal placed behind Mrs. Shoge's desk, and one between the indexes and the Periodical Reading Room. On the second floor, in the Seminar room will be two terminals, and in the basement, a terminal will be placed near the Curriculum Center. The terminals will be able to work between all Macintosh's on campus and will be able to have thirty-two users at any one time.

One thing students may have heard a lot of jack-hammering in the last couple of weeks in the library. This is so workers can put in the needed electricity to operate the new automation system.

The library will keep the Card Catalog until such time that the staff feels adequate for students to get used to the new terminals. They will also keep it for their own records. All in all, the automation system is coming and should be a nice addition to the library.

The new terminals will provide students access to Welseley College and Lafayette University as well as many other libraries in the surronding area. The terminal will also be able to tell the user whether or not the book they want is available.

World-Renowned Singers Kristine and Katherine Ciesinski Featured in Concert Series

The 40th anniversary season of the Washington College Concert Series brings to Chestertown, Maryland, a performance by soprano Kristine Ciesinski and her sister, mezzo-soprano Katherine Ciesinski. The third of five concerts to be presented this year for local audiences in Tawes Theater of the College's Gibson Performing Arts Center takes place on Tuesday, December 3rd, at 8 p.m.

The two singers, originally from Newark, Delaware, made musical headlines when they portrayed the two sisters in Cosi fan tutte at the Taipei International Arts Festival and later at the Kentucky Opera. Most recently the two were heard in a duet recital at the Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C. which was nationally broadcast live on radio.

Kristine, who has been described as possessing "the formidable vocal and acting qualities of a great opera tragedian," has performed with many of the leading British opera companies. She had a major success in 1990 as Lady Macbeth in a new production of Verdi's opera directed by David Poutney for the English National Opera in London. Her portrayal received great acclaim from the London public and critics and also from the Soviet press and audiences when she performed the role on tour with the company at the Bolshoi and the Kirov theatres.

She has performed the role of Salome with several leading companies on both sides of the Atlantic, including the Bavarian State Operra in Munich, Canadian Opera Company, English National Opera, Baltimore Opera, Manitoba Opera and Florentine Opera.

This season Kristine Ciesinski debuted at the Bastille Opera in Paris and La Scala in Milan in Shostakovich's Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk. She will also star in the BBC's television production of "The Secret Life of Alban Berg," which is an acting and singing tour de force for the soprano.

Katherine Ciesinski, a mezzo-soprano accomplished in opera, concert, and recital performances around the globe, has been called "a singer of rare communicative presence, and a musician of discrimination and intelligence."

Her work on the opera stage has included Judith in Bluebeard's Castle at the Metropolitan Opera, Laura in La Gioconda with the San Francisco Opera and Miami Opera, and Waltraute in the San Francisco Opera's presentation of Wagner's Ring Cycle.

Sexual Harassment and Sexism Addressed at Campuses Nationwide

(NSNS) While the nation listened to tales of Long Dong Silver and pubic hair on Coca-Cola cans during Clarence Thomas' Supreme Court confirmation, students across the country also began re-examining their own attitudes toward sexual harassment.

Many female students have been active in fighting sexual harassment for a long time. But recently, a growing number of male students have become active in the feminist movement by forming anti-sexism groups on campus to fight what they view as no longer solely "a woman's issue."

"I think the men's groups are a very positive sign," says Rosemary Dempsey, the Action Vice President of the National Organization of Women (NOW). "I think only men can change other men's behavior. What they're doing is a healthy reaction to the incredible increase of sexual crime and violence that has occured in the last 10 years."

While many men's groups are taking direct action on their campuses by holding protests or demonstrations against sexism, others are seeking to educate their fellow classmates. Still other men's groups are simply trying to deal with sexism they see within themselves.

Wanting to help end their own gender's harassment and degradation of women, anti-sexism men's groups from several Boston colleges and universities joined more than 100 college women and faculty members in a demonstration on Oct. 14th outside a pornographic video store that recently opened in the vicinity of three women's colleges.

Male students from schools including Harvard University, Tufts University and Wheelock College took part in the protest organized by the Women's Alliance Against Pornography.

"If men do not speak out against pornography, then it will be the sexist, abusive, and violent men who would come to speak for all men," says Jackson Kaatz, a member of "Harvard Anti-Sexist Men." Jackson, a graduate student researching a thesis on the social construction of violent masculinity in sports and the media, says that because it is men who produce, sell, and buy pornography, it is up to men to stop it.

Wheelock College professor of Women's Studies Gail Dines and special education major Sarah Stevenson, two of the protest organizers, welcome the men's support.

"Men have to confront other men about their collaboration with the pornographers," says Prof. Dines. According to Dines, studies show that pornography increases the rate of rape and aggression by men towards women.

Wheelock junior Stevenson agrees with Dines. "I don't think it is enough for men to say they are against sexual discrimination or harassment" she says. "I think they have to go out and show their support.

Kaatz says the purpose of anti-sexism men's groups is not to take over the women's movement, but rather to make men more responsible for themselves. "Violence should not be what being a man is about," Kaatz says.

Harvard Anti-Sexism Men are involved in speak-outs at high schools and colleges, have picketed outside Andrew Dice Clay and Sam Kinnison concerts because of the comedians' sexist jokes, and have handed out leaflets at sporting events to educate men they feel would otherwise be unable to reach.

The group is also planning to commerate the Dec. 6th Montreal Massacre of 1989, in which a man walked into a classroom at a technical school and killed all the female students. A letter, later found in his pocket, blamed feminists for his troubles.

"We think it is appropriate for us to commemorate the event because the massacre took place on a campus," says Kaatz. "And because it says now more than ever that it's time for men to stand up and defend the women's movement."

Students at Tufts University in Medford, Massachusettes are defending the women's movement by challenging the sexism they see both on their campus and within themselves.

Members of the student group Men Must Understand Sexism at Tufts (MMUST) are confronting their own sexism in a format similar to

SGA Mobilizes Against EMS Funding Cuts

by Sherry Menton

The SGA has resolved to take part in an effort to block Maryland's proposed 63% cut in the Emergency Medical Services budget. Were this budget cut to be enacted, it would mean, among many other things, the elimination of the network that keeps all emergency services in Maryland in contact with each other, a serious reduction in Shock Trauma care, and the elimination of the Medivac program that makes accident victims a short helicopter ride away from the state's best emergency care facilities.

The Eastern Shore would be particularly hard-hit by the cuts, and in recognition of that the SGA will be sponsoring a petition that protests the budget cuts. Students who sign the petition in the Dining Hall next week are encouraged to make a donation of $1.00. The money raised will be donated to the Chestertown Volunteer Fire Department and the Kent/Queen Anne's County Hospital.

Prof. Fall, who along with Prof. Siemen gave a presentation to the SGA about the proposed cuts, expressed a desire to see other colleges across Maryland stage similar campaigns. "You all are more powerful than you think... students between 18 and 22 are registered voters, and most of them are taxpayers as well," she pointed out.

Dean Baer Gives Lecture

by Cindy Young

Dr. Elizabeth Baer presented a lecture Wednesday, November 20, entitled "'A Little Piece of A Secret': Four Virginia Women Diarists, 1787-1882." This is the tentative title for Baer's book, which she is working on this year during her sabbatical and hopes will be published sometime next year. The lecture was part of the celebration of the centenary of coeducation here at Washington College.

"A little piece of a secret" is actually a line from one of the diaries, all of which were written by young southern women. In their diaries they describe their frustrations of growing up with the expectations of society. When most people think of southern women in the antebellum age, they think of the tiny waists, porch swings, and mint juleps, all of which are stereotypes that these women write against in their diaries. These diaries contain intimate and private thoughts and if the authors knew they were being read and discussed by people today, they would probably be shocked and mortified. But a lot about their lives and views of the world around them is revealed in their writing. The journals serve to describe the impact of the Civil War, or "the late unpleasantness," as it is still referred to in some parts of Virginia. Just as Matthew Brady's photographs chronicle the impact of the Civil War on the men, so do these journals chronicle its impact on the women.

Dr. Baer is focusing on the diaries of four women in her book: Lucinda Lee, Georgiana Walker, Lucy Rebecca Buck and Daisy Williams. Lucinda Lee's diary was written in 1787, the earliest of the four, and she is an ancestor of General Robert E. Lee, which is why her diary has been preserved and was first published in 1871. She addresses her comments to a close personal friend, much like a letter, and describes a tour she was on of the homes of friends in Northern Neck, Virginia. She comments on men, clothing, and what books she was reading at the time.

Georgiana Walker was born in 1833 in Petersburg, Virginia, and married in 1852. Her husband served in the Confederate army and she spent much of the war in Bermuda, Nova Scotia and England, as her husband was sent there as part of his duties to the Confederacy. Georgiana had to run the blockade with her three children and another one on the way to join her husband in Bermuda.

Lucy Rebecca Buck was born in 1842 at Front Royal. She was nineteen when she wrote her diary, and it was published in 1940 by a descendent. She lived at Bel Aire, near Winchester, which was occupied alternatively by the Yankees and Confederates sixty-eight or seventy-two times, depending on who is counting. Lucy had battles literally fought in her front yard. She writes of her reading, her anger at the Yankees and her hatred of Lincoln. She ended her diary after the surrender of the Confederacy.

Daisy Williams died very young, and Sweet Briar College was founded in her memory. She started her diary in 1882 when she lived in New York for half a year. Her home was in Sweet Briar, in what is now the current president's house. She describes, among other things, of buying her first corsets, a big event in the lives of young women of the time.

All of these diaries show the frustrations of these women to overcome the stereotypes of southern women and, as Dr. Baer described, their attempts to "push against borders and boundaries" of the Antebellum south.

OPINION/EDITORIAL

All of Washington College Should Unify to Support EMS

During the past two weeks the plight of the embattled Maryland Institute of Emergency Medical Services Systems (MEIMSS) has been brought to the attention of the Washington College community. The most visible effort to protect the MEIMSS from a two-thirds budget reduction has been the SGA's resolution to sponsor a school-wide petition/ fundraiser. Professors Siemen and Fall have sponsored a similar petition among the faculty. Both of these are worthy efforts, of course, but why have the two petitions not been combined? It is as easy to say "We, the faculty, staff, and student body of Washington College" as to have a separate document for each, and perhaps presenting a united front would convince the Governor of the unanimity of our wishes. By definition, accidents do not discriminate on the basis of age, scholarly achievement, or tenure, and neither should our efforts to protect ourselves and each other from the potentially deadly results of accidents, should the Emergency Medical Services (EMS) be withdrawn.

The benefit, and potential loss, of the EMS programs is self-evident. We are not immortal, and here on the Eastern Shore we are very cut off from the state-of-the-art services and technologies that city dwellers take for granted. It is in the interests of everyone who lives here to fight against the one budget cut that could not just inconvenience us, but actually kill us.

The SGA's donation to the Chestertown Fire Hall and to the Rescue Squad of funds collected from student petition signers should go a distance towards refuting allegations that College students are insensitive to the community in which they live.

If other colleges across Maryland will mobilize in similar efforts to block the EMS funding cuts, there is a markedly improved chance that the cutbacks will be reconsidered. Even if this does not occur, however, the concerted effort being made by the faculty, SGA, and students of Washington College (and hopefully by residents of the Chestertown community as well) towards maintaining our local EMS services – caring for our own even if the state doesn't care for us – can bring nothing but good to the College, the town, and the Eastern Shore.

Letter to the Editor

In Support of Maintaining EMS Funding

To the Editor:

I would like to commend Professor Penny J. Fall on a well-written letter regarding the importance of Emergency Medical Services in Maryland. It is of the utmost importance that this "umbrella of... trauma care," as Mis Fall put it, remain as intact as possible during these times of budget cuts. The topic of emergency medicine is not just a "Western Shore" issue because of the greater number of trauma-related incidents that occurs over there. It is very much an Eastern Shore and Washington College concern as well. Here on the Eastern Shore, it takes hours for a trauma center to be reached by ambulance, but only eight to ten minutes for a Maryland State Police helicopter to make the same trip; and more than once in the past few years those Med-Evac services have been needed to fly students from this school to the Shock Trauma Center in Baltimore for injuries which were untreatable in this region.

To further impress upon you how important emergency medical care is to Maryland, I have enclosed a list of exactly what the residents of this state will lose by Governor William Donald Schafer's budget cuts. This list was distributed by the Maryland Institute for Emergency Medical Services Systems Region IV office in Easton during an EMS conference. [Proposed cuts include: Elimination of EMT-A Standardized Training, Testing, and Certification; Elimination of Cardiac Rescue Technician Training and Certification; Elmination of First Responder Certification; Elimination of all MEIMSS-Sponsored Conferences and Educational Programs; Elimination of Continuing Education for Emergency, Trauma, and Critical Care Nurses; Total Shutdown of EMS Communications System in the Field Within Two Years; and Elimination of the Maryland EMS System of Care.]

If you wish to protest these cuts please write to the following addresses and express your desire to keep what is known as the best system of trauma care in the world: The Honorable William Donald Schafer, State House, Annapolis, MD, 21401; Errol Reese, DDS, President, University of Maryland at Baltimore, Davidge Hall, 522 West Lombard Street, Baltimore, MD, 21201.

Art Department Responds to Distribution Editorial

To the Editor:

As Acting Chair of the Art Department (in Sue Tessem's absence), I wish to respond to the editorial on distribution offerings in the November 8th Elm. Some of your points are well taken, and perhaps some inconsistencies could be addressed at the divisional level and adjusted. I believe, however, that there always will be differences between departments on this matter and most certainly between divisions. At issue for the departments in this case is control and self determination, and by extension academic freedom (which is only about censorship in the most gross cases. Cases such as this one are more subtle).

With respect to our own department, the "mystical role" that Intro. to Western Art plays "that is not readily apparent" (?-!) is that is surveys western art in toto (as much as it is practical in a one semester course). I would have thought that the combination of a course with a broad range coupled with one that examines a particular segment of that range an obvious "distribution" sort of sequence.

I suspect that there are two other aspects of this "problem" that trouble you (and probably other students as well). One is that a 300 level course can be taken first, followed by intro. I believe this is mainly for the convenience of the students - we do not benefit from it. Another aspect is the difficulty of getting into intro., since it is always full. Well do we understand your frustration! This problem, however, is in the main an issue of staffing, and there is little that can be done about it at the moment.

You will be pleased, if only mildly, to know that the department and the administration have discussed different options for the distribution requirement in art. Furthermore, in 1992-93 the department will undergo an external review, and all aspects of the department will bear scrutiny, including distribution offerings. Your suggestion will also be considered seriously. After this review, perhaps some adjustments will be made.

I want to thank you for a timely editorial. It is truly good to see student concern about matters we take very seriously. I have written this response so that you will know that the Art Department hears you, and listens.

Respectfully,
Tex Andrew

Weekly Absurdity

Isn't weather on the Eastern Shore absurd?

I am convinced that something unnatural controls the weather that is inflicted on the Eastern Shore, and I'd really like to know who or what that something is so I can register a formal complaint. Blaming God is passé, and nothing as simple as the seasonal changes, the Earth's rotation, or the thermal currents could possibly account for the completely kooky weather we have to put up with. I think I'll blame Puck; he's the only Imp I can think of who'd create such perverse weather.

Everyone at WC comes equipped with silly looking rubber boots of some kind, because we all know how much it rains here. But now that we're prepared, it doesn't rain. Sure, we've had one or two drenchings from hurricane leftovers, but that's it.

Temperature, too, makes no sense. I have a sneaking suspicion that the temperature inside regulates the temperature outside, instead of the other way around. In October before the heat was turned on it was freezing outside, and now that it's practically Thanksgiving we had a few days of 70° weather.

I am a native Washingtonian, and I'll admid that over on the Western Shore (and it NEVER occurred to me to call it that before I lived on the Eastern Shore) we are weird about our weather. There is a queer sort of pride involved in - and I suppose that this is the rationale - acting Southern by shrugging off heat that would fell a camel and being completely incompetent at dealing with even the threat of a few snowflakes. DCers just like to pretend that they can survive odd weather, but on the Eastern Shore we actually do!

When it comes down to it, there is only one possible rational explanation for Eastern Shore weather — Puck (or whomever) is in the employ of Governor William Donald Schaefer!

And btw, since there's still a bit of space to fill here, kudos to the Dining Hall for it's wonderful Thanksgiving buffet Wednesday night!

Partners In Bay Progress

by Gov. William Donald Schaefer

This summer I took over as chairman of the Chesapeake Bay Executive Council. It's a job I'm excited about, because we have more work to do to clean up the Bay, and it will only be successful if it's a regional effort. That means we have to work closely with Governor Casey from Pennsylvania, Governor Wilder of Virginia, Mayor Dixon from the District of Columbia, legislators, the private sector, citizens, and the federal government.

We are all partners in the Chesapeake Bay cleanup. All participants have devoted money, time and talents to finding new ways of protecting the Bay and helping along the restoration of its water quality. We are lucky that more and more, institutions such as the state and federal governments are making Bay protection a priority, and are constantly thinking about how their activities might affect the Bay.

A few weeks ago I had a chance to visit the Norfolk Naval Base in Virginia, which acts as coordinator for the Navy's Bay cleanup and protection plans. The Norfolk base keeps track of Bay-related activities under way at the 37 naval facilities in the bay region, including many in Maryland. In the past year, the naval facilities alone – only one piece of the federal Bay effort – spent $25 million on cleanup projects.

In Norfolk, I had a chance to see that newer naval vessels are equipped with the latest technology that helps control pollution while at sea. We talk about recycling our household waste, and how that can help the Bay. Well, the Navy has a plating facility that actually allows them to recycle aircraft parts by stripping the parts to remove corrosion and recoating them with metals like aluminum and chrome. They keep discharges in check by removing hazardous waste from the facility– even household paints with latex – through an outside contractor, and directing pretreated industrial waste into their sanitary sewer system instead of the Bay. There also is a general effort to conserve water and reduce waste where possible.

I had to brag about what the facilities in Maryland are doing. Indian Head Naval Ordinance Station has undertaken major improvements to its industrial wastewater discharge system. The Patuxent River Naval Air Station is working with the Defense Department to identify and cleanup former hazardous waste disposal sites. The Aberdeen Proving Grounds has more than doubled its staff and efforts on environmental programs in the past four years. It's great to see the progress, but even better to see agencies like the Navy making institutional changes to help the environment, especially the Bay. We need to get everyone thinking that way.

Yes, we have a lot of work ahead of us. But I am encouraged each time I talk to a single person, or a single organization, that is trying to make even the smallest difference with the Bay cleanup. We should apply that kind of energy to all of our problems.

I'd like to hear more from you about what you would like to see in the Bay cleanup programs. I'm always open to suggestions. Write me: Governor William Donald Schaefer, State House, Annapolis, MD 21401.

Next Week's Question:

Do you think that town-gown relations are bad, and if so, who is to blame? (This topic is in response to an editorial in this week's Kent County News.)

Editorials, especially from off-campus students and Chestertown residents, are encouraged, and can be dropped off at the Elm office before Tuesday evening.

QUESTION - Would you support the elimination of Fall Weekend in exchange for a full week's vacation at Thanksgiving?

Beth Skinner
White Hall, MD
Senior

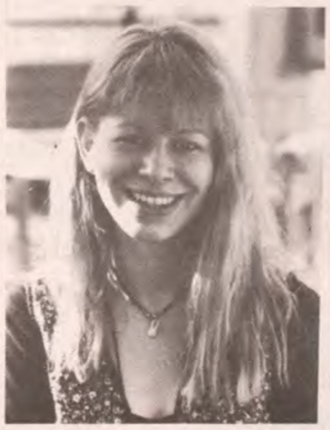
Yes! Fall weekend usually falls so early in the year that I don't go home. By the time Thanksgiving comes, I'd like to be there longer than 3 1/2 days, and what about an Easter Break??

Jennifer Hagey
Baldwin, MD
Freshman

No, I feel we should have a week off in the Fall, but not during Thanksgiving since classes end soon after for Christmas.

Scott Koon
Columbia, SC
Freshman

Absolutely not. The fall weekend break is a very useful opportunity for study. Elimination of fall weekend would not actually be beneficial as students would probably not get as much work done over a longer break.



Roxanne M. Seubert
Belle Mead, MD
Senior

Yes, I would definitely like to have fall weekend combined with Thanksgiving break, as it would give students a full week to rest up before final exams, and professors a chance to grade papers.

Amy R. Caddle
Keyport, NJ
Senior

Thanksgiving break is so close to the end of the semester it seems silly to have a week's vacation, two weeks of classes and then Winter Break.

Tim Whittier
South Paris, ME
Freshman

Yes because it's a long travel home and it might as well be worth the stay. Why not have both?

Editor's Apology, Or "Why I never got back to anyone."

I have been advised at various times by my professors, my SWO tutor, my Elm staff, and even my parents, to not write this article. "Don't be negative about your editorship," they've said, "you've done a good job, and you shouldn't encourage people to think otherwise."

Good advice, I'm sure, but advice I choose not to accept. I feel obliged to issue an apology to all the students who showed up at the organizational meeting back during the first week of school to volunteer their time and services to the Elm, and then were never contacted by me to actually write anything.

This was a problem that last year's Elm had as well, and it was one of many areas that I wanted to improve upon. Unfortunately, as any of you who have taken Calculus (or any other class that builds on itself) will already know, once you get a half step behind, it is nearly impossible to catch up, and completely impossible to get ahead. The Elm staff this semester has regularly been writing articles with no lead time at all (for instance, Cindy Young attended Dean Baer's lecture and immediately sat down and wrote the article for us - thanks, Cindy!). Since I have been unable to plan ahead of time what articles we are going to need two weeks down the road, I was unable to take advantage of the kind offers of help I had received. Staff is more or less obliged to work with no lead time, but it would have been presumptuous in the extreme to expect non-staff to whip up articles in half an hour, on the spot.

All of this was going to be my parting message, but I have included it a week early because I hope that everyone who offered their support to me will attend Pat Attenasio's organizational meeting this coming Monday at 7:00 pm in the Reid Basement. Please do not let my disorganization deprive Pat of the writers that he will need to make the Elm an even better newspaper next semester.

Duke Loses LA Gubernatorial Election and Hostages Waite and Sutherland Finally Released

LEBANON

On Monday there was a surprise release of two more American hostages– Thomas Sutherland and Terry Waite. Six hostages have been so far freed this year– the most in any year since the first Westerner was seized nine years ago. U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar says that he believes all Western captives may be freed by Christmas!

NEW ORLEANS

David Duke was defeated by Edwin W. Edwards in the election for governor of New Orleans. Duke is, however, intending to run for office again, either for a House seat in Louisiana or against President Bush in some of the Republican presidential primaries in the South next March 10.

MARYLAND

The Governor's Council on HIV Prevention and Treatment has shot down mandatory testing for AIDS in health care workers. Dr. Richard T. Johnson, the panel chairman and a Johns Hopkins Medical School Neuroscientist, was quoted as saying that "There has never been a case of direct transmission of HIV from physician to patient, there never has been....There is this one crazy dentist situation that has something very funny about it. So, let's not take all the doorknobs off the battleships." The dentist he is referring to is the Dr. David Acer who infected 5 of his patients with HIV before he himself died.

U.S.A.

A family and medical bill that would require many employers to offer workers up to 12 weeks unpaid, job-guaranteed leave for illnesses or to care for a new child or family emergencies, plus would give federal workers up to 18 weeks of unpaid family leave over two years and 26 weeks of medical leave each year for serious illness, cleared the House with a 253-177 vote. However, it didn't have the two-thirds majority needed to override President Bush's threatened veto.

A new report from the U.S. Census Bureau has shown, surprise surprise, that a striking gender-related salary gap persists in the workplace. According to the report, a woman who has completed at least four years of college and works fulltime typically earns $25,929, roughly the same as the $25,372 median earnings of men with a high school education. Women who did not complete high school typically earn $11,919, compared with $18,766 for men of the same education level. Women with five or more years of college typically earn $28,806, compared with $41,721 for men with the same amount of education. The report also showed that high school-educated blacks typically earn only 80 percent of their white peers.

According to the American Association of University Professors, only 45 percent of the 89,502 full-time, female faculty members at U.S. colleges and universities had tenure during the 1990-91 school year, compared with 70 percent of the 225,496 men.

White Student Union Sparks Controversy in Minnesota

Duke Publicity May Encourage Others

by Rene Steele

(NSNS) David Duke, former KKK member and gubernatorial candidate , may have lost his election bid, but his influence on the attitude towards racial relations in this country is far from over. Even if Duke choses not to run against George Bush for the Presidency, he will likely make headlines once again when he attempts to gain a Louisiana legislative position. The nationwide publicity garnered by Duke during his run for governor has emboldened white supremacists across the country to form higher profile organizations, some analysts believe. One of many such newly-formed groups has a midwestern university up in arms.

In an effort to fight an organization they accuse of espousing white supremacist beliefs, students at the University of Minnesota rallied on Nov. 14th to protest the establishment of a white student union.

The rally, organized by students from the Coalition Against White Supremacy, will protest White Student Union founder Tom David and the ten members of his organization.

"There is no need to promote white culture," says Monique Parsons, vice president of the African Student Cultural Center. "Promoting white culture is the same as promoting white supremacy."

"I am not a white supremacist," says David, a senior majoring in ancient history. "Affirmative action and quotas are endangering the white race/" David says it is not a question of one race being inferior to another, but rather a difference of values. "Whites value going to school and getting a Ph.D.," says David. "Blacks don't. They value selling drugs and buying big, fancy cars."

University of Minnesota Vice President of Student Affairs Marvalene Hughes indicates that the White Student Union is not a sanctioned campus organization since its members have not signed an equal opportunity statement required by the university. "People are making a lot of noise over something that does not exist," says Hughes.

The Coalition Against White Supremacy first sponsored a demonstration on Oct. 9th where approximately 500 students gathered to speak out against David and the racism they feel he is promoting. Although coalition members and David's supporters exchanged insults, it was a non-violent demonstration.

A more violent exchange occurred on Oct. 17th while David was on a campus radio station talk show. Although University police don't know what caused the fight, students interviewed say White Student Union supporters attacked coalition members with numchucks and chains. Three coalition members required stitches following the incident.

Melinda McGowan, member of the Progressive Student Organization, believes that David is promoting violence and should not have the right to speak his views. "There are laws about hate crimes," says McGowan. "The issue at hand goes beyond the issue of free speech. [David's actions] are incidents of hate crime."

WC Students in the U.N.?

On Thursday, October 31, Dr. Brien, Ann Veiga, Andrea Nolan, Carl Pupa, Brad Castleman, and Kris Wallenberg, members of the Washington College Sane/Freeze Organization, attended the International Working Conference on the Arms Trade in New York City. The conference, which concluded on Saturday, November 2, focused on various issues concerning the production, sale, and transfer of weapons (conventional and nuclear arms).

On Thursday and Friday, the participants of the conference were invited to attend several forums, at the U.N. and at the Riverside Church, sponsored by the NGO Committee on Disarmament, the U.N. Department for Disarmament Affairs, the U.N. Department of Public Information, and Sane/Freeze. Ambassador Maj Britt Theorin, Member of Parliament - Sweden; Ambassador Edmundo Fujita, Mission of Brazil to the U.N.; Ambassador Guido Lenzi, Mission of Italy to the U.N.; and Ambassador Graciela Uribe de Lozano, Mission of Colomia to the U.N. were but a few of the delegates who presented the forums on the U.N. study on arms transfers and the impact of the arms trade on development, debt, the global economy and the environment.

On Saturday, we divided into small groups (about twenty-five people) depending on our area of interest. The working session I attended dealt with the Environment and the Arms Trade. Maria Cherkasova, Center for Independent Ecological Programs, USSR, Claire Greensfelder, Greenpeace, U.S., John Miller, International Clearinghouse on the Military and the Environment, U.S., and Ambassador Maj Britt Theorin, Member of Parliament and Ambassador for Disarmament, Sweden, spoke on the effects of the arms trade on the environment - globally and locally. Our objective in this group was to formulate two or three proposals concerning ways to improve the environment and to curb the arms trade. One proposal was an international study of the effects of arms testing on the environment. Our group also endorsed a Resolution to the U.N. regarding control over the military's disposal of potential pollutants. This resolution will go back to the United Nations' General Assembly for a vote, if passed it will become legislation. The proposals our group made will go into committee; if passed, then they will then go to the General Assembly for a vote.

Sane/Freeze is a grass-roots national organization "whose mission and purpose is to educate the American people in order to recruit and organize them into a citizens' movement with sustained political power to reverse the arms race, abolish nuclear weapons, and construct a world of peace and justice." This organization is the only non-governmental organization that is "officially represented at the U.N. with a representative." The importance of this organization can truly be felt when one gets up in front of several representatives to the U.N. and gives a speech.

Flu and Pneumonia Have Dire Effects

Americans had 448.8 million restricted activity days and spent 262.9 million days in bed because of the flu in 1989.

Flu and pneumonia were the sixth leading cause of death in this country in 1988. Among the top 10 causes of death, lung disease is growing the fastest.

Lost productivity and the risk of death can be avoided by getting a yearly flu shot.

For more information about flu and pneumonia, contact your local American Lung Association®, listed in the white pages of your telephone book.

Josephine the Fly

by Tanya Allen

so, (said josephine,) why are you showing me all this, Big Fly? where am i meant to spend eternity– in WAC HEAVEN or in WAC HELL?

(Big Fly was silent for a moment as they flew through some dirty, scraggy grey clouds.) josephine, (Big Fly said) the reason i am imparting the mysteries of WAC HEAVEN and WAC HELL upon you is because...we here in eternity...have a special mission for you.

a special mission?

yes. josephine, do you know why i am called a..Big Fly, and sometimes a...Little Wind?

no, why?

it is because of something that the navaho indians believe.

the navaho indians?

they believe in a being known as the Big Fly, who sometimes flies down to sit on a human's shoulder when he or she is walking alone. according to the navaho myths, Big Fly whispers to young heros the answers to all the questions that their fathers put to them when they are being tested. they believe that Big Fly is the voice of the holy spirit, revealing human wisdom.

that's amazing!

yes. the purpose of those who are known as Big Flies is that of turning the land where they live into a place of spiritual relevance.

wow. what a job.

josephine, we, the members of eternity, have decided that WAC needs you to be its own...Big Fly.

what? you mean i have to go around whispering to the students the answers to their tests? wouldn't that be breaking the honor code?

your mission, (continued Big Fly) is to save the WAC. look. (Big Fly pointed downwards, and josephine suddenly had a vision of napoleon and his followers. they were congregated in a small, cell-like room with blackened walls and the charred remains of a few posters.)

where are they? (josephine asked) they're in kent, (Big Fly said,) room 212.

"Brilliant place to pick for our new headquarters, Napoleon!" a dragonfly said to the leader.

"Especially because the residents have no idea we're here," said a cockroach, "Ever since this room burned down two weeks ago they've kept the door locked– so now almost no one ever enters this place, besides us bugs!"

"And we can make as much noise in here as we like," said a ladybug, "Because the hall residents all believe that this room is haunted!"

"Yeah!" laughed a termite. "They think that the ghost of Reid moved over here, because he wanted a single!"

"Or else that Gibson's theater ghost came because he wanted to live on the Creative Arts hall..."

"That lightswitch trick is a great idea, Napoleon!" said a Black Widow.

"What lightswitch trick?" asked a silverfish.

"Well," giggled the Black Widow, "It's simple. We bugs keep turning the room's light on. The residents don't realize that it's on until night, when they can see it from outside. When they go to try and shut off the light, they find that the door is locked...they have no idea who keeps turning on the light, how they get in the room, and so on, and so they think it's being turned on by a ghost...."

"Clever!" said the silverfish.

"Speaking of clever," said Napoleon in a loud, dynamic voice, "I'd like to congratulate all of you on our two most successful projects of the week. First of all, I would like to congratulate you on getting into the ears of so many drunken students last Saturday night, giving them subliminal messages– urging them to drink so much that some of them got alcohol poisoning, and some of them got suicidal, and some of them got physically hurt...it's so easy to mess with human minds when they're drunk! All in all, we made 4 WAC students go to the emergency room of the hospital that night, all because of alcohol-related occurrences. Bravo for us!"

"Bravo! Bravo!" the bugs shouted.

"And another congratulations," Napoleon went on, "On the...forklift episode. Mikey, would you like to tell the rest of the bugs about what happened?"

"Heh heh heh," said Mikey the mealworm. "A bunch of the bugs and I decided to go on a little joyride last week, using one of the forklifts in front of Gibson. Hee hee hee. We figured out how to turn the forklift on, and then a whole bunch of us learned how to turn the wheel...it was such a great ride! We went all around the parking lot, several times, and almost ran into the swim center! It was glorious! Glorious! And then security came after us, so we parked the forklift really quickly and turned the forklift off and then flew away....You should have seen the faces of security...they didn't see any humans around, so they couldn't figure out how the forklift had been moving around, but they didn't want to look stupid, so they made up a story saying that a couple of students had grabbed the forklift, went for a joyride, and then ran away, and that security gave chase, but that the students were just too fast for them....Hee hee hee hee! It took security 20 minutes to get the forklift started and back to its original place again, because they didn't know how it worked...!"

"Ha ha ha ha hee hee hee hee chortle chortle chortle!" the bugs all said.

"We bad! We bad!"

WC and The Johns Hopkins School of Nursing

Three years ago, Washington College and The Johns Hopkins School of Nursing formed a dual degree program. Through this program, Washington College students have an unique opportunity to attend one of the most prestigious and renowned nursing schools in the country. Students, in this program, will obtain a bachelor's degree from Washington College and a bachelor of science degree in nursing from The Johns Hopkins University School of Nursing.

According to Mary Brune, Admissions Coordinator of The Johns Hopkins School of Nursing, there are several different programs, depending on one's academic year, by which Washington College students can achieve this bachelor of science degree in nursing.

One program is referred to as the 3+2 Program, where students, typically freshmen and sophomores, spend three years at Washington College and two years at The Johns Hopkins University School of Nursing. During the first three years at WC students would acquire a liberal arts education emphasizing a solid science background. The course work at Johns Hopkins would consist of the nursing and clinical classes required for the bachelor's in nursing. Every week, students should expect to be in the classroom on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday and in a hospital, home, or community center performing clinical duties on Thursday and Friday. Students would earn both a bachelor's degree from Washington College and a bachelor of science degree in nursing from The Johns Hopkins School of Nursing after completion of the program.

There are also opportunities available for those students who have decided to enter the profession after completion of their college degree. One program allows students, who have received a bachelor's degree from college, to spend two years at Johns Hopkins. During the two years students would take the nursing and clinical courses required to receive a bachelor of science in nursing. The other two programs are accelerated programs, either thirteen or sixteen months for a bachelor of science in nursing . Ms. Brune stated that, for students who have decided on a career in nursing in the later years of college, some of the courses not offered at Washington College but normally required for entrance to The John Hopkins School of Nursing might be waived. Even if some courses are waived, one is responsible for material covered in those areas. Ms Brune also stressed that if some required courses were taken at Washington College, students would not have to retake the course at Johns Hopkins, thus lightening the course load.

There are several avenues open for those students pondering their ability to pay for The Johns Hopkins School of Nursing. Johns Hopkins has a consortium of Church, Johns Hopkins, and Sinai Hospitals and a consortium award. If a student is granted a consortium award, then half a year's tuition is paid for one year of service at one of the consortium hospitals. There are other financial aid opportunities available, such as merit awards, state and federal grants, Johns Hopkins scholarships, and VA awards.

Nurses, today, are not the typical white dressed female at the bedside of a patient. There are many opportunities available for nurses in research, in the legislative process, in recruiting other perspective nursing students, and in bedside nursing.

If you are interested in nursing or in the Washington College/Johns Hopkins Dual Degree Program in Nursing, please contact Dr. Munson, Chair of the Biology Department and Advisor of the Dual Degree Program in Nursing.

Ethics Awards

NEW YORK (Oct. 18) – Topics for the 1992 Elie Wiesel Prize In Ethics Essay Contest were officially announced October 18th by Roberta Goldman, Executive Director of The Elie Wiesel Foundation for Humanity. The contest, sponsored by The Foundation, is open to full-time undergraduate senior students enrolled in an accredited college or university in the United States.

CIA To Invade New York

by Julie Greene

A new organization on campus this year, Campus Involvement and Activities, is making its mark on Washington College's social scene. The CIA is an SGA sponsored student organization, advised by Student Activities Director Teri Turmel. Board members are SGA Social Chairmen Glenn Warner and John Buckey, Concert Chair Sally McGee, Social/Daytime Chair Dave George, Travelling Chair Julie Greene, and the Comedy Club Chair Tammie Michener.

This fall the CIA got off to a great start by bringing performer Tom Acousti to campus and taking a number of students off-campus to one of the Baltimore Orioles' last games at Memorial Stadium.

A juggler announced the opening of Snickers Comedy Club in October. Snickers has been a resounding success and the Club is planning its last performance of the semester for Wednesday, December 4.

The reggae band Third Eye, which performed during Greek weekend, was sponsored by the CIA and the Pan-Hel Association, and the CIA sponsored the recent performance of the Boneshakers.

The hypnotist, as well as the caricaturist who was here on Halloween, was sponsored by the Daytime/Social Committee.

Three trips have been planned this semester since the Orioles game. In October students went to the Philadelphia Museum of Art and in November to the National Gallery of Art to see the "Circa 1492" exhibit. Tomorrow the CIA is sponsoring a Christmas shopping trip to New York City.

Campus Involvement and Activities is holding a meeting Tuesday night at 7 p.m. in the CAC to discuss a spring break trip to Montego Bay in Jamaica. A representative from Student Travel Services will be there to answer students' questions. The agency reserves hotels during the spring break period for student groups. The currency exchange for Jamaica is favorable and Jamaica is one of the hotspots for spring break 1992, along with Cancun.

New Genesis Album Leaves Little Hope For The Group

by Raphael Koster

Genesis
We Can't Dance
Atlantic Records
Produced by Genesis and Nick Davis

Genesis has been around for a long, long time. In the process of surviving, they also have become the root of a musical tree that rivals any other in the industry. Peter Gabriel was a Genesis founder. Mike and the Mechanics is led by the lead guitarist. Brand X features a Philip Collins as jazz drummer. Films give soundtrack credits to a certain Tony Banks, keyboardist. And of course, Collins has his own solo career. From their humble origins as a pop group they evolved into one of the leaders of the art rock movement in the seventies, known for extravagant arena spectacles with lots of make up and twenty-minute songs. That phase ended with the departure of Gabriel and the Lamb Lies Down on Broadway tour, a monumentally artsy and self-indulgent stage show. Now, of course, Genesis can be pointed to primarily on the basis of its reputation as a pop group— the wheel has come full circle. The last album was 1986's Invisible Touch, an ultimately annoying record that featured plenty of catchy riffs, only a few songs of any depth, too much reliance on Collins' solo style, and 6Top Ten singles.

Can a group outlive its peak period? Many would say that Genesis ended when Gabriel left. Others could argue quite successfully that 1983's eponymous album managed to cover all bases, from experimental techno-synth rock to pop. Nonetheless, the fact is that with the rise of Collins' solo career, the band he led from quality to stardom has gone into a corresponding decline.

We Can't Dance is an album drenched in synthesizers— not interesting sounding ones, but fake string sounds. We heard plenty of those on ...But Seriously. It's got those patented Collins drum sounds. There's a token "save the earth" song that doesn't even have the piano riff that "Another Day in Paradise" had. It even has (shudder) lyrics like "my heart is broken in pieces/ yes my heart is broken in pieces/ since I've lost you..." and even worse, "fading distant lights/ leaving us all behind..../ you know that these are the days of our lives/ remember..." I kid you not. "The days of our lives." The lyrics on this album are actually that bad. These aren't even the verses. They're the choruses.

Not to say that you should rush out and obtain copies of the CD to burn them. The single, "No Son of Mine" has an interesting if very depressing lyric, sort of an in-house reply to Mike (Rutherford) and the Mechanics' "Living Years." It's about a son who tries to reconcile with his father and the father disowns him. Not once but twice. There's also the very amusing and interesting title track, with its saga of a beach bum hawking wares while eyeing a girl in blue jeans lounging on the beach. This song stands out from the pack musically as well- it's the only track on the album that has a real punch to it. "Driving the Last Spike" and "Jesus He Knows Me" are also interesting for one reason or another. Not great, but interesting.

It sounds like a terrible thing to say, but maybe Rutherford, Banks, and Collins should have taken more time with this album. Considering that it took them five years, I can't hold out much hope for the future of the band. It might just be that they worked with a different producer than Hugh Padgham, who has produced the work of every single one of the branches of that musical tree for years. Mike and the Mechanics tried not using him with Word of Mouth and it was awful.

In any case, We Can't Dance has to be reckoned a failure for the band, if what they wanted was to get on track and do something different. If that wasn't their goal, then maybe it was to be a success, and we'll all get mighty sick of hearing the myriad of singles that come forth. I regretfully have to hope not. Instead, you'll see me in line to buy the new Peter Gabriel album, if he ever finishes it. But that's another story...

Other releases of interest:

Paul Simon's Concert in the Park, a must-have if you enjoy the singer-songwriter's work. Although Michael Brecker's wonderful instrumental set was cut form the recording, the sound quality is digitally amazing even on cassette and the performances great. Especially the definitive "Bridge Over Troubled Water" and the amazing percussion work.

The long-awaited and ominously titled Achtung Baby from U2, singles from which sound different from what anybody expected. In what way? Well, they sound like Love and Rockets, for one thing...

And due out soon: Dangerous from Michael Jackson, the hype for which has already commenced; and a Michael Crawford album for the musical fans. Enjoy!

Seascape With Sharks And Dancer A Sure Hit

by Karyn Iacangelo

The Washington College Drama Department's current production is "Seascape with Sharks and Dancers" by Don Nigro, a love story that has an extremely startling conclusion.

The play stars Steven C. Brown as Ben and Deborah A. Boyer as Tracy, whose lives collide as the result of a drowning accident. Ben brings Tracy back to his apartment and that is where all the trouble begins.

Tracy is an extremely strong willed, cynical young woman who refuses to trust anything or anybody, and is convinced that Ben is only thinking about his physical needs and doesn't care about her. Throughout the play, Ben tries to convince her that she is wrong, but because of her strong will and determination she disbelieves him until the end.

Ben, on the other hand is a very tolerant young man who is genuine in his feelings toward Tracy. He is extremely gentle, but in a very ironic way, and tries desperately to convince Tracy how he feels. By the end of the play, he is disillusioned and left unsure of what he wants out of this relationship.

After the intermission, the play really comes together and forces its audience to realize the delicate nature of the human condition. Something is revealed in the second act that makes the love between Ben and Tracy grow stronger for a brief moment and then it just collapses.

Both Steven C. Brown and Deborah A. Boyer do an excellent job in their roles. There were a lot of lines for them to memorize and they did a great job in a very short time. This is also the first time performing in a WC drama production for both of them.

The play is expertly directed by Margaret-Elizabeth Skinner and assistant-directed by Rachael Fink. Set design was done by Deidre Reigal, and lighting design was done by E. Shanley Driscoll.

Heather Lynch and Richard T. McKee, Jr. are Stage Manager and Assistant Stage Manager respectively and the Technical Director is Jason N. Imber. The play runs Friday and Saturday at 8:00 pm in Tawes Theatre and there are no reservations required.

Shoremen Cagers Prepare to Open 1991-92 With Delaware

edited press release

The 80th edition of Washington College basketball tips off Saturday, November 23, with a 3:15 battle at the University of Delaware.

The series between the Division I Blue Hens and the Division III Shoremen resumes after a year's hiatus. Washington leads the overall series 29-25, but Delaware has won the last four, including a 90-74 victory in 1989-90. Washington's last win over the Hens was a 79-67 conquest in 1984-85.

Washington returns five starters from last year's squad that won five of its last seven outings and finished 9-14 overall. Key players for the '91-'92 Shoremen include All-Middle Atlantic Conference junior center Darren Vican, a 6'9" Milford, DE product who averaged 15.0 ppg and 6.9 rpg last season. Senior 6'5" forward Tim Liddy is Washington's most experienced player, having been a regular on the squad that two years ago went to the Division III Final Four. Liddy will be joined in the paint by either 6'3" sophomore Geoff Rupert, who can play either forward or guard, or 6'7" junior Dan Dutton, who is recovering from a preseason ankle injury.

Washington's backcourt should be headed by senior Allen Lester and sophomore Greg Rogers. Lester scored 133 points in his last ten games in '90-'91, and Rogers blossomed as a freshman into a defensive ace. The Shoremen will be bolstered by junior guard Peter Basel, a starter at the beginning of last year, and incoming freshman Jason Ronstadt (Dover, MA/Dover-Sherborn), and sophomore Charles Cummings. (Baltimore, MD). Down low, help comes from veteran 6'4" junior Mike Swanson and newcomers Jerry Davis (6'5", Houston, TX/Lamar), Adam Poe (6'3", Livingston, NJ/Livingston), Jay Devlin (6'5", Springfield, PA/Springfield) and Eric Henry (6'4", Gaithersburg, MD/St. John's).

Washington faces another challenging slate in '91-'92, including a rugged December with a trip to Division I Towson State, an NCAA Tournament team two years running, and a berth in the Scranton Holiday Tournament, December 20-21. Scranton captured the MAC Northern Division title last year. Washington will host the 15th annual Wild Goose Classic December 6-7, facing John Jay (NY) in the first round and then either Catholic or Roanoke the following day. In January, Washington treks to the Bahamas against the Bahamas All-Star Team and NCAA Division III champ Wisconsin Stevens Point. The Shoremen's home opener will be November 26 against Frostburg State at 7:30.

Rippin' Ripken Takes AL MVP For 2nd Time

by Julie Greene

This past Tuesday night the Baseball Writers Association of America announced that Baltimore Orioles shortstop Cal Ripken Jr. was voted the Most Valuable Player in the American League for the 1991 season.

Ripken received 15 of the 28 votes, while Cecil Fielder of the Detroit Tigers had nine votes and was runner-up for the second year in a row. Ripken is the first player to receive the MVP award while being on a losing team.

Fielder called the vote a 'joke.' Nothing personal against Rip, but the voters have been inconsistent. Last year Fielder was not selected because he was on a losing team, and this year the Tigers were a contender most of the season.

No matter how disappointing the Orioles' last season at Memorial Stadium was there is no reason to deny the obvious. Ripken had not only the offensive stats, but the glove to back it up.

The "nonstop shortstop" had the best season of his career this year. Ripken batted .323 with 34 home runs and 114 RBI, while leading the league in fielding percentage, putouts, assists, and extra base hits. He is the only AL player this year to finish in the top ten in batting, hits, home runs, and RBI. Meanwhile, Ripken's consecutive games streak of 1,573 is closing in on Lou Gehrig's record 2,130.

With the MVP and the realistic possibility of a Golden Glove, Rip's market value has soared.

Ripken had already been named AP Player of the Year as well as Sporting News Player of the Year for the second time in his career. The last time Ripken won the MVP award was in 1983 when the Orioles won the World Series against the Phil. Phillies.

Women Drop A Pair

press release

Despite suffering two more setbacks to Ursinus and Swarthnore, the women swimmers are continuing to improve. Senior captain Kasey Carroll led the group with two firsts and a second in both meets. She is undefeated this season in her two specialty events, the 500 and 1000 free. Leslie Newcomb and Stina Sturges have been placing behind her every meet with terrific swims in both distances races.

Sophomore Jen Green broke a WC school record in the 200 backstroke while Karen Prendergrast placed behind her with a personal best time. Sophomores Nancy Whiteman, Magdalena Fuchs, Mimi Devlin and Ramsey Bigham continue to add important points and they have all qualified for the MAC championships in February. The 200 free relay team of Devlin, Fuchs, Whiteman and Green won the last event of the Swarthmore meet to close the margin to 3 points. The medley relay team of Green, Newcomb, and freshmen Dede Swinden and Amy Draper placed second while Prendergrast, Beverly Diaz, Joan Colton and Ramsey Bigham placed third.

Coach Lessard says "this is the best group of women swimmers we have ever had at Washington College. We are swimming tough MAC teams. I'm very pleased with the time improvement and the team support for each other. They will continue to get faster." Next:Bryn Mawr, 1:00 at Casey. Be there. Chris Vaughn will.

Blood, Sweat, and Fears in Finale

2nd Rugby Season is Great Success, Future Bright

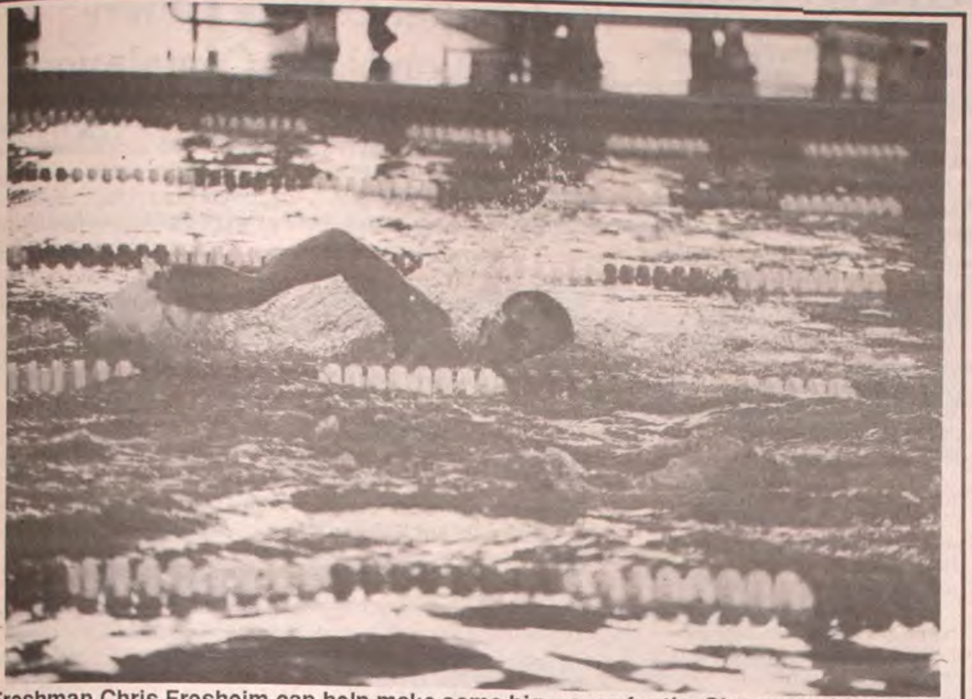
by Mad Dog O'Keefe

On Saturday, November 16, the Washington College Rugby Football Club finished their semester by playing York College at Worton Park. The line-up for the team was somewhat motley with people playing positions they were unaccustomed to. In the scrum there was Billy Bloom, (playing an admirable role in the place of a powerful TH) Dumper, and Dave Snyder all playing front row. In the second row, Pat and Stein lending their usually impressive support. Eight-man was Jamie, who took the place of Shawn Hamill, who was recovering from a basketball injury. Steve Dadzie and Christopher R. played the breakaway positions, supplying surprising force and aggression to the pack. ICE played scrum-half with Renzi and then the backs lined out; Anthony Black, Sam Gessner, Myself (replaced by Nate at half-time), Seth Engel and Dave Morrison (playing the full-back position that Drew usually plays).

In the game, Washington College dominated with two tries being scored by Dave (the "Scorer") Snyder. Both tries were immaculately executed, as were the opponents he cut down on his way to the try-line. Christopher R. was unlucky in the second-half when he was brutally brought down (with a hand in the face) just one yard from the try-line. Drop kicks seemed to be the team's weakness throughout the season and hearts leapt as a near-miss was hit by Black. The final score was in no-way reflective of the actual game, as the home-crowd can testify. Injury medals of the season go out to Drew, George, Chris, Trout, Dan, and Shawn (whether the injuries were rugby or otherwise). There were no MVP awards this semester (Congrats Cal) as every player deserves one, but close runner-ups go to Scorer Snyder, ICE and Bomber Black. Special thanx go to Alan "Masher" Maddes, our coach who has shown us a season of blood and sweat, and the fears are the fears of those teams next semester who will face the onslaught we have trained so hard for.

Thanks

Ciaran, the editor really appreciates all the help you have given him this semester. You probably think that I'm just saying this thank you because I'm trying to fill up space. But this is sincere; if it's not then you've got a shorter haircut than I do. But seriously , thanks to a wonderful guy with a fabulous hairstyle and great tastes in movies, like "Blood Suckers."



Freshman Chris Fresheim can help make some big waves for the Shoremen this year to become a big part of WC Swimming.

Men Continue Torrid Pace, Break Records

Team improves week to week, ready to strike

edited press release

The Shoremen swimmers dropped a 105-92 loss to Ursinus, but were able to break five more swim records, bringing the season total to 17 in only two meets. Freshman standout Dave Cola led the group with two firsts in the 200 free and the 100 fly, setting two new Washington College records. Jason Campbell won the 100 breaststroke and broke the 200 IM record. Chris Freisheim lowered the 500 free record while Tyler McCarthy swam a quick 50 free for a new record.

Captain Brian Basso became the 6th man to qualify for the MAC Championship with a personal best in the 100 fly by 2 seconds. Andy McKim, Mike Bowman, Troy Petenbrink, Mike Frey, and David Czekaj are all having great swims, adding valuable points and dropping their times weekly.

The men continued to improve in the loss to MAC power Swarthmore, 130-71. Cola and Campbell continued to lead the men, both with a first and second place. Campbell lowered his 200 IM record again and set a new 200 breaststroke record while Cola set a new 400 IM record.

Freisheim again lowered the 500 freestyle another seven seconds while Tim Whittier set a new 200 backstroke record and Brian Basso set a new 200 fly record. Jarrod Wunderlich had personal best swims in the 1000 freestyle and 200 butterfly while the men's 200 medley relay of Whittier, Campbell, Cola, and McCarthy set another school record.

Coach Lessard feels that "the men are doing a great job. It's a young team and they are all really working hard. This was the first time they had swum 200 strokes ever, so it's been a learning experience." Next: December 4 against Widener.

On Wednesday night, the women won their first meet of the season in defeating Salisbury State. Full details of the meet cannot be given because the meet took place after the Elm deadline. The Shorewomen's big win over Salisbury and the results of the Widener meet will be given in the next issue. Until then, remember to support Washington College Swimming, even if you think speedos are nasty looking on guys.

Coss fumbles and Ms. Greene recovers with style

by Ms. Greene

This is the real Ms. Greene. After hitting Mr. Coss over the head with a fire extinguisher, then putting him under scolding hot water from the showerhead for 15 minutes, and forcing him to eat 14 raw eggs with peanut butter, I decided to decorate the new cement walkway near Gibson with his head. Obviously, the Cossman's mind has been put through the ringer with RecHoops lately, so I'm taking over the picks this week.

WASHINGTON -11 1/2 over Dallas. After last week's disappointing loss to the Giants the Cowboys are looking for Aikman and Smith to shoot the Skins in the back, but the Skins want another scalping to add to their collection.

The matchup between the 11-0 Redskins and the (harumph) 6-5 Dallas Cowboys is tempting enough for your fearless editor (and incidentally, enthusiastic Redskin fan) to indulge in a Pro Pick of her own. It may be an exaggeration that the Skins can do no wrong this season, but any team that racks up a triple digit score in just two games can certainly take the team that hasn't been truly great since ex-coach Landry had hair. This has been a year for jinx-breaking; even if the spread were 21 1/2, bet on the Skins to beat the Cowboys for the second time this season.

CHICAGO -7 over Miami. Bears and dolphins? This one's on land folks and no matter how impressive Marino looked in the second half last week, the dolphins are doomed.

L.A. Raiders -6 1/2 over CINCINNATI. Jay Schroeder is trying out for the Harlem Globetrotters, but that's strange since he's as white as a baby's ass. Jay don't know colors.

Houston -6 1/2 over PITTSBURGH. The Steelers will have to suffer another week because the Oilers are going to slip right through their defense.

MINNESOTA -6 over Detroit. With the tragic injury to offensive lineman Mike Utley Detroit will be hurting emotionally and without the support of the home field crowd. Our prayers and hopes go out to the Utley family.

N.Y. Giants -9 1/2 over TAMPA BAY. An early Christmas present for the Giants for which they should give thanks. The Bucs would have better luck in the Pee Wee Conference.

Buffalo -8 over NEW ENGLAND. Get real. I could be dyslexic and still win with the points on this one. Coss agrees, adding that the Bills could have their jockstraps on backwards and still take the Patriots.

Kansas City -4 over CLEVELAND. It's a Native American sports year and there are more cat lovers in the U.S. than dog aficionados. Why ask why?

Indianapolis +7 over GREEN BAY. I may regret it, but my gut tells me the Colts could go 2-14 this season.

Denver +3 over SEATTLE. This one hurts because I really dislike Elway.

Philadelphia -6 1/2 over PHOENIX. I like the Eagles defense and McMahon's spunky quarterback comeback. Besides that, Eagles are bigger than Cardinals.

San Diego +5 over N.Y. JETS. I know it's at New York, but the Chargers' John Carney has kicked winning field goals in the last two weeks.

NEW ORLEANS -6 1/2 over Atlanta. Now that the Falcons have all those touchdowns out of their system, the Saints should get a much needed adrenaline surge, especially after last week's loss to the Chargers.

L.A. RAMS +3 over San Francisco. With Young out and Rice on the side L.A. has a chance to ram this game down the 49ers shaft.

NEWS

Alcoholics Anonymous. Like AA, MMUST's ten members meet twice a week to discuss issues of gender in order to promote their own sensitivity.

"Sexism is obviously threatening to women, but it is also stifling to men," says MMUST founder Eric Beck, a history and peace studies major. Beck organized the group last spring because few men were attending sexual awareness workshops on campus. Through the group he hopes to further the notion that men need to take responsiblitiy for their own behavior.

"We are not pointing any fingers at anyone on campus," Beck says. "Rather we are a process-oriented group that wants to come to terms with its own sexism through honest introspection."

Tufts junior Gina Polumbo, an anthropology major who attends MMUST meetings regularly, supports men's groups but warns of the dangers of paternalism. "I think it's great that men are finally getting together and opening their eyes instead of denying what is going on," she says. "But it's also important for men's groups to stay in active dialogue with women."

However, not all students on campus have been supportive. According to MMUST members, conservative students on campus have criticized the group as being too focused on raising awareness, arguing that they should spend more energy on a concrete issue shuch as equality for women in the workplace.

Actions organized by MMUST include a protest outside of a Tufts fraternity house whose members allegedly spray painted a rape scene on a car, and the distribution on campus of a petition that is an apologetic letter on behalf of all men to Anita Hill, the Oklahoma law professor who alleges she was sexually harassed by Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas. MMUST also plans to raise money for shelters for battered women.

By educating their fellow students and acting as an advocate for women in court, a group of Cornell men seek to correct the fallacy that rape is a women's issue.

Action Against Rape and Misogyny (AARM) was established by three male African-American students at Cornell University in Ithaca, New York. The group, which has grown to include both men and women, hold workshops on campus on sexual assault, plans a Sexual Assault Awareness Week, and acts as a support group for rape victims who bring their cases to court.

"When rape victims step forward to testify in court they have to relive the entire thing," says AARM founder Eric Acree. "Most people don't want to go through it alone. We advocate on behalf of the victim."

Nina Cummings, Sexual Assault Education Coordinator and faculty advisor to AARM, believes the group is effective not only at helping rape victims but also at confronting sexism at Cornell. "I think they are a very unique and unusual group," says Cummings. "They confront sexism on a deeper level as it is institutionalized in society."

Acree says that the public is still largely ignorant when it comes to sexual harassment. "We try to raise their consciousness levels by engaging our audiences with questions," says Acree. "Rape and misogyny affect every part of society, and they will not be changed unless they're actively challenged by a collective group of people."

Washington College Library Automation Nears Completion

Washington College's automated library catalog system is expected to be operational by the end of January, William J. Tubbs, the head librarian at the Chestertown campus, announced recently.

During the past three years, library personnel have been converting the card catalog to a computerized version that will allow access to an index of Miller Library's 150,000 books and periodicals via eight public terminals directly linked to the central processing system or through any computer linked to the campus computing network. As many as 32 users will be able to search the catalog simultaneously.

Tubbs terms the system designed by Innovative Interfaces of California a "super catalog" because users can search for titles by conventional means – author, title, subject, or call number – as well as by key words that might appear in a title. The system also will search contents notes on volumes to provide titles from collections or anthologies that might not otherwise be readily apparent to the card catalog browser. "Students will be able to find anything they could find with the traditional card catalog, and more," says Tubbs.

Other features of the automated system include periodicals and acquisitions modules that keep abreast of new arrivals and track orders for new books (both expected to be operational by spring) and a circulation system (expected to be operational next fall) that keeps track of inventory and informs users whether the books they are seeking are on the shelf or checked out.

Innovative Interfaces supplies computer systems to libraries for the automation of a wide range of library automation functions. The automated library system selected by Washington College is also used by the Enoch Pratt Free Library in Baltimore, the New York Public Research Library, the tri-college system of Swarthmore, Haverford, and Bryn Mawr, and many college and university libraries around the country. Innovative's products are characterized by ease of use, a high degree of integration, flexibility, and outstanding management information.

Several benefactors have contributed to the $450,000 cost of the conversion process and automation system. Donors include Henry Beck, The Bingham Foundation, the Charles E. Culpeper Foundation, The Frueauff Foundation, and The Surdna Foundation.

Classifieds

The mastermind says 'hello'!

Happy Birthday Jason Imber! You have a package waiting in Central Services!

As for the rest of you lazy, apathetic, bleary-eyed Washington College students, there has been such a lack of interest, involvement, and participation in the classified section that the Elm began as a service to you ungrateful louts, that as of the next issue this feature will be discontinued. We would have done away with it this issue, but of course we needed to fill a lot of space. And just so we don't get offended, enraged, or otherwise reactionary letters to the editor, this is all meant as a friendly, not antagonistic, slap on the wrist with a wet noodle. So there. If you don't want to participate in the Elm the least you can do is send birthday messages and club notices to WAC Happenings, so the incredibly vital and earthshattering information you have to relay will find a home in some form of print media. Is the column over yet?!?

The Washington College Elm

Volume 62, Issue 13

Friday, December 6, 1991

Chestertown, Maryland 21620

fom the foto file of forever ago

This snow covered scene is an unfamiliar one to most Washington College Students, not only because the shubberies are replanted monthly, but because the drown-you-the-instant-you-step-out-the-door rains and the chill-you-so-badly-that-appendages-are-in-danger-of-falling-off winds can't seem to get together to produce any flakes.

Police to Monitor Crosswalk

by Karyn Iacangelo

Chestertown Police will now be directing traffic at the crosswalk during peak evening hours to ensure pedestrian and motorist safety. This comes in response to an incident that occurred on November 21, according to a press release from the Motor Vehicle Administration.

Amy Bortmes, a Washington College student from Waldorf, Maryland, was struck by the car of Nelson Frank Stammer from Bowie.

Mr. Strammer was driving northbound on Washington Avenue approaching the crosswalk. He failed to see Miss Bortmes in the crosswalk and struck her, thus causing her to strike and break his windshield before being thrown free.

Miss Bortmes was flown by Med-Evac to Shock Trauma in Baltimore, Maryland. Mr. Strammer was charged with driver failure to exercise due care to avoid a pedestrian collision.

Activities Fee May be Increased

The SGA has drafted a proposal and submitted it to President Trout concerning the issue of raising the student activities fee for the '92-'93 academic year. There should be a decision on the increase early next semester.

The student activities fee is used for funding The Elm and The Pegasus. The SGA gets the money for allocating funding for campus organizations.

The CIA requested $500 to fund the Comedy Club performance for Wednesday, December 4th. Senator Whitney Myrus moved for the allocation, and the motion was seconded and passed unanimously.

SGA President Kevin Kelly announced that the SGA Christmas Party will be held Friday, December 6th in the CAC from 4:40-6:00PM and dress is semi-formal.

Students Protest Redskin Football

by Jim Haug

(NSNS) It was the Washington Redskins versus the Dallas Cowboys on Nov. 24, but outside the stadium it was Native Americans and local college students versus the alleged racism of the National Football League.

Charging that the nickname "Redskins" promotes the stereotype of Native Americans as a wild and barbaric people, students from Georgetown University, Howard University, and the University of Maryland picketed outside Robert F. Kennedy Stadium with the Native American Students for Progress, a group dedicated to making Indian mascots culturally unacceptable.

"You don't have a team named the 'Niggers,' and it is the same thing," says Collette Becker, a Native American who belongs to the Piscataway Nation. "The Indian people are sick and tired of being used as comical sports team mascots.

"I think we have to watch out for oversensitivity. If something as harmless as a Redskins mascot is changed because of a perceived racial slur, pretty soon we'd have Norwegian-descended people up in Minnesota complaining about the cultural slur of the Vikings as a mascot," avers Elm sports editor and Redskin fan Greg Coss.

"The name was never intended to offend anyone," says a statement released by the Washington Redskins' public relations office. "Over the long history of the Washington Redskins, the name had reflected positive attributes of the American Indian such as dedication, courage and pride."

Mike Bishop, a junior who is studying sociology at Georgetown University, disagrees with the Redskins' statement. "What if the team was named the Washington Popes, and the mascot imitated taking communion at half time?"

Native American Students for Progress was originally formed by graduate student Charlene Teeters at the University of Illinois to protest the schools Chief Illiniwek mascot. Teeters says she had to leave the university over harassment she received from students for her activism.

Teeters and other students hope that if the Redskins make it to the Super Bowl, their cause will once again have the same national attention it received when the Atlanta Braves and the "Tomahawk Chop" were in the World Series.

Maryland Students Protest State Budget Cuts

by Jim Haug

(NSWS) A rally at the University of Maryland armory Nov. 25 was the latest action taken by students and faculty who in recent weeks have blocked a highway, demonstrated outside of the state Capitol, and held teach-ins to protest state budget cuts to their university.

The rally, which began with hundreds of students, faculty members, alumni and parents marching from six different areas of the campus to the university armory, was part of "Maryland at Risk Day." The rally included speakers decrying the tuition increases and budget cuts to the University of Maryland that have resulted in a loss of $40 million over the last two years.

"Teachers are being laid off, classes are being closed, and they are raising tuition," says economics major Marc Solomon, one of the coordinators of Maryland at Risk Day. "We're paying more for less."

Maryland Gov. William Donald Schaefer does not blame any of the students or the faculty for their frustration, according to his Assistant Press Secretary Ray Feldman. But according to Feldman, the state has had to tighten its belt due to the recession. "They have to take their share of the cutbacks as well," he says.

A petition was passed and signed at the rally supporting proposed legislation by state Representative James Rosapepe to restore funding to the university.

In the latest round of cuts, due to take effect this spring, 15 English instructors will lose their jobs and 38 sections of English will be canceled.

"We realize that the enemy is not the governor or the Legislature, since everybody is hurting right now," says English Professor Hank Dobin. "We just want the state to realize the consequences of these cuts, because if they are not stopped, permanent damage will be done to the university."

OPINION/EDITORIAL

What Reading Day for Exams?

If you are a student reading this at the lunch table, having just come from your 11:30 class, or a professor reading this in the faculty lounge while you wait for your next class to start, you are in the wrong place at the wrong time. Today is the Friday before exam week, and since time out of mind no classes are held on this day, which is reserved as a reading day for examinations.

If you are that apocryphal student or professor, you have probably done more work in this one week than you did in the whole first month of school. There are students, and not just a few of them, who have had two 10-15 page term papers due this week, plus a 5 page paper, and perhaps an exam or two as well. And students who are doing all this work are creating work for the professors, who then have to grade everything.

To be sure, some of this week's crunch is our own fault - we knew that the papers/projects/exams were due, and didn't plan in advance to stagger our work. Plus, some things were due this week because they had been postponed to now from original due dates of before Thanksgiving. Being magnanimous about extensions is wonderful of professors who pushed back due dates for that reason, but students should not be punished by having to miss out on an extra day of preparation for finals. It is hugely unfair to students to not allow us the accustomed length of time to study.

You might be inclined to say that nobody really studies before Sunday, anyhow. Perhaps that is true for some students, but those who need the three days should have that option. It is not just final exam studying that is affected by this change in policy, either. Some seniors who have enough credits to graduate this semester are taking comprehensive examinations this weekend, and it is tantamount to sticking bamboo shoots up their nails and tarantulas in their beds to not give these unfortunates a full day to brush up on their four-year accumulation of knowledge.

We realize that this year's schedule has been thrown a loop by the lateness of Thanksgiving, and that next semester's Thursday (Jan 16) return to classes is also mandated by the calendar (so that we can get the required number of credit hours to make our classes for the semester valid). According to the calendar that was distributed at the beginning of the year, however, today was allocated as a reading day for exams. That allocation was revoked because most classes need at least one more day to get through material that had fallen by the wayside.

In the upcoming semester, everyone – students, professors, and administrative-calendar-makers alike – should set workable schedules for themselves and stick to them. Perhaps then professors wouldn't have to grade 100 term papers in a week, nor would students have to finish writing a multitude of term papers in a week. It's a good thing that this is the season when miracles might really be possible.

Weekly Absurdity

Isn't it absurd the way WC goes nuts over Christmas? No, I'm not referring to personal mental problems, though that may sometimes occur. And I do not mean to exclude any members of faiths other than the Christian one; Christmas is now so commercialized and secularized that it ought to count as a general, all-purpose holiday. What I mean about people going nuts are the numerous manifestations of holiday spirit that struck campus just after Thanksgiving.

Christmas trees have appeared in some dorm rooms in cheerful disregard of the overcrowding they cause, and strings of lights have appeared in many more. Yours truly moved furniture around for a few hours so a tree could be put right smack in the middle of my room, for everyone who drops by to admire (and then trip over). Another student of my acquaintance strung garlands and lights in his room, as well as having an almost full-sized tree.

The Dining Hall presented a spectacular Christmas dinner on Wednesday night, and just that once the Honor Code enforcers didn't seem to mind if an extra gingerbread man went home with us. Sorority-sponsored care packages, though intended as final exam stress-relievers, add to the gift-giving atmosphere, and for the first time all semester people's mailboxes are filled, overflowing with cards and candy canes from friends.

Okay, perhaps this is a slightly sappy representation of our last weeks of school - after all, thoughts of getting those papers done are more common than teary reminisces about Bing Crosby's carols. But it is an escape from class obligations and thoughts of ...professoricide, I suppose the word would be... that Christmas vacation offers. No wonder, then that the holiday spirit has infected so many of us !

Isn't it charming the way WC goes nuts over Christmas?

CAMPUS VOICES

QUESTION - Do you think that town-gown relations are bad, and if so, who is to blame?

Curtina Arnold
Edgewood, Md.

I would call the relationship bad, but I believe their could be improvements, which is one of the goals of the Dale Adams Heritage Club. The club is just a starting point to improve the relationship and it' going to take time.

Curtia Arnold
Edgewood, Md.
Freshman

Yes. For the last few years I don't think the school or the town has made a step to improve the relationship. I think if the relationship was improved we could gain a lot from the community, and the community could gain a lot from us. I feel we have to be the one to initiate the first step.

Amy Bortmes
Waldorf, Md.

I would say that the relationship between the college and the town has gotten progressively worse. Both the college and the town are to blame because both groups fail to try to find some common ground on which they can relate to each other.

I don't think so. I've lived in the town as a student and as an employee of the college for almost four years and never had any problems.

Last American Hostages Have Been Released From Captivity!

LEBANON

All American hostages have been freed from Lebanon! Hostages Alann Steen and Joseph Cicippio were freed this week within 24 hours of each other. Terry Anderson, who has been the longest held hostage at 7 years, was the last to be released. All appear to be in fairly good health and are glad to be able to spend the holidays back among family.

WORLD

The latest statistics of the World Health Organization report that five thousand people a day are infected with AIDS. It is estimated that 10 million people worldwide may already be infected with the virus, and by the end of the decade the number is expected to climb to 40 million. Brazil is predicted to be the hardest hit of all countries, and Asia is expected to surpass Africa in annual infections by 1997.

FLORIDA

The trial of William Kennedy Smith is underway, with Smith's lawyer arguing that Smith's accuser willingly had sex with him, then cried rape because he was aloof afterward. Circuit Judge Mary Lupo has refused to let three other women testify that Smith attacked them in the 1980's. This ruling deflated prosecution efforts to show that Smith has a history of abusing women.

WASHINGTON, DC

White House Chief of Staff John Sununu on Tuesday issued a statement of resignation. Sununu has been a controversial figure for over a year now, due to his alleged habit of taking vacations on taxpayers' money, coupled with his genius for inserting both feet in his mouth simultaneously. No replacement has been announced yet.

According to an administration source, the Bush administration is going to propose that colleges be prohibited from awarding scholarships based solely on race. Colleges would be able to issue scholarships to achieve "diversity"—meaning geographic origin, cultural or economic disadvantage or exceptional personal talents; only if both white and minority students were eligible to compete for them.

U.S.A.

The flu-season, which began in November, has started remarkably early this year. It usually starts in December, peaks in early February, and is gone by March. In healthy young people, like us, the disease typically runs its course in five to seven days; and is spread when infected persons cough or sneeze. Warning: no one in the room with a sick person is safe, as the microscopic spray from a cough can be propelled as far as 25 feet. A person with influenza is infectious from the day before symptoms occur to a couple of days afterward. It takes anywhere from a few days to a week to come down with symptoms after being exposed. To avoid coming down with the dreaded virus, either get a vaccine during the upcoming vacation; or try to avoid being around people who cough or sneeze. Good luck.

Josephine the Fly

josephine, (said Big Fly) i have a mission for you.

a mission? (josephine said.)

yes, (said Big Fly) your mission is to save the WAC from napoleon and his evil group of bugs.

but how....? (josephine said.)

next semester, you are going to be reborn into the body of a new bug.... (said Big Fly) and in your new body you will be stronger than a locomotive, and faster than a speeding bullet, and you will be able to leap....

ok, ok, i get the picture (josephine said) you will even, (said Big Fly,) have the powers to go underground, if need be....

Meanwhile, back at WAC, Brenda-the-butterfly felt life stir inside of her. "Oh no...." she moaned, "I'm pregnant!"

And Napoleon and his band of merry, annoying bugs, gathered into a group and went around campus, singing WAC carols.

(to the tune of "Deck the Halls")
Tis the season to have pimples
(Wac wac wac wac wac, wac wac, wac, wac)
The semester's over and nothing's simple
(Wac wac wac wac wac, wac wac, wac, wac)
I've got 5 papers and 4 tests
(Wac wac wac, wac wac wac, wac, wac, wac)
I'm gonna throw up cuz my life's a mess
(Wac wac wac wac wac, wac wac, wac, wac)

(Jingle Bells)
Reading books, reading books,
Readings' such a pain
Oh how I wish I'd kept up with My reading— now I'm insane

(Silent Night)
Silent night, exam night
All's not calm, we're not bright
See the students in Miller Lib'ry
Studying, studying furiously
Cramming for exams...
Cramming for exams.

(Winter Wonderland)
In the meadow we can build a statue
And pretend that he's George Washington
He'll say "Are you studying?"
We'll say "No, Man!
Cuz we're too busy drinking and having fun...."

Later on, we'll perspire
As we sit in class, wired
On 10 cups of caffeine
God, that professor looks mean
Hope we remember all the gunk that we just crammed....

(It Came Upon a Midnight Clear)
It came upon a midnight clear
That order from Subway
It saved me from my stressing
About that Poetry test from Day

(Oh Little Town of Bethlehem)
Oh little tiny Chestertown
How still we see thee lie
Before thy deep and dreamless sleep
The deadly cars go by.

In the dark street shineth
"Pedestrians Cross Here"
We run real fast and hope we'll last
To see another year.

(Chestnuts roasting on an open fire)
Kent House roasting as an open fire
Someone in Caroline has a megaphone
East Hall is really tall
And drunkenness is somewhere in the Middle....

Everybody knows that Queen Anne's is really co-ed
And so is Reed and Minta Martin....
Where is the Quiet Hall— is it in Wicomico?
Or is it situated in Worster....

Does anyone ever visit the Cullen dorms?
Does anyone even know where they are?
What is Dorchester— is it part of Cullen?
And why do they have a big "Ox" sign?

And why did someone steal a rug-cleaning machine from Cardinal?
If you ask me there's better things to steal....
And why are the stupid doors to West always locked?
The guys in Somerset have great appeal....

And so I'm offering this simple phrase
To students both off campus and on:
May you all pass your finals with big, fat A's
And then spend all vacation...having fun.

(Other songs not printed here:

To the tune of "I Saw Mama Kissing Santa Claus": "I saw a naked Sig in Minta Martin/Running through the hallways last night"

And to the tune of "Frosty": "Chuckie the Trout-Man.")

Science Internships Offered by DOE

Are you interested in spending ten weeks next summer collaborating with federal scientists on the cutting edge of research and development? If so, the US Department of Energy's Student Research Participation Program (SRP) is for you.

Only one of several programs offered through DOE's University/Laboratory Cooperative Program and managed by Oak Ridge Associated Universities, the SRP is for sophomores, juniors, and seniors majoring in engineering, physical and life sciences, mathematics, computer science, or the social sciences.

With direction from researchers at major DOE facilities, students use state-of-the-art equipment not usually found in most campus laboratories. Projects relate to individual academic majors, career goals, and the ongoing research and development of the facility.

The instruction and training SRP participants receive is designed to provide a keener perception of energy production, use, conservation, and societal implications. Assignments afford students the opportunity to apply and practice theories and methods learned in the classroom.

Students are selected by the DOE facility staff on the basis of the applicant's academic record, aptitude, research interest, and the recommendation of instructors. Participants must have the potential for graduate study and scientific careers.

Participating DOE facilities include the Atmospheric Turbulence and Diffusion Division, Oak Ridge Associated Universities, Oak Ridge National Laboratory or Martin Marietta Energy Systems, Inc., Oak Ridge, TN; Center for Energy and Environmental Research, San Juan and Mayaguez, P.R.; Continuous Electron Beam Accelerator Facility, Newport News, VA; Morgantown Energy Technology Center, Morgantown, WV; Pittsburgh Energy Technology Center, Pittsburgh, PA; Savannah River Ecology Laboratory, Savannah River Laboratory, and Savannah River Archaeological Research Program, Aiken, SC; Triangle Universities Nuclear Laboratory, Duke University, Durham, NC; and the U.S. Bureau of Mines, Pittsburgh Research Center, Pittsburgh, PA.

Annual Renaissance Dinner Brings Holiday Cheer To Washington College

by Cindy Young

The 10th Annual Renaissance Dinner is being held on Friday, December 6 and Saturday, December 7 in Hynson Lounge. For those of you who don't yet have tickets to this long-awaited event, there may still be time. Admission is $17 a person, $10 for students. Saturday night is already sold-out, but if you want to try for reservations for Friday, call 778-2800, ext. 286.

The Renaissance Dinner features an Old English Christmas Feast with plenty of wassail (yes, just like in the song) and even a real boar's head. Utensils are available, however, as the lords and ladies of this feast think very highly of proper table manners. Entertainment is provided by the Washington College Early Music Consort with singers, recorders, strings, and brass, and the Dance Club will demonstrate several popular dances of the time. All will be in Renaissance attire and mood for the occasion. But if your gown is at the cleaners or your stockings need mending, don't worry—audience participation is not required.

It promises to be a night of fun and frolic, and for those of you who are unable to attend, perhaps you will catch a glimpse of the Renaissance revelers and know what you missed. Soon it will be time to start preparing next year's event!

Review of Disney's New Smash Hit Beauty and the Beast

by Sara Hunt and Sherry Menton

Well, it is the holidays again, thank god. And that means the major studios release a multitude of movies, hoping for a money making hit or Academy Award nominations. Some of the movies are good, some bad, and most indifferent. But before you see the Addam's Family or My Girl, be sure to catch Disney's new animated feature Beauty and the Beast. An almost instant classic; it contains all the traditional Disney touches with slightly adult and often ironic modernizations.

The basic plot line to Beauty and the Beast should be very familiar. A spell is cast upon a proud, arrogant prince, turning him into a beast forever unless he can learn to love and be loved before an enchanted rose drops its last petal. Belle becomes a permanent guest in Beast's castle in order to save her father, who had intruded on the Beast's lands. Gradually she comes to see the man within the Beast, and love him as he loves her.

The heart of the story takes place in Beast's phenomenal palace, exploring the relationship between Belle and the Beast. The Beast is a masterpiece. Enormous and awesome, he is frightening, yet strangely charismatic. More than a few people will recognize him from their nightmares. His eyes, however, are completely human, which makes his condition all the more horrible. Every tortured emotion, each pang of love registers in his blue eyes. Beast is hardly the confident, charming prince found in fairy tales. He is all the more endearing for it.

Belle, however, is the quintessential heroine. She is beautiful, innocent and pure (just like every other Disney female protagonist), but clever and somewhat noble. And when Beast is again a prince, Belle (as well as the audience) can only stare in astonishment and partly wish for the return of the Beast.

Disney adds a new plot twist in the form of Gaston, the village heartthrob, who has determined to marry Belle. Gaston typifies a new outlook in Disney's portrayal of relationships, updating their characters for the nineties. He appears to be the tall, dark hero every girl yearns for, down to the "swell cleft in his chin." His shallowness in wanting Belle, not because he loves her, but because she's "the most beautiful girl in town; that makes her the best," is the antithesis of the movie's theme, that inner beauty triumphs over all.

A new attitude in this traditional story is coupled with editing pyrotechnics that give the animation a depth and voluptuousness never before achieved. Music by Alan Menken and the late Howard

Women Swimmers Beat Salisbury and Bryn Mawr

The women swimmers also had a big night on November 20th when they beat Salisbury State 115-98. Once again the Shorewomen pulled ahead after a strong finish in the 1000 free with Kasey Carroll, Leslie Newcomb and Stina Sturges placing first, second, and fourth.

Mimi Devlin and Nancy Whiteman then increased the lead with first and third place finishes respectively and the 50 meter freestyle event started to wrap things up for the Shorewomen with Magdelena Fuchs, Amy Draper, and Ramsey Bigham coming in first, second, and third.

Kasey Carroll then won the 200 IM and 500 freestyle with Devlin winning the 100 butterfly and Draper second behind her. Fuchs won the 100 free and Whiteman finished second behind her. Whiteman joined Fuchs, Green, and Swinden for first in the 200 free relay.

Three days later the Shorewomen struck gold again with an impressive 143-117 victory over a talented Bryn Mawr team. WC and Bryn Mawr split the first places with seven each so WC had to rely on their second and third place finishes to win the meet.

Captains Kasey Carroll and Leslie Newcomb led the group, with Carroll winning her specialty in the 1000 free and added the 200 fly and IM. Newcomb, WC's #1 breaststroker for four years, won both the 100 and 200 meter breaststroke events. Mimi Devlin took over for Carroll in the 500 freestyle with a super 1-2 finish with Nancy Whiteman. Whiteman also placed a strong second behind Carroll in the 1000, swimming it for the first time and meeting MAC qualifying times.

The backstroke events proved to be the deciding events with WC placing 1-2-3 with Jen Green, Karen Prendergrast, and Dede Swinden. The three women moved to 2nd, 3rd, and 5th on the all-time WC backstroke list. They repeated their team depth and best swims in the 200 backstroke to finish 2-3-4.

Amy Draper and Joan Colton swam their fastest 200 fly swims while Magdelena Fuchs and Ramsey Bigham added important points in the 50 and 100 meter freestyle events. Beverly Diaz and Eleanor Shriver had fine swims in both the 100 and 200 breast events. Both squads had meets against Widener on December 4, to be covered in January.

Men Swimmers Win

The Washington College men's swim team did the inevitable on November 20th at the Casey Swim Center. They put everything together and crushed Salisbury State, 121-73. Freshman Dave Cola won the 100 and 200 freestyle events, and in the process raised his 200 free record to 4-0. He then teamed with Chris Fresheim, Dave Czekaj, and Jarrod Wunderlich for first in the 200 free relay. Tyler McCarthy broke the school 50 meter freestyle record and placed first and also won the 100 backstroke. Later he joined Tim Whittier, Jason Campbell, and Brian Basso to win the 200 medley relay.

Fresheim won the 1000 meter freestyle in a new school record beating teammate Wunderlich by 4/100th's of a second (Wunderlich becomes 7th man to qualify for MAC championships) and also won the 500 freestyle. Jason Campbell added first in the 200 IM while Basso won the 100 fly.

Personal best swims were turned in by Mike Bowman in the 50 and 100 meter freestyle events, Mike Frey in the 200 free and Tim Whittier in the 200 IM.

Disney

Ashman complete the film, adding subtleties to the story that transcends mere accompaniment. Robbie Benson as Beast and Paige O'Hara as Belle ignite the screen and bring life to their characters. Look for several Academy Award nominations for technical and musical achievements. Disney has again achieved what most studios can only dream about.

The NFL Playoff s

Although the playoffs picture is very muddled right now, particularly in the NFC, everything will be settled and the creme will rise to the top. Here is an attempt to be serious about picks since I haven't tried that all year plus I don't have room to tell you the one about McMahon, the four nuns and the midget that stood in the corner. Anyway, here goes nothing, and if you lose money following my advice, tough. I'm graduating so you can't catch me.

Philadelphia defeats Detoit in one wild card game at the Silverdome 23-17, and in the other Dallas suprises New Orleans at the Superdome 34-20. Washington gets revenge on Dallas 37-17 and Chicago beats Philly 17-10. Washington beats Chicago 24-7 to advance to Super Bowl XXVI. There they will face Buffalo and defeat them 33-17. The Jets lose to the Raiders 24-13 in one playoff while Denver beats KC 24-21 in the other. Houston beats LA 34-14 while Buffalo whallops Denver 44-10, Buff.27,Hous.23.

Powershift in Student Center

Coffeehouse Will No Longer Serve Beer

By Doug Smith
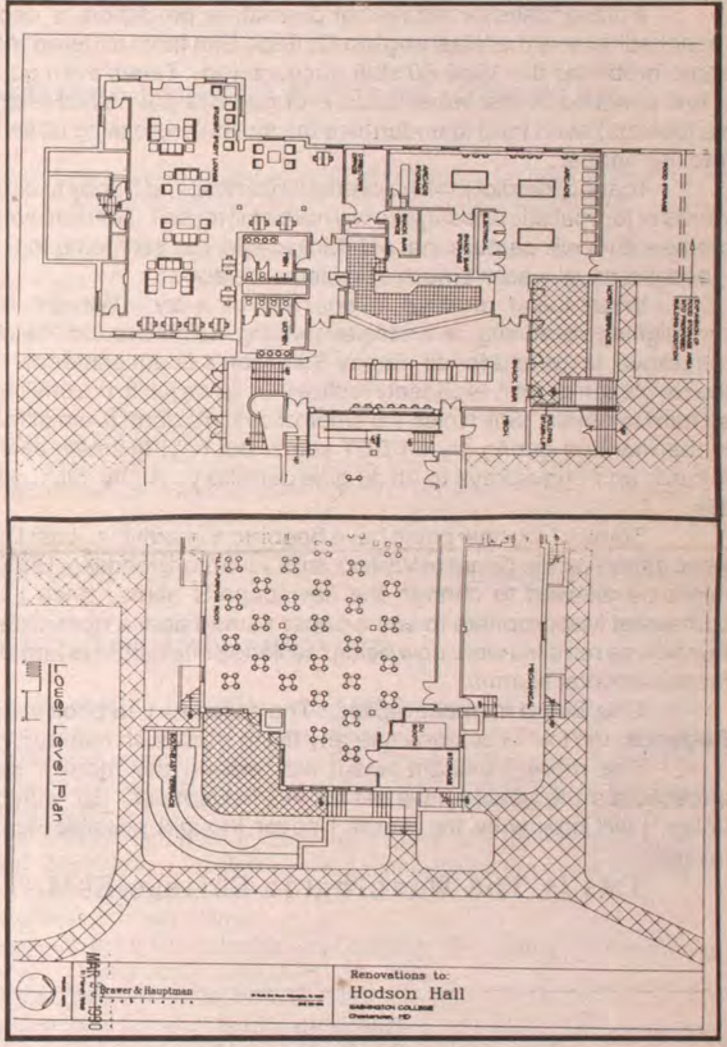
Staff Writer

With the opening of the new Student Center tentatively scheduled for the end of this month, focus on the renovation of the basement of Hodson Hall into a united Student Union has shifted towards the Coffeehouse. While no steps have been taken as yet to revamp the layout of the Coffeehouse, there has been a departmental switch. The Coffeehouse is no longer under the jurisdiction of the Dining Services; it now falls under the control of Student Activities, a new organization created recently and headed by Terry Turmel. The final goal of the Student Union plan is to combine the Coffeehouse with the Snack Bar, and split the duties and responsibilities between the Dining Services and Student Activities, the latter taking charge of everything except the sale of food and drink.

The most noticeable change in the Coffeehouse is the fact that you can no longer buy food or beverages there. The Snack Bar has expanded its hours until midnight to take up the slack, and also offers beer for anyone who misses going into the Coffeehouse for a drink. The Snack Bar will also be covering the alcohol concession during events staged in the C-House; students will be allowed to bring their drinks from the Snack Bar in to the Coffeehouse, however. This guarantees students an opportunity to purchase food at a show or dance. It also provides a better chance to cut down on under-age drinking, while making it easier for those of age to get their drinks without a hassle.

This set-up might seem to be more trouble than it's worth: after all, who wants to leave an event just to get a beer? Kim Coburn, former manager of the Coffeehouse, expressed her opinion. "I do have some serious reservations about it [the switch]. I understand the philosophy behind uniting [the Student Union] or reducing the alcohol intake during dance nights, but I'm hesitant to say that the new system will work any better than the old one."

The changes, however, are justified by Jeff DeMoss, Associate Director of the Dining Services. Placing the alcohol concession in the Snack Bar concentrates all of the employees of the Student Union in one area. "This will cut costs and create monies," Demoss remarked, adding, "The important thing is for people to use the space." The cost of keeping the radically underused Coffeehouse open was beginning to be too much, and the concessions would have eventually been shifted to the Snack Bar. Students working in the Coffeehouse have been guaranteed jobs on campus, and are being interviewed for positions under Student Activities. The transition has begun and it remains to be seen whether or not it will go smoothly.



Plans for the new Student Center in Hodson Hall

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.: A CELEBRATION OF HIS LIFE

By J. Tarin Towers
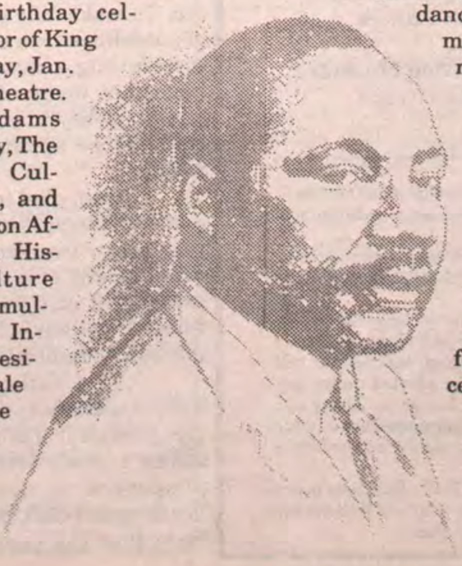
A&E Editor

Martin Luther King, Jr. was born in 1929, received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1964, and was assassinated in 1968. Before his death, he was the recognized leader, physically and spiritually, of the civil rights movement during its 1950's heydey . His memorable career includes the Montgomery bus boycott, his Birmingham jailing that followed a peaceful desegregation demonstration, and the March on Washington, which contributed to his recognition as Time's Man of the Year for 1963.

In a community where issues of diversity and equality are visibly evident, a celebration of King's life and achievements has sparked enthusiasm in the college and the surrounding community. The second annual birthday celebration in honor of King was held Monday, Jan. 20, in Tawes Theatre. The Dale Adams Heritage Society, The Committee on Cultural Diversity, and the Committee on African-American History and Culture sponsored the multimedia event. India Henson, president of the Dale Adams Heritage Society, worked with Ruth Shoge, Marshall Williams, and Kathy Way to put together a program of music, dance, and words of remembrance. "We needed to do something . . . to promote equality, diversity, and education amongst cultures," says Henson. "We worked with a team of volunteers to celebrate this holiday, and I feel it was a success."



King's "I have a dream" speech was playing as the audience was seated, and it set the tone for the evening's entertainment. The keynote speaker was the Reverend Cordell Hunter, whose theme of "Keep the dream alive" struck a chord with the audience; the tone was that of a Methodist sermon. Rev. Hunter was emphatic, during and afterwards, about encouraging "the social, economical, even spiritual growth of all men. If any man is enslaved, all men are enslaved. We are all in the same boat, and it's sink or swim." As Dr. Shoge said after the address, he made his point.

The entertainment aspect of the celebration was gospel-oriented and energetic. The AJC United dancers, a group of 9-12-year olds from three area churches, danced to "In this House" and "Mine Eyes

Flying Horses Over Chestertown

"...At this point in the Elm's long history, it is obvious that if the school and students are in a transitional stage - so is the paper. Which way either will go is up to the student body - both future and present.

The Elm cannot be a regular publication without reliable writers. When the writers disappear - so does the Elm. The Editor of the Elm can see no reason for producing an inferior paper stuffed with filler just in order to put out a product doomed to the snack bar floor....I'm quite sure that the Elm should die...and die now."

I came across the above quote while rummaging through old Elm files last week. They are the words of one of my predecessors, Sandy Sandison, Editor of the Elm, 1959-60. His final editorial blasting the "apathetic masses existent at Washington College" appeared in the same issue announcing Senator John F. Kennedy's arrival at WC for a campaign speech in the old Russell Gym. Several hundred Elms and an Oliver Stone movie later I offer this reply to Sandy, wherever he may be:

Sandy, your hex might have killed the tree, but the newspaper, hopefully, is still very much alive.

Putting Sandy's somewhat premature prediction of doom aside, recent editions of the Washington College Elm have suffered many of the same problems the 1959-60 staff encountered. Times even got so tough a few years back that rebel factions of guerrilla journalists (disguised as cartoonists) even tried to undermine the institution, tossing all its credibility into the hopper.

I cannot predict that the events which inspired Sandy to compose his words of journalistic apocalypse will not befall myself. I will not even say that the new Elm will capture that old 'Elm magic' for, according to Sandy, the 'good ole days' weren't much to write home about.

What I can promise is one hell of a try. We are reworking, redesigning, re-editing, re-writing everything in a mad round-the-clock dash to remove, once and for all, Sandy Sandison's death sentence. Now that the revolution is over, I suddenly realize we have a job to do, one that I fought so hard to obtain. Still I miss the smell of Justin's dorm room at four o'clock in the morning during my OffSET years, but hey, this new chair is comfortable and I have keys to an all-girls dormitory. A guy could get used to this.

Some of my new plans have been slow in arriving. Last December, while attending the Board of Visitors and Governors meeting, I inquired if we might be allowed to change the newspaper's name, since I thought it somewhat inappropriate to edit a paper named after a nonexistent tree, a tree whose remains were now being fashioned into ashtrays and shoehorns for sentimental alumni.

One Board member replied, "The college's yearbook is named the Pegasus, isn't it? You don't see any flying horses on campus, do you?"

The more I thought about his remark, the more it seemed to encapsulate the goals I have set for this newspaper. So, without further delay, I will now write the words I never thought possible coming from myself:

This Is The Washington College ELM.

An Open Letter to the Faculty

Dear Faculty Members:

Toward the end of the December faculty meeting I made a statement concerning plagiarism. Subsequent to that meeting President Trout asked me if I would be willing to reconstruct my remarks and make them available to the faculty in written form. The issue seems so important to me that I have agreed to do that.

A number of students were suspended on account of plagiarism this past semester. If those had been the only instances of it, I would not be as concerned as I am. But I know full well that in all probability there were many more cases of plagiarism this past semester that went undetected, unchallenged, or both.

My own concern about plagiarism at Washington College goes back to my first year here. In one of my courses that year I detected some papers that were clear plagiarisms - ones that I could prove to be such. In the same course there were also some other papers that seemed plagiarized, but I had no proof. I confronted the class and informed them that I had discovered some plagiarized papers. I gave the students involved two days to come see me privately; and, in order to get to the bottom of things, I gave them partial immunity if they did so. To my dismay nearly half the class showed up, and eventually admitted to one form (or degree) of plagiarism or another.

The situation was a distressing and depressing one for me. In the aftermath I even contemplated resigning because I just cannot go on teaching (not then and not now) in a context where so much plagiarism is going on in my courses. I asked myself if perhaps I had done something or, better, had failed to do something that contributed to such a high incidence of dishonest work. Among other things I had to admit that I did not directly inform my students about my personal attitude toward academic honesty. Thus, for this and other reasons, it seemed to me that in a way I shared complicity in what had happened. A kind of complicity by default.

I resolved that as I went on teaching I would make every effort to make clear to students just what my own personal attitude toward academic honesty is. To that end, ever since that first year I have distributed written guidelines to every student, in every class, in every semester, for every single paper assignment that I give them—guidelines that include details about proper documentation, etc. To make fully clear just what sort of guidelines I am talking about, I am distributing a sample. And I deeply hope that many of you will adopt a similar policy in your courses - especially those among you who assign papers.

I am glad to say that the incidence of plagiarism (at least obvious plagiarism) in my courses has dropped dramatically ever since I adopted the practice of distributing these guidelines. But I am sad to say that it has not been eliminated entirely.

In addition to my own first hand experience, I believe that there is a great deal of other evidence which taken cumulatively indicates that plagiarism is widespread here at Washington College. Moreover, I believe that the faculty has a kind of collective complicity in this phenomenon.

In saying this I do not mean to suggest that there is anything like intentional complicity on the part of the faculty—but rather that there is a kind of complicity by default. To make clear what I mean let me briefly indicate what I take some of these modes of complicity to be.

First, I suggest that there is a kind of psychological denial on the part of many faculty concerning the full scope and reality of the problem of plagiarism here on campus.

Second, I think that there is a tendency on the part of some faculty to minimize the detrimental impact of actual occurrences of plagiarism on the well being of our institution.

Third, I believe that there is sometimes an unwillingness or reluctance on the part of some faculty to confront instances of plagiarism personally (perhaps because of apprehensions concerning student evaluations), together with a correlative tendency to "look away" from any but the most glaring forms of plagiarism.

Fourth, it seems to me that there is a lot of wishful thinking on the part of some faculty that the honor code by itself can take care of the problem. (To believe this, in my view, is a delusion of the first order.)

Fifth, it also seems to me that there is widespread neglect on the part of faculty members to make crystal clear to individual students taking courses with them their own personal position on the importance of academic honesty, and their own personal commitment to hold students to the rules of proper documentation.

In my view honest academic work is the sine qua non of a good life and a good society. And I for one do not believe that we really have a flourishing academic environment here at Washington College. There are too many "pass throughs" and too much coddling of "pass throughs." And there is far too much plagiarism!

However, we faculty can collectively do much to remedy the situation. I surmise that most of you would really like to be in a flourishing academic environment. And is this not what our students really need, even if many of them are not aware of it? Is it not what we really need? Is it not what our culture and our world really need? In the great ebb and flow of the world order we in our era are caught in the midst of a seething crisis of the human person and of the human environment that grows from decade to decade. Education is truly the best hope for all of us. Real education! Not collective complicity in plagiarism, and not passive acquiescence to the ethos and cult of the "pass throughs."

Let us take measure of ourselves as we begin a new semester. And as long as we continue to don the mantle of the noble profession of teacher let us make a commitment to give our best to our students, and to ask their best from them. Let us make a commitment to demand of ourselves and to demand of them a scrupulous academic honesty. And let us commit ourselves to the attempt to generate a renaissance of the human spirit and of learning here at Washington College—and to the attempt to inspire even the "pass throughs" to transcend themselves and their usual ways.

Sincerely,
Kevin M. Brien

Neighborhood Association Plans Meeting

The Old Chestertown Neighborhood Association is an organization formed to improve the town by identifying areas of trouble, and correcting those areas. One of these problem areas is the relationship between the townspeople and the college students, in particular, off-campus students. This relationship is not as cordial as one would believe. The organization has sought to improve this relationship by setting up a College Relations Committee. The next meeting of the Old Chestertown Neighborhood Association is Saturday, February 1st at 10:00 a.m., in the Kent County Public Library, 410 High Street. Anyone is welcome to attend.

New Radio Opportunities for WC Students

Florida State University owns and operates WFSU 84.9 on the FM band. Michigan State University has multiple stations on and off campus and numerous other colleges and universities broadcast daily on radio stations across the nation. Here at WC we haven't been able to secure an FM license and really don't have the manpower to fulfill the FCC air time regulations. But with a little juggling of schedules and some help from the Kent County High School station, the voices of Washington College could be broadcast from here to Annapolis, Delaware, and even Baltimore.

90.5 WKHS, with its 17,500 Watt transmitter, is operated by the high school from 8 am until 10 pm, Monday through Friday. KCHS is currently looking for a partner to take over transmission responsibilities for the late evening hours and weekends. A radio broadcasting course will be offered one night a week for six weeks beginning March 4. The Director of WKHS, Karen O'Brien, is willing to teach WC students the skills needed to operate and run a radio station. (A minimum of fifteen people are needed to sign up for the course, which will cost $25.)

In addition to giving talkative WC students an outlet, the joint venture could lead to some interesting developments. At some point, a remote studio might be set up here on campus enabling access to more students. In addition, home athletic events could be broadcast so that alumni and parents as far away as southern New Jersey could hear the Sho'men perform. Perhaps as soon as April, a new late night sound, fueled by Washington College talent, will be hitting the airways.

Terra Firma on the Water

On November 23rd members of Terra Firma, Washington College's environmental organization, took a trip to the Baltimore Harbor. Students spent a day on the Bay with the Chesapeake Bay Foundation examining the effects of industrialization and the overuse of the fragile port of Baltimore. It became evident while examining the fishing samples that the Harbor was virtually dead. The Osprey, one of the Chesapeake Bay Foundation's educational vessels, also took the WC students to Jones Falls, a freshwater tributary to the Chesapeake Bay where refuse is caught before entering the harbor. The sludge and garbage collected is possibly thick enough to walk on despite persistant clean-up crews.

This semester, Terra Firma plans to organize another Chesapeake Bay Foundation field trip. This field trip would emphasize the problems of pollution and overharvesting that plague the Bay. Students would have an opportunity to spend a day working on one of the few remaining skipjacks. TerraFirma is also planning a weekend trip to an environmentally safe farm, a stream clean-up project in conjunction with Save Our Streams Program and Kent County Conservation, and a campus wide environmental day.

WC Mourns Loss of Retired Librarian

Robert Gano Bailey, a librarian at Washington College from 1954 to 1976, passed away December 5, 1991 at the Wilmington Methodist Country House.

Born April 27, 1911 in Bound Brook, New Jersey, Mr. Bailey attended Mount Holly High School, NJ from 1924 to 1928. He then went on to study at Wesleyan University where he received a BA in 1932 and an MA major in French in 1933. After college, Mr. Bailey taught French, Spanish, and Latin at Massaanutten Academy, Woodstock, Virginia, and was also an Associate Professor of French at Davidson College, North Carolina. Before his position at WC, Mr. Bailey attended Columbia University's School of Library Science where he received his MS in 1953.

Bailey is described by those who knew him as a man devoted to his job and Washington College. Besides his love for museums and operas, Mr. Bailey donated numerous books to the library. He is survived by one brother, Richard S. Bailey of Rehobeth Beach, Delaware.

The Right to Die

By Dr. J. David Newell
Chair of the Philosophy Dept.

In the first decade of this century no one worried much about whether or not there was a right to die. In fact, the expression, "a right to die," would have sounded very peculiar to people back then. When a physician announced that nothing more could be done, there was no choice but to await the end. It was a time in which health care providers did everything they could to save lives, but there were serious limitations on what could be done. The old saying was that pneumonia was an old person's friend because it often brought a relatively quick and merciful end to those for whom there was no hope.

In this, the closing decade of the century, the right to die issue has become a serious national and international concern. Several key cases, from Karen Ann Quinlan in the early '70s to Nancy Kruzan in the early '90s, made local and national headlines. A spate of talk shows, newspaper articles, cover stories in national magazines, movies and television shows, college and high school classes, and significant legislative proposals brought this issue to the attention of almost every American. After numerous local and regional court cases, the issue of the right to die finally reached the Supreme Court earlier this year. In June, the nation was shocked by the news that a Michigan physician had invented a suicide machine and was present while the patient used it. Last November the whole nation had its eyes on the state of Washington when voters went to the polls to vote in Initiative 119. This legislative initiative was described as "the nation's first euthanasia bill." More than 222,000 citizens signed a petition to get this bill on the November ballot—73,000 more signatures than it needed. Even though the bill was defeated, the movement to initiate it is still very much alive.

The truth is that, given the current state of things, it is highly likely that most Americans will find themselves wrestling with the right to die issue at some time or other in their lifetimes. Unfortunately, many of us will face such tragic choices uninformed and ill-equipped to make them. In addition to a range of feelings people have when facing near-death situations, there are a number of legal provisions and ethical issues with which one should be familiar. Programs, like the one currently offered by the League of Women Voters, are designed to help us understand the issues and prepare ourselves to make the best decisions.

Even though the Right to Die Movement is only a few decades old, the issue of euthanasia has been around for a very long time. The term itself comes from the ancient Greek and can be translated as "a good death" or "an easy death." It is reasonable to assume that through the centuries many people were quietly afforded the option of a relatively quick and painless death. But with the 20th century came a whole new meaning to the medical mandate: "Do Everything Possible." Dramatic advances in medicine, surgery and technology gave us the ability to extend life far beyond anything previously conceivable. Early in the century, the discovery of penicillin rendered pneumonia no longer life-threatening. Sophisticated techniques for blood transfusions and intervenous feeding enabled us to sustain persons who would not have survived without them. Then came extraordinary success with the transplantation of hearts, lungs, kidneys and bone-marrow. Even the most dreaded of all diseases, cancer, began to give way to advances in chemotherapy and new surgical devices and techniques. In a nutshell, modern medical science had made additional years of meaningful living possible for those who would have otherwise died. A new medical age had indeed dawned.

No sooner were these important and valuable medical advances announced, however, when some unanticipated and difficult problems emerged. Who would get these life saving measures if the supply were limited? Who would decide when to use and when to withhold them in a particular case? When, if at all, is it right to remove a person from such life sustaining devices? Who would pay for such treatments? Is there, in fact a right to die that can be infringed by an inappropriate use of these advances?

These are just a few of the questions that began to emerge as we moved into the new era of highly sophisticated medical care. State and local courts found themselves facing strange new cases with insufficient legislative material with which to work. So legislators had to get into the act. State after state throughout the '60s, '70s and '80s adopted some form of Natural Death Act in which a legal definition of death and provision concerning advanced directives, e.g., the Living Will, was introduced. All but a few states now have Living Will statutes providing an individual with the right to declare formally his or her wishes about treatment options at the end of life. These state provisions are not exactly alike, but there is sufficient similarity among them to provide a more or less uniform option to most Americans. Unfortunately, studies show that for a variety of reasons living wills and other advanced directives are honored in fewer than 25 percent of the cases. Perhaps a quarter of a loaf is better than none, but more needs to be done to improve this situation.

A great many people do not even know that a legal option, such as a Living Will, is available to them. This problem will be addressed somewhat when new Medicare and Medicaid regulations go into effect in November requiring that every hospital, hospice, nursing home and HMO inform patients of the right to accept or refuse treatment, to file an advanced directive, secure a durable power of attorney, etc. These new regulations fall under the Patient Self-Determination Act and constitute a kind of "Miranda Rule" for the terminally ill.

Withholding and withdrawing life support systems upon request is said to be committing euthanasia in the passive and voluntary sense. Some actions to be genuine cases of euthanasia. As opposed to letting someone die (passive euthanasia), active euthanasia is sometimes understood as "mercy killing" in which active measures are taken to bring about death. At this time, those states with laws honoring advanced directives, etc., provide only for passive rather than active measures to be taken. In such states there is, in effect, a right to die if death results from refusing, withholding or withdrawing treatment at the request of the patient. In the Washington Initiative 119, however, the issue was active voluntary euthanasia. For example, the initiative provided for a right to assistance in committing suicide. While suicide itself has been officially decriminalized in our society, it is still unlawful in almost every state to advise, encourage or in any way assist someone in committing suicide. Had the Initiative 119 been passed in November, Washington would have been the only place in the nation in which the right to die was legally guaranteed.

What are the boundaries and limitations of such legislative proposals? Are we putting ourselves on a slippery slope from which we may never recover? Upon what ethical principles and values are we to decide whether to oppose or support such legislative initiatives? In view of the likelihood that such legislation will be proposed in other states and nations, it behooves us all to become as informed and sensitive as we can be to the legal, ethical and practical issues surrounding the right to die.

Have Seen the Glory." The United Methodist Men's Choir of Charles Wesley UMC, Centreville sang "King Jesus is Listening," "Footprints of Jesus," "Over My Head," and "Sit Down," which served as a recessional, all á capella.

Following the keynote speech, the Dale Adams Heritage Society of Washington College sang "Amazing Grace," with Ciaran O'Keeffe on piano. The local gospel performers The Sensational Stars of Kent County are a band featuring guitar, bass, keyboards, and five vocalists. They performed five gospel numbers, including "People Get Ready" and "Lift Every Voice and Sing," which served as the closing.

All in all, the celebration was successful in that it was both well-attended and carried out with enthusiasm. Dr. Shoge adds that she is "pleased that the college is moving in this direction." Hopefully, this current of multiculturalism and equality without prejudice will keep the community moving forward.

Celebrating the Rest of his Dream:

An Interview with Dr. Ruth Shoge

By Patrick Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

On Monday night, January 20, 1992, the Washington College Community presented its second annual Martin Luther King Day Celebration. The event, titled MARTIN LUTHER KING: A Celebration of His Life, was founded by Dr. Ruth Shoge, the reference librarian in Miller Library, and this year's emcee of the celebration.

Dr. Shoge has been a reference librarian for over fifteen years, starting her career at Barnard College and later at Upsala in East Orange, New Jersey before coming to Washington College in August 1990. Originally from Jamaica, Mrs. Shoge moved to the United States in 1970. She received a Bachelor's degree from Howard University in 1973, and her Master's (1974) and Doctorate (1982) degrees in Library Science from Columbia University.

On Wednesday, January 22nd, the ELM interviewed Dr. Shoge concerning her involvement in the King Celebration, its origins, and goals for its continued success in the US and here at WC.

Pat Attenasio: Monday night was my first exposure to a Martin Luther King celebration, and was probably the first exposure for many of the students here at WC, especially the white students.

Ruth Shoge: It probably was the first time for many, and of course, most of the students were not born during King's era....so it was history for them, while for us, it has been a big part of our lives.

PA: You were the host of Monday's celebration. How did you get involved in that? Was it your first year?

RS: No, last year was my first year, but I'm used to there being a Martin Luther King celebration. I'm from New Jersey, New York, the DC area, so the King celebration and the whole holiday has always meant something to me. I moved here [to Chestertown] and I didn't even think about the college and the context of where I was. I called the Activities Director and asked him what was the plan for Martin Luther King's birthday, then I realized that they had never really celebrated it here. He asked if I would like to do something for the celebration, so myself, Jackie Jefferson, Kathy Waye, and Marshall Williams got the first one off the ground last year.

PA: Was last year's celebration different from this year's?

RS: The spirit was very much the same as this year's...it was quite touching. We had it in Norman James and it was just filled, so this year we moved it to Tawes Theatre.

PA: And that was almost filled too. Next year you'll have to move it to the gymnasium!

RS: Yes!

PA: Your opinions on Monday's night program.

RS: As emcee I had a job to do...keep the program moving, have my cue-cards ready and listen to the speeches. The spirit of the event was great, and I could pick that up after at the reception where I had more of an opportunity to talk with the people who came. People seemed very happy about the celebration. The community is really making a big effort to support this celebration here at the college. They are just so thrilled that the college is finally opening its doors and being receptive to the community. This is a wonderful group of people.

> The community is really making a big effort to support this celebration here at the college. They are just so thrilled that the college is finally opening its doors and being receptive to the community. This is a wonderful group of people.

PA: People often see the community and the college as two very separate entities.

RS: Yes, as separate. But, going back to the celebration, the churches announced it, encouraging the members that since the college is making this effort now, we have to respond. The churches don't schedule any programs over that time, so it's become a tradition even though it's only the second year.

PA: Does the community approach the college's celebration differently, since it is the college, and many of the participants, like myself, have never been exposed to something like this before?

RS: Yes. You have different groups here. You have the older people who marched along with Martin Luther King, who were on the Freedom Rides. Their reaction is going to be more emotional since they can sit down and relive this experience. You cannot sit down and give them any scholarly analysis of King. Then we have the other group who were too young to march but were very much aware of what was going on. These people grew up with the memory and saw the flashes of the events as they happened on television. And then there's this new generation who did not experience the life and death of Martin Luther King.

PA: Most of the students at WC were born after King's death.

RS: Yes, most of them do not have that personal experience. I am one of those who lived the experience in Jamaica during most of that time. I did not come to this country until after his death.

I remember once when he came to Jamaica, not for anything political, but as a tourist. People just came out to watch him walk on the street. His memory is very much alive there. We did not experience that kind of segregation as here. We did not experience that, but we knew what was going on and what Martin Luther King stood for.

PA: How do you feel King's message will carry over into the generation of people who were not around...

RS: The message is somewhat different. And they will see and understand and participate differently. Much of what MLK fought for were obvious freedoms, which could be legislated. This generation will need to understand the historical foundations of the legislations such as Affirmative Action so that some of what Martin Luther King fought for can be saved. Besides, King's message includes economic freedom, the right to quality education, freedom to live in a safe neighborhood. This generation has a major role to play in keeping King's dream alive.

PA: What are your feelings on the MLK holiday's treatment as a sort of optional holiday for many Americans? Many of the schools, stores, even banks have the option to stay open. And then there's Arizona's decision to ignore the holiday completely.

RS: I disagree with the governor of Arizona's decision. He is not representing the feelings of many of the state's people. The blacks who live there, even the whites deserve the celebration. I would like to see the Martin Luther King holiday become more a day of awareness and education, especially for the younger generation we mentioned before, so that they may understand King's message, and so that we may now realize the rest of his dream.

> I would like to see the Martin Luther King holiday become more a day of awareness and education, especially for the younger generation, ... so that they may understand King's message, and so that we may now realize the rest of his dream.

"My Father Swims his Horse at Last", into the Top 100

By Amanda Burt
Staff Writer

Professor Robert Day never stops writing. Anyone who enters his office is likely to see him engaged at his typewriter, creating critically acclaimed stories and articles. He rarely has time to pause and note some of his finer accomplishments, the most recent of which includes being named in The Best American Short Stories 1991. "My Father Swims his Horse at Last" is listed as one of 100 distinguished stories in the anthology and appears in its entirety in The Best of the West 4.

Day's mention in The Best American Short Stories 1991 surprised him. Even though his story is recognized in the company of other writers including John Updike, Joyce Carol Oates, and Alice Munro, Day's students had to inform him that he was honored in the anthology. He responded by observing that "the list of distinguished other stories is more distinguished than the winners who had their stories published."

If Day fails to notice some of his own accomplishments, it is because he is too busy writing. "I'm always writing," he says, "even when I'm teaching I'm writing. If I didn't, then my students wouldn't pay attention to me." He is grateful to the college for giving him the opportunity to explore and realize his artistic endeavors.

"I wrote 'My Father Swims his Horse at Last' because I had time to write it. I had a sabbatical, and I appreciate that. The college was extremely generous, and it is nice to know that someone believes in the leave program. It's a commitment to scholarship."

Although Day agrees that the college benefits whenever a member of the faculty is published, he says that no one writes only to advertise. And he is quick to acknowledge the work of others such as Dr. Shivers who have had their work published.

In addition to being listed as a distinguished story, "My Father Swims his Horse at Last" is published in The Best of the West 4 anthology. While the collection is limited to stories about the West, Day hesitates to say that stories about the West are any more honest than other stories. "There is a certain self-congratulatory tone about all anthologies that specialize," he says. "The stories in The Best of the West are no more honest than a John Updike story about living on the East coast. Any good writer strives to write about his own territory with integrity."

"What I'd read in the shag of Verbena's head as I snapped a lead to her halter was that the old mare had no intention of bolting any breaks on her way to Nebraska and the blizzards lurking in the depth of her coat", from "My Father Swims His Horse at Last", by Robert Day

The geographical setting for Day's story is Kansas, an area that he knows well. While he was in college at the University of Kansas, Day lived and worked on a farm. It was there that he learned about ranching, and so he also knows the people about whom he writes. In fact the story is an elegy for one of his friends who always wanted to swim a horse but never did before he died. Day himself swam a horse across the pond in the story on a dare. The boy character is modeled after one of his friends who grew up on a farm named "Half Vast Farm."

Populism is the story's intellectual territory, and Day criticizes himself on the subject. "I think I wrote about populism with more passion than intelligence," he notes, "although no one has questioned my treatment of it."
However, he says that he committed "E.M. Forster's sin" when he researched populism for the story. Forster said that it is unfair for a writer to do research for his or her own fiction.

Day is modest about his current recognition and admits that he admires Vladimir Nabokov. While Nabokov was teaching at Cornell University, none of his students knew that he wrote. Because of the explicit nature of Nabokov's stories, the Cornell library did not keep copies of his work. "If I could," Day says, " I would trade in not having my work at the library for the ability to write like Nabokov."

Currently, Day is working on a story titled "Pan Kansas Swimming Champion." Several of his articles will also appear in upcoming issues of The Washington Post, Smithsonian, and Modern Maturity.

ELM: What do you say to the idea that Frenchmen hate Americans and that you are very opinionated?

ES: It's true that most, not all, Frenchmen dislike Americans. I think it's really superficial however. Yes, Frenchmen are opinionated.

ELM: Why do you think that this feeling exists?

ES: We're quite an old civilization and you're like savages. That's not my personal opinion, but how it is perceived in France. You're like children.

ELM: How is America perceived by the younger generation in France?

ES: The younger ones like to come here because there is so much to see.

ELM: What do you think of President Bush?

ES: I think he's been interested in foreign affairs too much. He didn't care enough about domestic issues.

ELM: Do you think the fall of Eastern Europe and Russia was caused by NATO's military strength over the last twenty-thirty years or was it caused by economics?

ES: The people, I think, were fed up with communism and wanted change; thanks to Gorbachev, not George Bush or Ronald Reagan.

ELM: What do you think about Francois Mitterand?

ES: He's getting a bit old.

ELM: Any final thoughts . . .?

ES: I hope to be on the front page. Ha, ha.

ELM: Thank you, Eric.

One day in July a drunken group of junior scientists hooked an electrode to an ordinary household fern and were surprised to discover that the plant registered thought patterns much like that of a human. The plant displayed signs of shock when the scientists ate corn and, furthermore, the needles went crazy when they began tossing a tomato around the room. Spurred on by this, the scientists continued research on the plants until they had constructed a synthesizer through which the plants were given speech.

It turns out that plants were revolutionaries. There had been many plant uprisings but no one had ever noticed. Plants were tired of staying in one place all the time and wanted to drive cars. "We demand we be given jobs as taxi drivers!" they screamed. However, Congress turned down the notion. "We demand we be given jobs as bus drivers!" they shouted. Again, Congress intervened. "We demand that we be given jobs as Dominos Pizza Deliver men!" It be became clear that the plants were envious of man for the sole reason that men drove cars. Congress outlined a list of reasons in which it was explained to the plants why they could not drive: 1) They had no arms, 2) They had no legs, and 3) They had no eyes and so could not pass the vision test. The plants shrieked prejudice. They organized huge rallies that were a dismal failure. Finally Congress decided to dismantle all the voice synthesizers. "Hell," said Congressman McArtle from Virginia, "We liked it better back before we knew they hated us."

Music by Black Composers

By John Blakelock
Staff Writer

The "Music by Black Composers," concert was performed by pianist Sheila McDonald, Sunday afternoon, January 19, 1992, in conjunction with the celebration of Martin Luther King, Jr. Day. The concert was sparsely attended and it seemed just chance that people happened to be in Tawes Theatre and that Ms. McDonald was playing the piano. It was as though no performance took place at all, and this was partly because Ms. McDonald presented her music that way. She did not seem to be trying to please the audience; she was merely playing and it was by sheer coincidence that the audience was even there, much less enjoying it very much. In fact the audience's applause appeared to surprise her, as if she was humble enough to think, "Who could be applauding for me?"

As for the music of the Black Composer ... Is he a different breed of composer? Some foreign entity to Western Music? Indeed not. He, as was the case for this concert, is entrenched in the traditions and thoughts of Western Music. He is a product of Western Music, but he brings to Western Music something different in and of himself. His musical traditions may be similar, but his own traditions and his own history help to formulate his music within the set tradition. The sense of the music was that there was a seriousness at work, but at the same time it maintained a sense of humor. It was almost as if someone had brought back Beethoven and graced him with a different perspective, a certain lightness of spirit that Beethoven himself never had. The best link between Western Music and this concert may be the Negro Spiritual, which, while it realizes the troubles and hardships of life, has the ability to look beyond them to something greater, to something more significant.

As usual, it is a shame that more people did not attend the concert, but perhaps a larger audience would have taken away some of the comfort of the performer. Ms. McDonald is surely a gifted performer and a wonderful interpreter of the Black Composer. However, it seems somewhat tragic that it takes a concert of "Music by Black Composers" to hear from them at all.

AMERICAN INDIAN COLLEGE FUND DIRECTOR TO SPEAK ON ECOLOGY

David L. Archambault, Executive Director of the American Indian College Fund and President of Standing Rock College in North Dakota, will lecture on ecology and the American Indian's unique relationship with nature, at Washington College on Monday, January 27 at 7:30 p.m. The lecture, free and open to the public, is sponsored by the college's Joseph McLain Program in Environmental Studies, and will be given in the Dunning Lecture Hall.

The title of Archambault's talk is "'Omitakuye Oyasin:' We are All Related," and Archambault will focus on the American Indian belief that humanity and nature are interdependent and vitally connected. This belief is now being widely adopted by ecologists and preservationists working to achieve a more balanced relationship with the natural world.

The American Indian College Fund is a non-profit organization that raises money from the private sector to support 26 tribal colleges located on and near reservations across the United States. The Joseph McLain Program in Environmental Studies was established at Washington College to foster academic and special programs at the college related to environmental and Chesapeake Bay studies.

PARADISE

A Reading by Elana Castedo

By J. Tarin Towers
A & E Editor

The last in a series of readings and lectures by bilingual, bicultural writers was held on Tuesday, January 21 in the Sophie Kerr Room. Elena Castedo, who was born in Spain and grew up in Chilé, is the author of Paradise, a novel which she wrote in both English and Spanish.

Paradise, or El Paraíso, was nominated for both the National Book award and Spain's prestigious Cervantes prize. Castedo, who holds a Ph.D. in Romance Languages from Harvard, describes herself as a "language bigamist." She first completed the novel in her second language, English, and after its publication, wrote El Paraíso, the Spanish version. Most authors, with such notable exceptions as Beckett and Nabokov, do not translate their own works. She says the translation was a difficult process, but that she could not imagine anyone else writing her book in her native language of Spanish.

Castedo has published two short stories in English, and numerous articles and poems in Spanish, but Paradise was her first novel. When asked to characterize the book, she says that she does not know what to call it, but that the critics have dubbed it "Essentialism," because it distills the essence of many literary genres. The narrator is a ten-year-old expatriate girl who, like Castedo herself, moved about from place to place all through childhood. The novel attempts to convey several points-of-view, for children see much more than they understand. Castedo's talk was humorous and entertaining, and her novel is more evidence that the bookstore needs to order fewer coffeetable books and more quality works by visiting authors, regardless of their fame.

VIM VENDERS FILM FESTIVAL

Vim Venders' new film, Until the End of the World, has met with favorable reviews from critics at the Washington Post and Rolling Stone. The all-original score includes tracks from groups such as U2, Talking Heads, Lou Reed, R.E.M., Elvis Costello, Depeche Mode, and Julee Cruise. Washington College students will have the chance to see the new movie and also sample some past Venders movies, which can be hard to locate on video.

On Tuesday, January 28, the Literary House Film Series will open with two Venders flicks—Paris, Texas at 7:00 p.m., and Wings of Desire at 9:00 p.m. This showing is sponsored by the Writers' Union and is free and open to the public.

On Friday, January 31, the Writers' Union will sponsor a culture van trip to the Washington, D.C. area to see Until the End of the World, and the group will adjourn after the movie to a coffeeshop to discuss what they have seen. The culture van costs $3.00 per head, and students must cover ticket costs themselves. To sign up, contact Tom O'Handley in the Development Office on the second floor of Bunting, or call him at ext. 389.

Basketball Loses Key Player

By Charlie Linehan
& Chris Vaughn
Sports Editors

Due to academic reasons, Sophomore guard Greg Rogers will not be returning to Washington College this semester. Having spent the Fall semester on Academic Probation, it seems that he was unable to attain the necessary GPA for removal from AP. When asked whether Rogers will return next semester, Athletic Director Geoff Miller responded, "I believe he's eligible to return . . . .I have not heard anything to the contrary."

Avid Washington College basketball fans will recall Rogers' aggressive style of play which often sparked the team defensively while stimulating crowd spirit as well. Offensively, Rogers was not a tremendous threat but his superior defensive skills had earned him a starting position on the squad.

In response to questions regarding Rogers' role on the team, Geoff Miller remarked, "He's a real competitor and really brings the defensive level up a notch." Head Coach Tom Finnegan commented on Rogers' constant hustle and Assistant Coach Steve Johnson added, "[Greg] was without question the hardest worker on the team . . . he's a real good person and he provided a lot of leadership to the team."

Considering Greg Rogers' defensive contribution, it would seem that the squad must re-evaluate its defensive strategy for the remainder of the 1992 season. Questioned as to the effect of Rogers' absence, Junior Guard Peter Basel remarked, "At first it was kind of a shock . . . but we stepped up and took the challenge . . . and we'll go from there." Asked about specific changes in the line-up to compensate for the loss of Rogers, Coach Finnegan said,"we are starting Charles Cummings and continuing to bring Peter Basel off the bench." Coach Finnegan also indicated that Freshmen Jason Ronstadt and Adam Poe would probably be seeing increased playing time.

In response to questions about possible revisions in his pre-season expectations for the team, in light of the loss of Rogers, Coach Finnegan remarked, "Well, anytime you lose a player who hustles and gives you a hundred percent and who really understood the game like Greg, there's a certain amount of loss and things that you have to compensate for but . . . I don't see any reason why we can't make the necessary adjustments to hopefully continue to improve." Finnegan went on to say that, in light of the team's very competitive schedule and current eight and seven record, " . . . we have a pretty decent team and a team that I think could become a good team by the end of the season." Added Coach Johnson, "Basically we just have to go on with business as usual."

SUPER BOWL XXVI

By Julie Greene
Staff Writer

This Sunday the Buffalo Bills return to the Super Bowl to face the powerful Washington Redskins.

Buffalo is coming back from a period of preparation during which they had to analyze what went wrong in their narrow victory over Denver in the AFC championship game. The Bills' offense was unable to score and were lucky the Denver Broncos' kicker David Treadwell had an unsavory three field goal misses, two of which bounced off an upright.

The Bills' only touchdown was the result of nose tackle Jeff Wright reading the screen and tipping the ball into teammate Carlton Bailey's hands, so Bailey only had to run by quarterback John Elway to score.

Quarterback Jim Kelly was neutralized and has to regain his confidence if Buffalo expects to even compete Sunday.

Meanwhile, in the NFC championship game the Redskins scored their first touchdown in the first two minutes of the game, after a turnover. They continued to dominate offensively as well as defensively, intimidating rookie quarterback Erik Kramer throughout the game.

The Skins and the Bills have been on a course to clash in the Minneapolis Metrodome for Super Bowl XXVI all season. The Bills are hoping to erase the bad memories of last year's disheartening loss to the New York Giants, but they are the underdog in this match-up. The Redskins return to the Super Bowl for the fourth time in ten years, all under Coach Joe Gibbs. Since their only season losses to the Dallas Cowboys and the Philadelphia Eagles, Gibbs has kept his team prepared mentally as well as physically. They no longer expect easy wins and give their opposition the respect they deserve; they will not feed the Bills' drive with any negative remarks or showy shenanigans.

The Bills will be bringing their no-huddle offense up against a top notch defense led by Charles Mann and Wilbur Marshall, with Darrel Green in the secondary. Kelly may be the man to find the right holes in the midfield against the Skins' defense, if he can regain his confidence. If the Skins keep Kelly from making the big play, then Bills Coach Marv Levy better have some dandy surprise plays in store for Washington. They should include his wide-outs Andre Reed, James Lofton, and Don Beebe.

While the Bills have Thurman Thomas, the Skins have Gerald Riggs, Ernest Byner, and Ricky Ervins for their running game. In addition, the Hogs, the largest offensive linemen in the NFL, give Rypien complete protection, allowing him to pass the ball effectively. Thanks to the Hogs, Rypien was sacked only eight times in regular season action. The Hogs will be tested by Bailey, Shane Conlan, and Bruce Smith, who is still a threat, even though his knee is injured.

The line says the Redskins are favored by seven points and I say that if Rypien and the Skins' stay healthy, the line is an understatement. Last year when the Bills were headed to the Super Bowl and the Skins were, to be generous, okay, the Skins destroyed the Bills at RFK. However, the Super Bowl will be on neutral territory, and inside on artificial turf. Buffalo has the advantage on that point. Lastly, if it comes down to a kick, who would you pick—Chip Lohmiller, the man who scored more points with his foot than the Indianapolis Colts this season, or Scott Norwood, the kid who felt the loss of Super Bowl XXV on his shoulders as well as on his foot?

Women's Swimming Drowns E'Town

By Kim Lessard
Swim Coach

It's been a tough season for the aqua-women of WAC this year as they are missing a possible 6-1 record by only 5 points from three losses. Instead they face a current frustrating standing of 3-4.

However, this past week, swimming stars Kasey Carroll and Freshman Amy Draper led the Women's Swim team to a 117-59 win over Elizabethtown as the team placed first in 10 of 11 events. Carroll continued winning her specialty events of 500 free, 1000 free, & 200 Individual Medley while Draper won the 50 free, 100 fly, and joined Nancy Whiteman, Ramsey Bingham, and Magdalena Fuchs for first in the 400 free relay.

Magdalena also added first in the 100 free and helped achieve first in the 200 medley relay with valiant efforts given by Karen Pendergast, Leslie Newcomb, & Mimi Devlin. The other relay squad composed of Eleanor Shriver, Beverly Diaz, Joan Colton, & Ramsey Bingham placed third.

Yet another first place finish came in the 200 free from Mimi Devlin with her personal best time of the season. Leslie Newcomb continued the rout, by taking first in her specialty, the 100 breast with Nancy Whiteman achieving 2 important third place finishes in the 100 & 200 free.

Let's not forget Karen Pendergast who gave the team second in the 11th event, the 100 back.

Says coach Kim Lessard, "E'town beat us at the MAC's last year so this year we are hoping to go ahead of them with this victory."

Their next match is away as they face the Red Devils of Dickinson on January 25th. This one should be a real test!

Men's Swimming Continue Record Pace

By Kim Lessard
Swim Coach

The Men's swim team may have dropped one to a good Elizabethtown team (108-92), but they continued their record setting pace, adding 6 new team records in this last competition. "This was a super meet for the men. They showed they are going to keep getting tougher with the times turned in today," said Coach Lessard. "They hung in right to the end."

Washington placed either first or second in all events with only one third place finish in the 100 Breast.

The day started with a first place in the 200 Medley Relay by the strong combination of Tim Whittier, Jason Campbell, Brian Basso, & Tyler McCarthy. WAC then took first in the 200 Free, which was also a record time set by David Cola, and in the 500 Free by Chris Freisheim. A possible first in the 100 Free by David Cola was taken away by the judge's decision when the times came up exact at 51.00.

Second place finishes, which were also record setting paces for the team, came in the 1000 Free by Freisheim, the 200 Individual Medley by Campbell, & the 100 Back by McCarthy. Mr. McCarthy also placed second in the 50 Free which was a personal best and qualified him for the MAC Championship. David Czekaj joined him in this honor as the 8th WC man to qualify for the MAC's.

Second was also achieved in the 100 Fly by Brian Basso with records being broken in the 100 Breast by Campbell and 400 Free Relay by Mike Bowman, Basso, Andrew McKim, & Freisheim.

Keep an eye on this youthful team of which 7 of the 13 are freshmen. Records are being shattered at an unbelievable pace as this team's future is getting brighter all the time!

B-Ball Hangs Tough

By Melissa Harmeyer
Staff Writer

After two consecutive losses, the Washington College Basketball Team regained their confidence and demonstrated their true talent and ability Tuesday night, defeating Gettysburg 75-63.

A week ago, the Sho'men travelled to Elizabethtown and lost a heartbreaking match. An E'town guard sunk the winner with 1.8 seconds left, giving them the win, 83-82. Says Coach Finnegan, "We lost a tough one at the buzzer, a game I feel we should have won, on a last-second three-point shot by E'Town that beat us."

The following Thursday, 12th ranked Salisbury State visited the Cain Dome, defeating Washington 93-82. The Sho'men led early, 9-2, but with the help of All-American Andre Forman, the SSU Gulls went ahead 20-13 with 12:19 left in the half. However, by halftime, the Sho'men led again 41-39 thanks to Darren Vican and Allen Lester's combined 21 points.

Battle for control of the game was evident early in the second half, before SSU stole the lead permanently. Lester and Vican both compiled 22 points, which put them at the top of the charts. Cummings, Liddy, and Dutton each had 8 points.

Junior guard Peter Basel led the Sho'men with 21 points in Tuesday's victory over Gettysburg. With 6:13 left in the second half, Basel stung a clutch free throw to break the 54-54 tie and put Washington ahead for the remainder of the game. Darren Vican, Junior All-MAC center, contributed 18 points and 12 rebounds while Liddy and Lester each had 14.

Although the game was tied 32-32 at halftime, the Bullets led only 6 times in the second period. Liddy had 2 points while Ruppert and Lester each added 3 points to Basel's 16 tallies in the second half alone, clinching the game against Gettysburg.

Wednesday night should prove a big one as the Sho'men challenge 13th ranked Johns Hopkins and remain busy facing Swarthmore on Saturday night. Tip-off for Saturday night's home game will be at 7:30pm. Be there!!!

Women's Hoops

By Margaret Doyle
Staff Writer

The Washington College Women's Basketball Team has proven to be a competitive team in its first season of play with even greater potential for the future. The team holds a 2-2 record against local community colleges. Stellar coaches Judy Berry and Sue Brown have used their past playing experience to help make this program successful. Despite the limited resources and lack of gym time, the Shorewomen have pulled together to earn the respect of opponents as well as the college community.

The team is led in scoring by Marge "The Clincher" Doyle and Pam "The Terminator" Hendrickson. With the combination of power forwards "Air" Kristy Hilgartner, Tina "Bombs Away" Lennon, and center Eleanor "The Tree" Shriver, the team has a strong transition from defense to offense. Megan "The Mop" McCurdy and Miriam "The Terror" Dittman have frustrated many of their opponents with their outstanding defensive skills. Jen "Dr. J" Sloan and Claudia "Jumpshot" Baldwin have combined their excellent ball handling skills with their sharp passing to improve the Shorewomen's offensive game.

The team faces Chesapeake College this Saturday at 5:00pm in the Cain Gymnasium. Come and experience the thrills and chills of Women's Basketball at Washington College.

Peter Basel, Washington College offensive powerhouse, prepares to dust a bewildered defender. In the past three games, Basel tallied a remarkable scoring average of over 20 points per game. Says Assistant Coach Steve Johnson, "Peter's probably as much of a starter as anyone else, coming off the bench. He prefers coming off the bench, and he's really picked up his game, playing a lot more minutes, and is playing a lot better." (See, "B-Ball Hangs Tough", pg. 11)

LAMBDAS LOSE FRAT STATUS

By Patrick Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

In their final meeting on Tuesday evening, January 28, the brothers of Lambda Pi Delta, a locally recognized Washington College fraternity since the late 1960s, mutually decided against pursuing a national charter. Without this charter, a requirement for all Greek organizations at WC since 1988, the fraternity will no longer be officially recognized by the college. This decision was delivered to Edward Maxcy, Associate Dean of Students, on Wednesday morning by both Rusty Brink, representing Delta Chi, the national association the Lambdas were pursuing, and Dave Lipinski, current President of the fraternity.

Without official recognition from the college, Lambda Pi Delta will no longer be eligible for group housing or participate in the official rush period. They will also no longer have any involvement on the Greek Council.

This outcome, according to Lipinski, "has taken a great deal of time to reach," adding, "there was not one hundred percent commitment amongst all the members to pursue the national charter. It was a mutual decision for the better of the group not to pursue the charter with Delta Chi."

Reasons for this decision date back to Spring 1990 when the Lambdas began an active search for a national charter. By Spring 1991, according to Lipinski, members of the fraternity were sworn in by Delta Kappa Epsilon, a nationally recognized charter. However, Washington College administrators, chiefly President Trout, expressed their concern regarding the organization's reputation amongst other institutions on the east coast. After further investigation by Maxcy, the college, concerned whether DKE would best provide adequate structure and leadership the fraternity needed to function properly, consulted with Lambda officers. After plans with DKE fell through, Washington College granted the Lambdas a one year extension to pursue another national charter.

"As a group," Maxcy stated, "they did not move quickly enough [to locate a new charter], although many individual members of the fraternity were very active in this pursuit."

According to Lipinski, the Lambdas were limited to a small group of national organizations to choose from before settling on Delta Chi last semester. "There was an overwhelming amount of work put into this by members of the fraternity...the amount of time involved was and would continue to be tremendous," Lipinski stated. "We have no hard feelings towards Delta Chi." Lipinski added that fraternity members would now focus their commitment to academic and lacrosse concerns, while remaining an unofficial social organization.

"I have enjoyed working with Lambda leaders over my twenty years at Washington College," Dean Maxcy stated. "They accepted graciously and honorably that their organization ceases to exist."

Blizzard of Bucks Storms Coffeehouse

By Pat Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

Despite recent warm weather, Washington College found itself in the midst of a storm last Monday night, January 27, when the Blizzard of Bucks, a unique collegiate gameshow offering students the opportunity of winning up to $500, visited the CoffeeHouse. This event, sponsored by the Student Activities Committee and substituting this week for the Wednesday Comedy Night, attracted a near capacity crowd of hopeful contestants and enthusiastic onlookers.

Although making its first appearance at WC, the gameshow, hosted by James Jason and his 'lovely assistant' Jennifer Dungan, travels across the country, last semester visiting eighty-five college campuses. Twelve contestants, organized into three separate heats, compete in alternatively humiliating and hilarious physical challenges, the winner of each heat going on to the final play-off round. The winner of this last round then faces the ultimate challenge: thirty seconds in the money booth, an eight-foot tall glass cage. An electric fan, located on the floor of the booth, sends money (hundreds of one-dollar bills) swirling around the contestant, who is allowed to keep as much money as he/she can stuff into a canvas pouch

Beneficial-Hodson Trust Grants College $800,000

By Amanda Burt
Staff Writer

A grant of $800,000 was awarded to Washington College by the Beneficial-Hodson Trust at its annual luncheon in December. WC President Charles H. Trout accepted the gift from Finn W. Caspersen, chairman and chief executive officer of Beneficial Corporation and chairman of the Beneficial-Hodson Trust.

One-half of the grant will benefit the merit scholarship program, which recognizes the academic and personal achievements of incoming freshmen. The merit program is also sponsored by the Beneficial-Hodson Trust. Another $300,000 will help renovate Hodson Hall, and the remaining $100,000 will be allocated to financial aid for students.

In 1914, Colonel Clarence Hodson founded what is now Beneficial Corporation under the name of the Beneficial Loan Society. It began as a company committed to giving the consumer an opportunity to borrow money, and it has evolved into a large Corporation that continues to expand. Currently, Beneficial is involved in banking, income tax preparation, merchandising, consumer finance services, and insurance programs. It has affiliated offices in eight countries.

Colonel Hodson first became interested in Washington College when his car suffered a flat tire on Washington Avenue one morning before work. After several WC students helped him, Hodson investigated the college out of gratitude and found it to be an institution worthy of financial aid.

The Hodson family has a long history of dedication to the advancement of education. Colonel Hodson's father founded the Hodson Trust in 1920, and the Beneficial-Hodson Trust has given over $16.1 million since 1936. The Trust also endows three other colleges in Maryland, including St. John's, Johns Hopkins, and Hood College.

This is not an Editorial

Jake's this guy I worked for over the summer whose father survived the Titanic crash in 1912 only to drown sixty years later in his granddaughter's inflatable backyard pool. He tells me this on one of those August afternoons when even your eyebrows sweat, and you'd rather roll a Pepsi can across your forehead than drink from it, lips parched and cracked like old blacktop. The two of us take care of this old church in town - vacuuming, windows, yardwork, etc. - but today, beneath the steamy shade of an old maple, Jake wants to talk. He talks and I listen; it's too hot to do anything else.

He starts talking about Lou Gehrig, the disease not the baseball player. -I've got Lou Gehrig in my legs, he says, patting his dead legs like he's about to jump out of his wheelchair. He keeps talking. Turns out Jake was a mechanic in the War (he says it like that - "The War"), and even tuned up the bomber that flew over Nagasaki. Once he even walked three hundred miles across a desert to marry his wife in Las Vegas.

-Imagine that, he says, after all that distance and now I can't even tie my own shoes.

Now he wants me to talk. Tell me a story, he says, tell me something.

I go on about this cross-country race I had in high school. Me and this other guy were even the whole way, and with only fifty yards left, he suddenly pulls ahead of me. I could see him and I could see the finish line; but my legs do not respond, they become anchors. So that's it, I tell him, like I'm making some monumental statement. I lost the race (I say it like that - "The Race").

-That's tough, Jake says.

Four months later, it's snowing and I'm in Chestertown trying to write an editorial. Some guy came to my house and pissed in my ice-trays over the weekend. It's been one of those weeks. Believe me, I've got other things on my mind. Before they come and take me away, I better say something of importance, so here it is:

SEND US MORE LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

I keep getting these anonymous letters (Rod Stewart?) in my mailbox. If I don't receive anything for next week, I will start printing more of these stories. I'm doing a Senior Writing Portfolio, so I warn you folks, we're talking lots of material here.

The Titanic rests on the floor of the Atlantic. An old man lies face down in a swimming pool. Jake reaches for his untied laces. I am close to finishing this (whatever it is), but there's this weight, an anchor driven into my head. Drink some Pepsi and don't worry about the ice-cubes. Try to put words to it and all I come up with is...distance. (I say it like that - "Distance").

Diversity and the Handicapped

Minorities. What was the first thing you thought? If you're like most people, you probably thought of Blacks, Jews, or Hispanics. In typical American Society, the perception of minorities is frequently limited to ethnic and religious groups.

With regard to Blacks and Jews, the College has appropriately responded to "mainstream" minorities through student and administrative efforts, with groups such as The Dale Adams Heritage Club and Hillel. As well, there have been successful responses to women's and gay issues through the Women's Issues Discussion Group, and the Gay and Lesbian Alliance (GALA). These organizations exemplify and support President Trout's commendable year and a half long campaign to promote diversity within the Washington College Community.

We applaud these efforts and their contribution to raising the consciousness of our campus. Yet, there are other valid minority populations that Washington College has been slow to acknowledge adequately. Foremost on this list is the disabled.

Ask friends who have been on crutches how easy, or difficult, it was to navigate their way around campus. They would be quick to recount their frustration in attempting the climb to a third floor class in Bill Smith or their annoyance in having to leave a half hour early to reach most any destination on campus.

Fortunately, for these students, the campus is only inaccessible for a few days. For the disabled, today's campus is inaccessible every day.

Consider the tour guide introducing Washington College to a prospective student, but unable to enter even the main classroom building. Consider the visiting parents who cannot climb the steps to their son or daughter's dorm. Consider the renowned speaker unable to present a lecture because of the inaccessibility of the Norman James Theater. Every time a situation like this occurs Washington College loses. Are these losses acceptable?

Washington College's present move towards diversity should encompass a far wider scope that includes a campus accessible for the disabled.

Correction:

In last week's "Open Letter to the Faculty," the ELM inadvertently left out a line in Professor Brien's letter. The statement "In my view honest academic work is the sine qua non of a good life and a good society" should have read "In my view honest academic work is the sine qua non of a flourishing academic environment, just as honest work in general is the sine qua non of a good life and a good society." The ELM apologizes for the error.

In Brief

Starr Foundation Awards Grants To Washington College For Faculty Enrichment and Student Scholarships

The Starr Foundation has awarded Washington College two grants totalling $350,000.

A grant of $250,000 will support senior faculty sabbatical research over the next five years. This grant will allow the College to strengthen the intellectual life of the institution by providing for at least two additional leaves per year, says College President Charles H. Trout.

An additional Starr Foundation grant of $100,000 will further augment the C.V. Starr Scholarship Fund established in 1986 as a permanent scholarship endowment. Annual awards are made on the basis of academic merit and financial need.

Cafritz Foundation Finances Full-Year Scholarship At Washington College For Minority Student

The Morris and Gwendolyn Cafritz Foundation has awarded a $15,000 grant to Washington College through the Project Excellence scholarship program, financing the first year college expenses for a black student from the Washington, D.C. area.

Project Excellence scholarships are awarded to "the best and brightest" black high school seniors from the Washington, D.C. area. Founded in 1987 by syndicated columnist Carl T. Rowan, Project Excellence rewards black students who excel academically.

Washington College's association with the Project Excellence program will continue throughout the next four years, furthering the College's efforts to attract minority students.

Christian A. Johnson Endeavor Foundation Awards Grant To Washington College For Faculty Leave Program

The Christian A. Johnson Endeavor Foundation has awarded Washington College a $125,000 challenge grant to help establish a junior faculty leave program.

The Christian A. Johnson Fellows program will help the College remain competitive in the bid for new faculty, says College President Charles H. Trout. Under the program, non-tenured faculty will compete for the opportunity to pursue productive scholarship off-campus.

The Johnson Foundation grant, payable over two years, is to be matched dollar for dollar by Washington College.

Neighborhood Association Meeting Tomorrow

The Old Chestertown Neighborhood Association will hold its monthly meeting tomorrow, February 1, at 10 am in the Kent County Library on High Street. All off-campus students are encouraged to attend since the association is greatly concerned with WC students' conduct within the community. Student involvement in this meeting will help remove recent negative publicity off-campus students have received from the Chestertown community.

MYSTERY MAN IN MINTA MARTIN

An unidentified man was reported to be prowling the second floor of Minta Martin about 2 o'clock the morning of Thursday, January 23rd. He entered several rooms, all of which were unlocked and occupied by sleeping students. In each case, the students were undisturbed, but awoke and asked the prowler to leave. One student reported waking up to find the perpetrator watching television in her room. Nothing was reported stolen, and the man left after being asked.

A bulletin issued by Security earlier this week describes the suspect as an unknown white male thought to be in his early twenties. He is not believed to be a student. "As a result of the flyer," Jerry Roderick told the ELM, "we feel that our investigation is close to finding him." He cited the incident as an example of students disregarding simple security measures, such as keeping doors locked at all times. Sandra McLelland, RA of second floor Minta Martin, agreed with Roderick and added, "We think he got in because the doors were left propped open. I just hope people will take this more seriously and lock their doors."

Hamilton Gets Haircut

Late Wednesday night three pounds of long blond hair fell from Kent House R.A. Joe Hamilton's head onto the bathroom floor. "Well, I decided it was time for a change. With the end of the Cold War and the Berlin Wall I figured a new world haircut was in order," said the freshly shorn Hamilton. He insists that he is not selling out to right wing ideals but has become more fashion conscious as of late.

"It's a new thing, it's sexy, it's very Manchester," says Joe's stylist, Matthew Cougar Shields "Look at all the latest music videos: EMF, The Happy Mondays, Blur, The Stone Roses. It's the style. You'll be seeing this haircut on the runways in Paris and New York this spring. The salon's are being swamped. This is what everyone is asking me for."

Mr. Matthew insists he is not a licensed hair dresser, "I just want every one to look their best," he says. "I wouldn't dare charge for my services, but donations are appreciated."

within the allotted time period.

Round One of the game included contestants Ben Simmons, Brian Heubeck, Glenn Warner, and Salwa Amer. Warner would walk away victorious from this gruelling round, narrowly defeating Simmons by bouncing "Mexican bouncing balls" into a sombrero on his head from the kneeling position.

Round Two's participants were Rick Ivey, John Winchester, Jr., John Thomas, and Wendy Kraus. In the evening's closest event, Ivey defeated Winchester as the heat's winner, mastering a come-from-behind victory by transporting six ping-pong balls from one basket to another using a spoon, wearing flippers to boot.

Finally, Round Three's enthusiastic contestants included Eric Jewett, Ed McGill, Matt Monacelli, and Chris "Fatman" Goldenberg. After a controversial marshmallow stuffing contest titled "Chubby Bunny" (handled smoothly by judges Kevin Kelly, Jen Del Nero, and Tammie Michener), Monacelli would go on to win the round with his impressive disco routine, defeating Jewett in another controversial photo finish.

Warner, Ivey, and Monacelli proceeded to the first of two playoff rounds, involving the placement of fifteen wooden blocks into a vertical tower. Following Monacelli's elimination from this round, Warner and Ivey went head to head in a fierce bubble gum chewing contest. Ivey won this final challenge after Warner forgot to remove the gum's wrapper, a prerequisite for any successful bubble attempt.

An hour-and-a-half after the opening bell, Ivey entered the final challenge...the Blizzard of Bucks! A hush fell over the crowd as The Lovely Jennifer flipped the switch, sending a storm of bills swirling around Ivey's anxious hands. Combining an impressive mix of strategy and physical dexterity, Ivey emerged from the tank with an impressive $110 dollars, plus the $25 he received as the second heat's winner. To top all this off, Ivey, along with all of the contestants, received an official Blizzard of Bucks t-shirt, worth $8.95, for a grand total of $143.95. When asked of his plans for this new-found wealth, Ivey thought he might make one of his car payments. Ivey's girlfriend, however, Nicole Falanga, has other plans for the prize winnings.

Possible Chesapeake Regional Studies Program At WC

By Kris Wallenburg
News Editor

On October 6, 1990, President Trout stated that he saw "the entire Eastern Shore, indeed the whole of the Delmarva Peninsula, as a gigantic laboratory alive with possibilities for a contemporary liberal arts institutión." President Trout's vision may become a reality as early as the fall of 1992 with the possible formation of a Chesapeake Regional Studies Program.

On January 9 through 11, members of the Washington College community attended a Jessie Ball duPont Fund-supported retreat at the Wye Woods Conference Center to "discuss ways in which the Chesapeake region can serve our mission as a liberal arts institution." Those in attendance at this retreat were President Trout, Dean Taylor, Joe Holt, the Honorable Louis L. Goldstein, Dr. Janson-La Palme, Dr. Munson, Dr. Creegan, Dr. Locker, Dr. McCall, Dr. Cumberland, Dr. Wolff, Dr. Striner, Dr. Fallaw, Dr. Newell, Dr. Tapke, Dr. Kerchner, Dr. Horne, and Dr. Sherbondy.

During the two and a half day retreat, the members of the WC community met with consultants in the fields of Architecture and Preservation, Biology, Cultural Traditions and Literature, Economics, History, and Sociology to design a program that would encompass the many disciplines represented at Washington College.

"The Wye Retreat, in addition to opening up dialogue among representatives from many of the departments, offered both the opportunity to create a program that might make for increased connections between certain disciplines and a way of integrating the Chestertown community and its heritage into the Washington College community. Both of these seem to me to be very good things," said Dr. Beverly Wolff, Visiting Assistant Professor, Department of English.

President Trout stated that "the bits and pieces of what one would call a Chesapeake Regional Studies program are already here. The fourteen faculty members who came to Wye, almost each and every one of them either teaches a course or parts of courses that bare on this area, be it a course in Early American History, be it a Forms of Literature course, creative writing class, be it a sociology class. We are doing some of these things."

"Going to the Wye retreat, I thought it was a Chesapeake program with the emphasis on water but I left realizing that it is much more than that. There are many ways that exercises could be integrated in current courses. Already I am thinking about ways to use the region, location, in Comparative Psychology," said Dr. Michael Kerchner, Assistant Professor of Psychology.

According to Dr. Donald Munson, Joseph H. McLain Professor and Chair of the Biology Department, the retreat was very worthwhile. He described it as one of the better workshops. There was a "good group of people" that attended the retreat. "I learned a lot and I am happy with the outcome of the situation."

"I found the retreat extremely worthwhile, enjoyable, and I learned a great deal about the Chesapeake Bay watershed," said Dr. David Newell, Professor and Chair of the Philosophy and Religion Department. Dr. Newell also stated that "the problem with creating any interdisciplinary program is keeping it particular enough to take advantage of the expertise and making it general enough to form into a coherent program. A problem that can be solved."

The members of the Washington College community that attended the retreat "aim to establish an academic minor consisting of a required team-taught, interdisciplinary, introductory course, four electives, and a problem-oriented, "tough questions" capstone seminar." President Trout stated that such a program would be a rigorous program and that in know way would the establishment of this program jeopardize any courses at WC. Before this program can be established at WC, "a steering group, under the leadership of Dean Taylor, will draft a proposal that will work its way through the college's governance system—to the Divisions, to Academic Council, and on to the Faculty for formal consideration."

The Sun Never Sets on WC's Interns

By Adria Nesberg
& Chris Spezio
Staff Writers

Last October, representatives from the State Department visited Washington College concerning internship possibilities in Washington D.C. and abroad. Dr. Shad, Professor of Political Science, sponsored the program, which was accessible to all students. Ten students applied for volunteer, unpaid internships, and seven have been accepted as of this date. Of those accepted, one will travel to a country as far away as Bangladesh, and one will stay close to home working with the State Department in D.C. What interest do these places hold? The ELM sought out four of these students to find out.

Karen Reck, a Senior whose major is International Studies, will be going to Washington D.C. to work for the Bureau of Refugee Affairs. Karen has a great interest in this summer's internship because after graduation she would like to work for the State Department as a Civil Service member. Karen is by no means taking this internship without experience. Last summer she worked for the Organization of American States (OAS), an organization involved with the anniversary celebration of Columbus' discovery of America, writing for their newsletter. This semester Karen is working for U.S. AID, an organization for international development.

Next we talked to Maria Jerardi , a sophomore majoring in International Studies. Maria was accepted to Dacca, Bangladesh, where she will be working in the American Embassy as a Junior Foreign Service Officer doing research for the Political Section. This internship is a base for what Maria plans to study in graduate school. Afterwards she would like to work for relief agencies like U.S. AID, CARE and Catholic Relief. Maria looks forward to the research that will put her in contact with places she has only studied.

The ELM then talked with Lionel A. Dyson, who applied to four bureaus, the Asian, European, Asian\African, and the East Asian\Pacific Bureau. Lionel will be going with the latter bureau, where he will travel to Manila, in the Philippines to work as a Junior Foreign Service Officer. After studying East Africa last semester at WC, and traveling through Europe, the attraction to the Philippines is new and exciting for him, plus he will be able to "observe the ways people adapt to modernization."

The fourth person we talked to was Senior Stephanie Tennyson, who after being accepted to Santiago, Chile and Quito, Equador, decided to go to Quito. Stephanie decided on Quito because her job there will be to " explain the political atmosphere due to elections taking place in May '92." Stephanie will also conduct research in many other areas, including the colonial history, which, she stated, Santiago lacked. The benefits to this program, Stephanie said, is the "direct fieldwork, the opportunity to see how our embassies work, and the ability to see the duties of a Foreign Service Officer(FSO)." She adds, " it's a chance of a lifetime to work with high-level workers in the State Department." New cultures await these seven students from WC and we at the ELM wish them all a great summer of new experiences.

What is NUMEROLOGY? It's an exciting way of life. You'll see. We begin with the number 1992 (but it's a secret where I came up with that). Now add your age. Subtract the numerical value of your birth-month. Double the number. Count the number of letters in your mother's maiden name, multiply by three, and add this figure to the other number. Subtract your favorite number. Add 1 for every library book you have defaced, stolen or misplaced. Find the square root. Add 8. Multiply by the number of licks it takes to get to the center of a tootsie pop. Divide by 28½. GREAT, you should feel great because you have just uncovered your personal NUMEROLOGY number.

1 - 10	11 - 347	348	Whatever else you came up with
You are terrible at math. No one should have produced these numbers.	Don't ask me. These are weird numbers. Maybe things will go your way. You're better off with normal astrology.	You are perfect. Your perfect dreams will metamorphose into a Krystal brite reality and the week will be just perfect. It will be quite nice. Aren't you pleased?	Well, it'll be a pretty average week. Dale Adams Heritage Society Plans Semester

By Zylia N. L. Knowlin
Secretary, Dale Adams
Heritage Exchange

The Dale Adams Heritage Exchange was named after the first African American to graduate from Washington College in the year of 1965. She is currently serving on the Board of Governors and Visitors. This organization was established in order to provide for the exchange of thoughts for all students throughout the Washington College Community. This exchange plans to alleviate the ignorance that exists between people of different racial, economic and social differences.

Our focus is communication and our aim is peace for all. We have set many goals for this organization including parties, lectures, and field trips. Although we are planning all these things, there are other things that are more important for this organization to accomplish. We are offering mentoring for the local community children, that will help to provide better opportunity to all the ones who hold the future in their hands. We are organizing at the moment, starting African-American sororities and fraternities that are in an absence presently on the Washington College campus. These Greek chapters would offer support for the growing number of minority population without offending some; since these chapters have not been founded by haters of minorities or other such people. Not only will these things provide support and encouragement to the Washington College community, but it will also entice others to want to be a part of the action.

Some ways that the Dale Adams Heritage Exchange has exposed their interest in expanding their dreams are by calling and hosting perspective students. We have also sponsored cultural events such as the Reverend Doctor Martin Luther King Junior's Birthday Celebration. These such events will be held to provide for education and awareness of the African American Experience throughout the community. We are also planning an Africanfest during this spring semester, that would include music, food, and dancing.

There are a lot of ideas that will be fulfilled with the cooperation and support from everyone, that is why we invite everyone to be a part of our organization. Through discussions, and continued help by our members with admissions activities, we will reach the percentage on campus that should already be in existence now.

SGA Report
With John Griep

The Washington College Student Government Association discussed a number of controversial issues this past Tuesday when the full Senate met for the first time in 1992.

Student Activity Fee Increase Proposed

A proposal to ask the Board of Visitors and Governors to increase the student activity fee over a three-year period from $50 to $140 was submitted by Treasurer Brian Gimelson. This proposal will be voted on at next week's Senate meeting in order to be sent to the Board of Visitors and Governors before their next meeting. According to the research of the SGA Executive Board, Washington College currently has an activity fee which is substantially less than that of comparable institutions. WC's activity fee is currently $50.90 per year. Schools which are considered comparable to WC have yearly activity fees ranging from $90 to $300. Gimelson remarked that the "only reason for the requested increase is so that Washington College will be on par with other schools." He further stated that "increases are almost a necessity" in order to adequately meet the extracurricular needs of the Washington College community. If approved, the Executive Board would like to see a significant portion of the increased funds to be given to the Student Activities Director in order for that office to schedule more campus activities.

CoffeeHouse Controversy

The CoffeeHouse controversy was another major issue which the SGA discussed at their first full meeting of 1992. SGA President Kevin "Sparky" Kelly raised the issue at the meeting, expressing his personal doubts about whether the new system would be feasible for events in the CoffeeHouse which draw large crowds. Kelly asked all senators to speak with their constituents to determine their views on the change. The ELM is also interested in any comments or letters on this issue.

Escort Service to Begin Soon

Sophomore Class President Lionel Dyson and Senator John Phoebus presented plans for a campus escort service which they are coordinating. An extension will be provided in Security for people to call if they would like an escort to their dorm or car. Calls to this extension will be forwarded to a student dispatcher, who will then contact the escorts. The service plans to start small, with escorts available on Friday and Saturday nights from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. The coordinators hope to increase the coverage in the future if enough interest is shown. The service should be available by mid-February at the latest. At this point, 15 people have expressed interest in being escorts. Currently, escorts will be limited to male students, due to the fact that only one person will be sent out at a time. Anyone interested in being an escort or dispatcher should contact John Phoebus (x. 313) or Lionel Dyson.

The Sophomore Class is also sponsoring a Blood Drive on Tuesday, February 4 from 9 a.m. until 2 p.m. in the CoffeeHouse. They are looking for at least 150 volunteers to come out and give the gift of life. Today is the last day to sign up.

EMS Petition Presented to MD Legislators

Secretary Jen Del Nero reported that she journeyed to Annapolis last Friday to present Washington College's petition to state legislators asking them to reinstate the previously cut funding to Emergency Medical Services. Over 20,000 signatures were collected from students in colleges and universities across the state and presented to the Maryland legislature on the final day of Higher Education Awareness Week. President Kelly reported that just under 500 signatures were collected from Washington College. Next week, the SGA will present checks to the Kent County Rescue Squad and the Chestertown Fire Department to demonstrate their support for local volunteer rescue organizations.

Handicapped Access at WC

The problem of handicapped access at the school was also discussed by the Senate on Tuesday night. Senator Troy Petenbrink brought up the issue as the result of a tour he conducted recently with a prospective student with spinal bifida. Petenbrink remarked that a tour which normally only takes about 30 minutes stretched to three times that length due to the lack, or poor placement of, handicapped access in many areas around campus. (For more information, see "Letters to the Editor," p. 2)

Off-Campus Theft

Off-Campus Senator Will Phipps reported that theft has become a major concern of off-campus students since the return from Winter Break. He suggests that all thefts should be reported to the Chestertown Police Department.

Other SGA News

According to Social Chairs John Buckey and Glenn Warner, at least five Comedy Club dates have been planned for this semester. $1 will be charged at the door, due to the scheduling of higher-priced acts. They are also looking at the possibility of renting a small yacht in order to have a cruise.

The SGA approved $1750 for Monday's "Blizzard of Bucks" game show in the CoffeeHouse. $100 was also allocated for an ad to be placed in this year's lacrosse program.

*Club funding forms are due by today in the Student Affairs Office. The Organizations Committee will meet Tuesday, February 4 from noon - 7 pm in the Sophie Kerr Room, located in Miller Library.

Kathy Mills: The Exclusive ELM Interview

By John Blakelock
Staff Writer

Kathy Mills is a music professor at Washington College and is giving a concert of piano music entitled "A Celebration of American Women Composers" tonight January 31, at 8:00 P.M. in Tawes Theatre.

Kathy Mills: The first thing I want to say is "WHY AM I DOING THIS!"

John Blakelock: Are you really that nervous about doing this concert?

KM: You're always nervous. There's always an edge, but I've been nervous about it a long time. The hardest stage was getting everything memorized. That was really very difficult. I was really very busy last semester with the combination of my teaching, the celebration of coeducation, and some other committees that I'm on and that made it hard to get two hours of practicing in. Once classes stopped then I started practicing more and things started to move along a lot faster.

JB: When would you say you memorized everything?

KM: Oh, Yesterday. No, I always try to have the program memorized four weeks ahead so I can practice playing it, but I didn't quite manage that. I've still been having some memory slips. I don't want to talk about this any more; it's bad luck.

JB: When was the last time you performed by yourself for the college?

KM: Well, I gave a recital here . . . it's been a long time . . . that was in 1985. But I gave a recital in Illinois in 1988. I played two of the same pieces when I gave a lecture-recital on Women Composers for a Women's Music Organization which has been a flourishing organization for a good hundred years.

JB: Do you think that you would have performed a concert of Women Composers regardless of the celebration of coeducation?

KM: Yes, I do. This was my idea for my contribution to the celebration, but it's just a matter of what really inspires you to work to practice. I tried some other literature, but I kept gravitating toward this literature because I didn't know it and had been a matter of digging it out. It took me a long time to put this program together learning it, but before that it took me a long time to pull the music together. It certainly wasn't a matter of going to a music store. It's so frustrating. I can go to Dale Music, which is the biggest music store around that I can think of that I go to, and I can still can pull out the drawer for Mrs. Beach and there isn't anything there, and she's the best known female composer at least in this country, I think. Somehow I feel more passionate about this literature right now and curious about it, and that motivates me to do a program of it, and I'm pretty confident that most people haven't heard any of these pieces.

Professor Kathy Mills at her piano.

We are only now just beginning, in the past twenty years, to dig out this music and look at it, scrutinize it, begin publishing it, and begin performing it. That's exciting to me. I want to be a part of that.

JB: Do you get the feeling that if you didn't do this program, no one would?

KM: Yes! Absolutely. I know that's a disturbing thought. There aren't that many people who are specializing in this repertoire. That's the first thing, and the second thing is that this isn't music that sits on every pianist's shelf.

JB: Why would you say that women composers have been forgotten? Is it because they were women, or because there weren't as many of them, or maybe because they weren't taken as seriously as their male counterparts. I know more and more today the distinction is becoming less obvious and the woman composer is being encouraged.

KM: Everything you say is true. The woman composer is being encouraged, but there are still people who are my age who think back to graduate school with dismay, because they saw their compositions' male counterparts getting the nice word from the department chairmen or commissions and so forth, and the women bypassed in that respect. So there are more subtle things that have been happening in the recent future, but the situation is of course much better today. There probably weren't as many women composers in the nineteenth century as men and there were so many avenues that weren't available to them. So in the nineteenth century what we find women composing is piano pieces and songs; things that were acceptable for women to perform. There have been so many obstacles, and the obstacles aren't only the obvious problems like sexism, but other kinds of obstacles that are more subtle.

JB: Do you have a certain resentment towards the way women composers have been treated?

KM: What I feel is not resentment or anger as much as sadness. In a way its just sad every time I think about Fanny Mendelssohn and Felix Mendelssohn. I think its a tragedy. I don't know that there was any difference at all in their compositional ability, and yet because of the status of her family and the opinion of her father and brother, it wasn't the place of the woman to do anything else but to nurture a family. She wasn't given the opportunities to travel and to compose larger works; who knows what she would have been able to do. We are only now just beginning, in the past twenty years, to dig out this music and look at it, scrutinize it, begin publishing it, and begin performing it. That's exciting to me. I want to be a part of that.

JB: Do you get a different feeling when you're playing music by women composers than when you're playing something like Beehtoven or Chopin?

KM: I'm very glad you asked me that, because at the beginning I didn't have any comment about that and in the process of working on this music I actually haven't thought that, "Gee this is really a lyrical section here, it sounds just like a woman wrote it." Nothing like that has ever occurred to me. I sense there isn't any difference in the music. I just don't get any different feeling at all.

JB: But you said earlier you get more passion from playing this music?

KM: Yes, I do feel more passionate, but I don't feel that there is a different message or that the composer has a different way of expressing herself because she is a women.

JB: You wouldn't say that there maybe a different sensibility at work?

KM: I think that's a pretty involved question and I would actually have to play more music before I could answer that question. I would say that that was a careful choice of words when you used the word sensibility, because that may be a factor and probably is a factor, it simply was one that the music didn't call to my attention as I was working on it. My husband always teases me about playing music by women and suggests that it's frilly, but that really isn't the case. There's never a point when I start out a piece and I think about the mood I want to convey and think, "this is feminine."

JB: Do you feel more pressure, in that you better perform this music well or people might not take it as seriously as they might more standard music?

KM: I think there's no doubt as to the quality of this music. I don't think I have to work harder to sell this music at all, because I think it's really viable and fine music.

"Gaia and God"

By Tanya L. Cunic
Staff Writer

Last Thursday, Rosemary Ruether informed ecologists and feminists that their seemingly individual causes were actually intertwined. Rosemary Radford Ruether, author of Sexism and God-Talk , spoke to the Washington College Community on "Gaia and God," a feminist perspective on the earth.

For those who have not read Sexism and God-Talk, Ruether's historical account of the origins of male domination over women was a compelling argument. She explained that women were identified with nature and men were associated with culture. Due to the biological function of reproduction, women became the primary maintenance workers. They were associated with daily routine and the chores needed to survive on a daily basis. Men, on the other hand, situated themselves in work situations that required spurts of energy, such as hunting. Therefore, men had more leisure time than women to establish and define cultural prestige.

This leisure time also allowed men to establish themselves as powerful and elite not only regarding women but also in relation to animals and the land. The creation of the plow shifted male power from hunting and gardening to wanting ownership of the land. Men felt that it was their right to enslave animals such as the ox to aid in this process. Eventually, owning animals to help farm the land led to owning other humans as slaves. Domination and destruction was rapidly becoming the norm.

Ruether then suggested that this dominance was also reflected in religion. The Judeo-Christian religions established a male God/female Nature hierarchy. God was directly related to men and to elite culture, therefore females and nature had to submit to men to have any chance of being associated with the Divine.

It is this dream of conquest and elite association that has turned into a nightmare. Ruether stated that through ignoring the concept that the food chain can and will survive without human intervention, humans have been their own worst enemies. Technological advancements may have helped solve problems initially, but more problems arose. For the sake of affluence and control, State budgets have given to defense and weapons the lion's share of tax funding. This is horrendous, considering there are now more people on the planet than the food supply can support.

Ruether suggested that there must be a radical change in thinking and action. Society must first reshape their dualistic concept of reality. Humans are the great dependents of the food chain; animals will survive without human interference. Also, humans must revisualize their part in the ecological system. It is our society's duty to harmonize with the natural world around us. Finally, if humans re-examine their relationship with God as that of a life-sustaining matrix, rather than one to be equated with dominance, it can create a social mutuality that will benefit nature and human relationships.

Rosemary Ruether challenged the audience to re-examine their thoughts on chauvinism, dualism, and ecology. At the same time, she encouraged us to change our lifestyles to safeguard the earth's ecological health, and thus insure our own survival.

Romance Abounds in Cyrano de Bergerac

Production Set for Valentine's Weekend

By Rachael Fink
Staff Writer

The first snow is slowly melting from the ground. The crew team is slowly getting ready for their first race. And the first show of this semester is progressing "slow and sure as rehearsals should," says director Carey Smith.

Her sights set on the Valentine's weekend opening, Smith is becoming more and more excited about her production of Cyrano de Bergerac, the perfect play for a holiday weekend full of Cupids and lace hearts. The play, about two men who together make the perfect lover and the woman they romance together, is not only about love but has been loved by Smith, who "fell in love with Cyrano as a senior in high school." The play is her "favorite in the whole wide world," and even after long rehearsals and the reality of production she is sill more excited about it than ever.

Carey Smith admits that many people are helping her to put up the production. Debbie Johnson is Smith's stage manager with Melanie Green assisting her. Deidre Riegel has designed the set and Jason West, as Technical Director, will supervise the construction of it. Smith has a cast of about twenty-one, including Bruce Hamilton as Cyrano, Stephanie Hess as Roxanne and Ryder Daniels making a special appearance.

There is nothing as romantic as a special night at the theater and there is not a more romantic show to see with your Valentine than Cyrano de Bergerac. The show opens on Thursday the 13th of February and plays until that Saturday. The curtain goes up at eight and no reservations are needed.

Editor's note: the Film Series will show the movie Cyrano de Bergerac Friday, Jan. 31 - Monday, Feb. 3; the Drama Department production by Edmond Rostand will play onstage Feb. 13 - 15. Both events are free and open to the public.

Labour M.P. Speaks

By S. Ross Koon
Staff Writer

Last Wednesday, the Society of Junior Fellows sponsored a presentation by Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, M.P. (Labour). Although the announced topic of Mrs. Dunwoody’s talk was the nature of politics in Britain after Thatcher’s ouster, she chose not to emphasize the effects of Mrs. Thatcher’s departure from Downing Street. She explained this by averring that the British political system is “. . . not a system which relies on a strong leader, as amongst 15 Cabinet Ministers there are many people capable of running the government—even in Conservative governments.” Mrs. Dunwoody expounded upon the nasty side effects of the Conservative’s long superiority in Parliament and emphasized the Labour Party’s new vision for Britain’s future.

When Mrs. Dunwoody did speak of ex-Prime Minister Thatcher she did so in terms which were somewhat unflattering, saying that when Mrs. Thatcher appears in public she now looks “. . . rather like one of those vultures you see sitting on the ground.” She then noted that some might misinterpret her previous statement as being malevolent and defamatory in intent and amended herself by stating Thatcher did not in fact resemble a vulture, but rather a fish eagle. Mrs. Dunwoody then proceeded to enumerate all the unsavory qualities of that particular raptor.

These humorous interludes belied the seriousness of Mrs. Dunwoody’s message and intent. When she described the severity of the problems plaguing Britain under the Conservative regime, she did so passionately and persuasively. She noted that unemployment had increased by 47% during a one year period amongst her constituency and that the so-called “educational reforms” of the Tory government had left many schools starved for funds. She also blamed the Conservatives for Britain’s rising dropout rate. She then described the decline in the standard of living in Britain and attributed this to the Tory’s relentless slashing of social programs and regressive tax policy.

Mrs. Dunwoody was at her most compelling when speaking of the Labour Party’s platform in the upcoming elections. The platform as Mrs. Dunwoody presented it is a simple one which stresses that the Labour Party seeks to improve the quality of life in Great Britain through investment in productivity, education and the National Health Service.

Although it was evident that she could be quite specific when discussing issues and statistical data, it appears that this is not the approach that Mrs. Dunwoody or the Labour Party will use in the upcoming elections: “I would like to speak to people in more emotional terms and ask them: ‘Do you want a fair society, or do you want one where people are sleeping in shop doorways and our streets become as filthy as those of the Third World?”

If Mrs. Dunwoody is typical of the Labour Party, then it is apparent that they have learnt not only how to successfully provide economic stability in today’s international climate, but also how to effectively address the issues facing their constituencies. Mrs. Dunwoody emphasized that the primary reason for the dominance of the Conservative Party has not been a rightward swing amongst the electorate but rather the failure of the Labour Party to show that social benefits on the quality of life is no less than the impact of wages on the quality of life.

It is clear that the Labour Party will not make the same mistake in the upcoming elections. Mrs. Dunwoody proposed lowering the taxes of most of the people of Great Britain, and this plank in Labour’s platform will not only win votes but may also provide great stimulus to consumer spending. This comes at a time when the Tory’s overwhelmingly unpopular poll tax is still in effect, and some Conservatives are suggesting a value added tax of 21%! If the Labour Party is successful in conveying to the electorate the message that their policies will end the current economic malaise and raise the British standard of living, then Labour will doubtlessly score an overwhelming victory in the upcoming Parliamentary elections.

Penn State Dances for Cultural Diversity

Penn State International Dancers perform Philippine Binasuan.

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

The Washington College Department of Dance is doing its part to continue the trend of promoting multiculturalism on campus. This Saturday, February first, the Penn State International Dancers and Mor’yana will perform a concert of international folk dance and music, representing seven nations from around the world.

The PSID will ensemble will include Slovakia, China, Yugoslavia, the Philippines, India, and Bulgaria. The Slovakian harvest festival leads to the “flaskovsky,” or bottle dance, involving intricate footwork to keep from knocking over the array of bottles left as the aftermath of the revelry. Perhaps even better is the Filipino “Binasuan,” in which three girls dance with full glasses of wine balanced on their heads. The rest of the repertoire includes fairy tales, prayer dances, and love songs.

Mor’yana, a Baltimore dance company, is comprised of PSID alumni. Their specialty is Ukrainian dance, and they will perform eight traditional dances from that region. This collection of ritual dances and physical challenges should shed some light on this unique Soviet nation.

The entire dance concert should prove to be both entertaining and educational, as the dress will represent each individual nation, and the dance numbers will illustrate not just the music, but the spirit of the countries portrayed.

Deidre Riegel is the lighting designer, assisted by Jason West. The concert is scheduled for Saturday night at 8:00 p.m. in Tawes Theatre. Admission is $5.00 for adults; $3.00 for students and seniors.

scene of Washington College Lacrosse this year.

TC: Well, I give them a lot of credit. Obviously, we all make some mistakes. Some people turn and run from them and some people turn and make amends and take them head on. I think they're real excited to be back here and we're certainly real excited to have them back. I think it says a lot about their character.

ELM: How have the many transfer lacrosse players this season adapted to your game and to Washington College's style of play? Are you having any problems breaking down old habits that don't fit into your gameplan?

TC: Well, in general this is a whole new group. Even the kids that played last year, the majority of them were moved up from the B-Team a week before we played Hopkins—they had no Fall Ball, they had no pre-season, I mean, they were really lambs led to the slaughter. They were young but they didn't have the benefits of a preseason that everybody that we played had. I think the kids that have come in are excited to be here. I think they're happy to have the opportunity to play. I think they're excited about the tradition here. The coachability of this group, of the kids that have come in and the group as a whole has just been outstanding. As coaches we've been just looking at each other and grinning—it's going to be a lot of fun. This is going to be a fun group to work with this year.

NEWT's Player of the Week

Welcome back to another Earth Shattering issue of WC ELM SPORTS. As you can see, there has been a change in this part of the sports section. Out of the kindness of their hearts (and in the interest of getting some great publicity) NEWT's has agreed to sponsor the Player of the Week. So . . . keep up the hard work and one Friday you may open the paper and find yourself the winner of this prestigious award, compliments of NEWT's, Spider-Man, and The Vaughnster!! And this week's pick . . . Two-Time All-American, senior swimmer, Kasey Carroll. She has won 21 events in her past 7 meets, keeping her undefeated in her specialty events. In addition, she currently holds 8 individual WC swimming records and shares 3 records in 3 relay events. This gives her a total of 11 records out of 23 events.

Says Coach Kim Lessard, "She is an incredibly dedicated student athlete and a super team leader." Congratulations Kasey and keep up the good work!!!

Mulvaney and Aylesworth Place First in 5K Snowball Run

By Charlie Linehan
Co-Sports Editor

On Wednesday, January 29th at 3:30 pm, the second 5k run this year was conducted at Washington College. Following the same course as the Turkey Trot last semester, the Snowball run was a great success.

Placing first in the men's division, John Mulvaney completed the run in 14:25 with Darryl Calloway and Ray Herndon close behind at 14:43 and 14:52 respectively. In the women's division, Elizabeth Aylesworth placed first, finishing in 19:09. Jennifer Bornfriend captured a close second place at 19:11 and Amy McCleary came in third at 20:18.

Said Assistant Event Organizer Margaret Doyle, "Overall, I thought the Snowball Run went well. We had great student participation, including both the Women's Lacrosse team and the Men's Crew team. Dennis Berry has done an outstanding job with the REC Sports program by offering a variety of activities to encourage all students to participate."

CORCORAN: '92 LAX Preview

By Charlie Linehan
& Chris Vaughn
Sports Editors

On Tuesday, January 28th we met with Head Lacrosse Coach Terry Corcoran to discuss the upcoming Lacrosse season. One year after the disheartening van incident, which had such a detrimental effect on the remainder of the season, Washington College Lacrosse is back in action. With a promising group of young recruits joining the players from last year's squad, Washington will certainly be a force to reckon with as they enter the ever more competitive Middle Atlantic Conference for the first time. Here is what Coach Corcoran had to say:

ELM: Considering the press which Washington College Lacrosse received last season regarding the van incident, how do you think the program's ego has been affected and how will it bounce back from that publicity.

Terry Corcoran: I think it's going to be an exciting year. I think everybody in the world of lacrosse has kind of got their eye turned down to Chestertown to see what's going to happen . . . you know, it was a tough year last year and I thought the kids did a great job . . . there were certainly adverse circumstances and everybody here threw their shoulders back and we went out and played the schedule—we didn't make any excuses, we didn't whine, we didn't complain, and I think we got a lot of respect in the lacrosse world because of that. Again, I think there's a lot of anticipation to see what kind of team is going to come out of Chestertown this year.

ELM: Is this Washington College's first year in the Middle Atlantic Conference?

TC: Yes it is.

ELM: Will we still be facing teams like Hobart, Salisbury, and Johns Hopkins? How will the schedule change? Who will we be dropping and who will we be picking up?

TC: Well actually, we've always played a number of MAC teams—we've played Franklin and Marshall, we've played Gettysburg, we've played Western Maryland over the years. What's happened is, the last two or three years we've really had trouble scheduling teams. We only had eleven games the last two years which really aren't enough games for a season. We've played some pretty tough schedules but we haven't been able to play the Wednesday games—nobody's played us. The schedule this year will be fifteen games with a possible sixteenth game if we make the MAC championship . . . and for a young team, like we are going to be, we need to play games. We needed to play games last year but we only had eleven. The schedule this year will still include Hopkins, Navy, Hobart . . . four of the top ranked teams in Division III—the top eight teams we'll be playing . . . so it's still going to be a pretty competitive schedule. You go back to the '85 schedule—that's the year we beat Hobart and Navy—you see Gettysburg, Western Maryland, Franklin and Marshall, Saint Mary's . . . we had those Wednesday games and that gave the younger kids a chance to play and participate. The last two years, teams have been refusing to play us. By going back in the league, we're forcing some teams to play us.

ELM: Why were the other teams refusing to play us? Because we were so talented?

TC: Yes, we were having trouble getting games. . . . The schedule is still going to be one of the top two or three schedules in Division III. The last couple of years it's been the top and it's still going to be probably ourselves and Hobart that are going to play any type of schedule like this.

ELM: How do think the competition is going to be in the MAC?

TC: Well, we used to play more teams from Virginia, like Roanoke and Hampden Sydney, and right now, the MAC teams are tougher—Franklin and Marshall and Gettysburg have been in the top 8. So, I think we've elected to go into the MAC for a couple of reasons—one, more games, two, the league's tougher now than the Virginia league was, and three, economically. We can go over and play Gettysburg, that's a top-ranked team, for a lot less money than going down to Virginia to play somebody that's not ranked.

As Coaches we've been just looking at each other and grinning --- it's going to be a lot of fun. This is going to be a fun group to work with this year.

Dave Lipinski in action.

ELM: With the understanding that you haven't selected the final squad yet, are there any key players that Washington College fans should be paying special attention to?

TC: Well, in general, we've got about forty-five kids out and they're just doing an excellent job . . . attitude-wise, this is one of the best attitudes we've gone into a pre-season with in a number of years—we're really pleased with all the kids. There won't be many upperclassmen. We've got one returning All-American, Kevin Doyle. He'll be a Senior. John Kelly will be a Senior. Scott Overend, who was out of school last year because of financial difficulties, is a Junior this year and should be one of the better defensemen around. Doyle will certainly be one of the best defensemen around. There's been a number of transfers . . . attack-wise, Jason Paige came in from Syracuse as a Sophomore, Chris Cote from Loyola is a Sophomore, Harris Murphy is a transfer from Villa Julie in Baltimore, he'll be a Junior. Greg Lawler's a Freshman attackman doing a real nice job, from the Salisbury School. In the midfield, we've got a lot of the midfielders back, a lot of the young kids that played last year. We're moving some attackmen—we've moved Stu Warner to midfield, Brian Flynn's a transfer, Jamie Carver from last year, John Hernandez is back in midfield, Peter Greene, David Lipinski, of course, who played an awful lot last year. There are some nice Freshmen, Greg Miller, Chris Boone. . . . It's hard to single out any kids because right now I think that we've got a wave of kids that are in great shape and doing a good job. Defensively, we've had some nice Freshmen come in. We've picked up a couple transfers, Pat Lebowitz from Towson, Jon Clayton, who was from Maryland, is back playing this year. Tim Riggins, from Towson State, has come in, as well as some of the younger kids that played last year—the Ratta brothers are doing a great job. It's hard to mention one or two names without starting to roll through about forty of them—it's going to be a fun group to coach this year.

ELM: Offensively, it seems that the team is very strong but after last year it seems like you have had to recover defensively—how well do you think you've accomplished that?

TC: Well, at this point we haven't beaten anybody. We've got a number of more athletes this year on defense—we've got a number of more athletes in general. Again, it's going to be a young team—we're probably going to start off slow. It's going to be a team I think that's got the potential to improve through the year. It's certainly a team that's going to be a great team in two or three years but, obviously we're looking for this season. I would anticipate that we are going to have to depend on our defense early and it's probably going to take awhile to score some goals because we're young. Most of the kids who have blossomed here into All-Americans have done it in their Junior and Senior years . . . we're going to be playing a lot of Freshmen and Sophomores. . . . We've got a little depth that we haven't had in the past. We certainly had no depth last year and it will be nice to have a little bit this year.

ELM: Obviously the loss of Dave Slomkowski in goal is big, not to mention the absence of last year's back-up goalie Justin Wiest. In light of the return of John Kelly and the addition of Simmons, Forti, and Manos, how does the situation in goal stack up this season.

TC: At this time, none of them have been under fire—they've all done a nice job in practice. Three of the last four goalies here have been first team All-Americans and that's because of one fella . . . Clint Evans is our goalie coach. He played goalie for Washington in '76 when we beat Johns Hopkins and fortunately he runs a business in town. He'll start with the goalies next week—he's the guy in charge of them. The goalies that we've had here didn't come in here with accolades a mile long—David [Slomkowski] certainly didn't. He was out of DeMatha High School. The goalie before that, Larry Boehm, wasn't even recruited—he ended up being MVP of a Division III championship game. The goalie before that, Greg Baker, was player of the year so . . . Again, these are young kids, with the exception of John Kelly but, whoever's in there it's going to be their first year, and it's going to be a learning experience. We certainly have got enough depth in the goal to play more than one goalie but, . . . I think the strength and advantage we've got in the goal is the fact that we've got Clint Evans working with these kids.

ELM: How well have Kevin Doyle and Greg Mouracade come back into the Men's Swimming Keeps Shattering Records

By Chris Vaughn
Co-Sports Editor

The WC Aqua-Men travelled north this past Saturday to face the Red Devils of Dickinson and although they may have dropped this one, 126-76, the men continued their unbelievable pace, breaking five more WC records.

David Cola may have been the star this week as he won the 50 free and swam the 500 free for the first time, setting a new record of 5:05.79. Says Coach Kim Lessard, "Dave's times give him an excellent chance to make the top 10 at the MAC's."

Jason Campbell also won WC a first place in the 200 breast and set a new team record, while Tim Whittier rewrote both backstroke records. He set the new record at 2:17.2 in the 200 back and was the first WC man to break 1:00 in the 100 back at 59.3.

These three then joined forces with the added efforts of Tyler McCarthy for the "freshman" relay and achieved a new record in the 400 medley relay.

Super performances were also turned in by Dave Czekaj and Troy Petenbrink in the 500 and 1000 free.

Mike Bowman and Mike Frey gave what they could, scoring important points in the 50 and 100 frees while Brian Basso and Andy McKim also scored in the 50 free, 100 fly, and 100 breast.

The final performance of the day was turned in by the combined efforts of Tim Whittier, Brian Basso, Mike Bowman, and Chris Freisheim who won the last event, the 400 Free Relay.

In recognition of the team's accomplishments, Coach Lessard said, "The team has been working very hard and it has really paid off."

Their next meet is away against Lebanon Valley on February 8th.

The Aqua-women suffered a loss this week at the hands of the Dickinson Red Devils, 117-81, but, says Coach Lessard, "Many of the girls were sick this week, so I give them a lot of credit just for their dedication to the team."

NEWT's Player of the Week and captain Kasey Carroll stole the show and remained undefeated in her specialty events of 500 free, 1000 free, and 200 fly.

Mimi Devlin also had a fairly good day placing second in the 200 IM with third place and a personal best time in the 500 free. In addition, she accompanied Magdalena Fuchs, Nancy Whiteman, and Jen Green for first in the 400 free relay.

Amy Draper's intensity was exemplified with her two personal best times in the 100 and 200 fly which puts her fourth on the All-Time Washington fly swims list.

Important point scoring came from other members of the team, including Leslie Newcomb, Nancy Whiteman, Eleanor Shriver, and Beverly Diaz. Joan Colton, Ramsey Bigham, and Dede Swinden also swam competitively for WC while Karen Pendergast and Jen Green aided in the effort.

Looking at the final stretch of the season Coach Lessard stated, "We are now in the countdown for the MAC Championship. If everyone stays focused and healthy then we will have an exciting meet."

Considering how close the WC Aqua-women are to a 6-2 record, they should place well and prove quite capable in the MAC's. Thanks to Coach Lessard and the swimmer's strong desire, the team may end up in pretty good shape after all. Good luck to the Aqua-women against Lebanon Valley!

Washington Men's B-Ball Struggles

By Melissa Harmeyer
Staff Writer

This past week proved unsuccessful for the men's basketball team as they lost two tough games to Hopkins and Swarthmore respectively.

The Sho'men may have been down, but not out, as they demonstrated superb effort.

The trio of Tim Liddy, Darren Vican, and Allen Lester topped the scoring charts of both games. Versus Hopkins, Liddy had 12, Vican 18, and Lester 11 points.

The #1 Blue Jays brought their best to Chestertown last Wednesday, January 22nd for their first showdown with the #2 Sho'men. Entering the match against Washington, whose record stood at 8-7, Hopkins had an 11-0 record in overall MAC standings. As halftime rolled around neither team was leading, an indication of the closely matched skills of both teams.

The Sho'men had trouble getting started in the second half and Hopkins took full advantage, leaving the WC boys with a devastating 73-59 loss.

Junior guard, Allen Lester, and senior forward, Tim Liddy, topped the scoring charts once again on Saturday night's game against visiting Swarthmore. With 8:32 left in the first half, Swarthmore lead by 8 points, the highest lead of the game, but within the next four minutes the Shoremen had taken the lead only to lose it again at halftime, down 31-30.

The second half seemed to be all Swarthmore's as WC lead only twice in the first fifteen minutes. Yet WC persisted and with 2:13 left, Vican dropped a bucket to put Washington ahead by one. Sophomore guard, Charles Cummings, added to the lead by hitting two free throws with 1:31 remaining to put the Sho'men up by three.

WC stayed on top until the final four seconds of the game when Swarthmore's Matt Douglass was fouled while sinking a three pointer. The four point play put Swarthmore up for good as the Sho'men walked away from a truly hard fought loss, 83-82.

Next week's Elm will cover the Sho'men's busy schedule as they faced Ursinus Tuesday and traveled for revenge, revisiting Swarthmore on Swarthmore's turf, Thursday night. The B-Ball squad remains busy, going up against MAC competitor, Haverford, tomorrow night at Haverford.

The Big Man, forward Darren Vican, towers over three defenders to get his shot off.

Neighborhood Association Discusses Off-Campus Students

By Martha Kimura
Staff Writer

The Old Chestertown Neighborhood Association discussed relations between the community and the college, as well as the introduction of block captains as part of a developing Neighborhood Watch program, when they held their monthly meeting on February 1 at the Kent County Library.

A major area of concern for many local residents is the relationship between the town and the college. The Kent County Police Department has a book containing the names, addresses, and phone numbers of every off-campus student, as well as the telephone numbers of their parents. This book was compiled by Jerry Roderick of the Washington College Security Department in order to insure the safety of off-campus students. "The one's (college students) he knows are trouble people, he lets me know... The college has been very, very cooperative." said Police Chief Bradley of the Kent County Police Department.

The police department has only had to resort to this book once. After a particularly boisterous off-campus student party that took place January 25 on Queen Street, a guest drove off the street, ran over some protective pilings, and destroyed a small tree. This tree had been planted as a memorial to a departed neighbor for their distinguished service to the community. However, despite isolated incidents such as this, the majority of town residents feel that the relationship between the town and the college is greatly improved from previous years. This may be due in part to the efforts made by many students to get to know their neighbors. This effort is greatly appreciated by fellow members of the community. One resident of High Street said that relations between him and his college neighbors were "a 1000 fold better than they were last year".

The Association also discussed the introduction of block captains as the next step in the development of a Neighborhood Watch program. The block captains will act as a liaison between town residents and the police force. When implemented, a resident could call his or her block captain if any suspicious incidents occur; in turn, the block captain will phone the police. This will prevent personal involvement of residents in potentially dangerous situations and will consolidate phone calls to the dispatcher. However, block captains should not be used in emergencies, such as burglary or assault. In these instances, the police should be notified directly.

Other topics mentioned at the meeting were the penalties of underage drinking and problem of parking, especially during off-campus parties. As the result of changing laws about the legal drinking age, the penalty for under-aged drinking has been divided into two categories. People under 18 who are caught drinking will have their parents notified and can be sentenced to community service. People between the ages of 18 and 21 are charged as adults, and can be fined or sentenced to community service, depending on the judge's decision. Another penalty for under-age drinking is the issuance of a civil citation. A civil citation can result in a fine of one hundred dollars.

In response to increased parking shortages amongst Chestertown residents, students were encouraged to utilize public parking areas such as schools and other parking locations when visiting friends off-campus for brief periods of time. Some members suggested that hosts should contact the public areas to inform officials before using parking at public facilities.

The next meeting of the Old Chestertown Neighborhood Association is scheduled for Saturday, March 7 at 10:00 a.m. at the Kent County Library. All members of the Chestertown community are welcome to attend.

SGA Presents Checks to Local Rescue Organizations

The Student Government Association of Washington College, in representing the student body, would like to take this opportunity to recognize the outstanding service of the Chestertown Volunteer Fire Department and the Kent and Queen Anne's Rescue Squad. These two volunteer services have helped the college community so much this past year and in years past. In order to help continue this valuable service, which is unfortunately in jeopardy due to the proposed state budget cuts to EMS funding, the Student Government Association would like to show the students' appreciation for a job well done. To further this success, the student body has donated to Chief Alex Dolgus and Chief Richard White two checks of $650 each. We feel that the Fire Department and the Rescue Squad provide a vital public service not only to the Chestertown community but also to the Washington College community as well. We applaud your efforts and thank you again for your dedication to safety.

Dean McIntire Clarifies WC's Handling of Off-Campus Students

By Pat Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

Many Washington College students have always lived off-campus in the greater Chestertown community, enjoying the serenity and freedom not afforded by a dormitory lifestyle. However, in the past five years, off-campus student living patterns have altered drastically, from rural, isolated areas to the tight, heterogeneous neighborhoods of Chestertown. These neighborhoods, like High and Queen Streets, include older residents, newlyweds, and numerous young children. Along with this migration of WC students into the community comes typical, college student related problems; noise, parking, disregard for neighbors. In short, all the problems associated with a nine-month (two semester) transient lifestyle. Many Chestertown residents are concerned about their new neighbors, and Washington College's

Editorial (An Impression of Last Monday's Faculty Meeting)

Before I accomplish anything with this editorial, are there any questions or problems that need to be addressed?

(Speaker #1-Chairman for the Committee of Faculty Members with Nothing Better to Do): -Yes, I have a problem with the phrase "editorial." It's too vague, too unassuming. Is there some way we could rephrase it so that its meaning is better understood?

(Speaker #2-Committee Representative for Professors in Love with the Sound of Their Own Voices) -Yes, I agree. Of course, it's written by the editor, so obviously the typesetter didn't write it. So, then, doesn't the phrase "editorial" seem redundant?

(Speaker #3-Sub-committee Representative for Loquacious Channelers of the Unknown to Everyone but Themselves) -If I might say something here, the committee purposely chose the term "editorial" for its redundant qualities. We are of course the faculty, we like things that are redundant...monotonous...tedious. In short, we favor anything that brings about ear-splitting, nail-biting boredom amongst the student body.

(Speaker #4-Professor with Nothing to Say, But is Pissed He/She Got Stuck With a Lousy Office in Ferguson) -I don't really have anything to add on this topic. I have no opinion whatsoever in fact. But I would like to add that the temperature level in the Ferguson drinking fountain is just not acceptable. Some of us have PhD.'s for crying out loud! We won't stand for lukewarm water!

Getting back to the issue on the table, how would you like to re-phrase the term "editorial" to better suit the interests of this institution?

(#1) -We might call it, "A Brief Segment of Exposition Concerning a Particular Aspect of Campus Life That Does Not Necessarily Reflect the Opinions of the Washington College ELM, but that of its Editor."

Do we have a second on this motion?

(#3) -Yes, I agree with it. But I would like to change the word "Aspect" to the phrase "Area of Interest."

Does everyone agree to the proposal of this addition. First to the rewording of the phrase "editorial" and then secondly, the altering of "Aspect" to "Area of Interest."

The faculty nods (off).

(#4) -Before we vote, I would also like to add that I find the toilet-seats in Ferguson to also be quite offensive. They are made of cold, gold-plated porcelain (Casey style), and whenever I sit on them, the shock is so tremendous, I often lose my train of thought....

All in favor of rewording the phrase "Editorial" to "A Brief Segment of Exposition Concerning a Particular Aspect of Campus Life That Does Not Necessarily Reflect the Opinions of the Washington College ELM, but that of its Editor," including the rewording of "Aspect" to "Area of Interest" please respond by saying, "Yeah."

Anyone? Ah, four votes. The nays have it. From now on, the official title of this column will be called "Editorial," allowing, of course, further debate on the subject at the next Faculty Meeting. Now, for the next order of business....

Library Thanks Community's Patience

Dear Editor:

Last fall THE ELM ran a series of articles on the library's automation project. I requested the coverage so that the campus community could have a sense of the schedule we were on, of the enormity of the project, and of the contributions so many people made to achieve its success. We told you about administrative and donor support, the hard work of Judith Hymes and her corps of retrospective conversion students, and the faculty, administrators, students, Board Members, and staff involved in the evaluation and selection process.

There is a final group that I would like to note and thank publicly. These are the people who drilled the holes, installed the cables, provided the electricity, and otherwise prepared the building to receive the system. They did their work flawlessly so that, when all connections were finally made and we turned on the switch, everything ran as it was supposed to from the first moment. They also saw to it that the work was done on schedule.

All of us thank the following for making this phase of the installation go smoothly: Reid Raudenbush, Joe Cathers, Bob Homan, Jimmy Maitland, Neal Metzbower, Tim Moore, Rita Philips, Ginny Pyle, Dave Reihl, Louis Saunders, and Donald Starkey. There are probably a few more who were in and out before we could catch their names. We thank them, too.

Finally to the longsuffering students, faculty, and library staff who lived through the drilling, I hope we will all agree that it was worth it.

Sincerely,
William J. Tubbs

Broadcast Misuse Condemned

To the Editor:

I would like to say a few things about the WC Macintosh network program called "Broadcast", both for students who have never encountered it, and particularly for the benefit of the students who do use, and possibly misuse it. Broadcast provides a unique opportunity for the students of Washington College to interact with one another. The apparent – no, make that the all too real – separatism and cliquishness practiced by our student body has been a source of chagrin for the administration, and hopefully for students as well. They ask, how can a multicultural curriculum be introduced if a more or less homogeneous group of students doesn't even talk to each other outside of narrowly defined social groups?

Through the use of pseudonyms Broadcast is providing students with a way to communicate with others not in their social sphere. Unlike the network access name, which has to be your own, the Broadcast name can be changed to anything. I have spoken to many people on Broadcast at some length, and when we finally get around to exchanging identities I discover that I have been conversing with a KA, or a rugby player, or someone else whom I, a non-partying, non-sports playing bookish sort, would not ordinarily strike up a conversation with. Often this realization marks the end of the conversation, perhaps because of those social stigmas, but if the students of Washington College are ever to burst their bud of isolation and blossom forth into acceptance of each other, it just might be Broadcast that provides the opening ray of sunlight.

Unfortunately, budding hormones seem to be all that interest some Broadcast participants, and it is of those people that I wish to speak. There has always been an element of raunchiness in Broadcast messages, aided and abetted by the reassurance of anonymity. Recently, however, the

CAC Computer Classroom Once Again Closed to Public

By Julie Greene
Senior Office Manager

This past Monday, February 3, at the faculty meeting, Dean Taylor reported for the Committee on Academic Technology that the Casey Academic Center's computer classroom is once again closed to the public this semester.

Tim Kirk, the Assistant Director of the Computing Center, explained the two reasons the computer classroom has been closed. First, "the primary goal of the space is as a teaching facility. Having it open at night makes it difficult to guarantee the integrity of the classroom as a teaching facility," because students are moving files around and changing them. Kirk added, "The teacher's focus should not be on getting bugs out of the machine," before starting class.

Second, "there is an increasing academic pressure for that space to be available," as a classroom for laboratories. Presently the computer classroom is being used at night for Language and Psychology Labs.

Dean Taylor added to his announcement that although those fourteen computers will not be available to the students, the Computering Center has compensated by providing additional Macintoshes in the dorms and the Library.

Kirk confirmed this, stating that there are now dormitory clusters of computers in Somerset, Worchester, and all three floors of Minta Martin. Hard drives have been added to the Macs in Queen Anne and West Hall. The hard drives will improve the computers' speed, for they will no longer have to boot across the network. The Computing Center also anticipates upgrading the clusters in Kent House and Wicomico. There are also four new Macintosh LCs in the Library and four in the Computing Center.

If any professors wish to make the Computer Classroom available to their students for a lab, they can schedule a session to be supervised by the requesting professor. Also, the faculty may request certain software programs to be made accessible by the newly distributed computers on campus, so students will still be able to work on their projects outside of class time.

Kirk commented that the computers in the dormitories may be older, but that the only function they are not capable of doing, compared to the ones in the CAC, are high grade colorgraphics. Since 80 percent of computer use on campus is word processing, colorgraphics are not a necessity, especially with the current budgetary restraints. However, higher end functions are available for students on the departmental level.

"The computers in the dormitories are an experiment," stated Kirk. While the models are older, they are also sturdier, so they may withstand a greater risk of breakage. The computers in the dorms, "are better machines than what the Elm and college relations are currently using."

Kirk concluded that, "There will never be enough computers in the CAC classroom, so the long term goal is to put enough machines in the dormitories, where students traditionally do their work."

Student Lounge Opens

By John Griep
Staff Writer

The Washington College Student Activities Board celebrated the grand opening of the recently completed Student Study Lounge, in the old Bookstore location, with a reception in the basement of Hodson Hall on Wednesday night.

The ELM spoke with Teri Turmel, the Director of Student Activities and the Student Union, about her plans for the new Study Lounge. Turmel remarked that she envisions the lounge as ". . . a giant living room for the campus. It should be a center for the campus and when all the renovations are done to the building, it should be the congregating place for the campus."

The basement of Hodson Hall will now be termed the Washington College Student Union. This consists of the Snack Bar, CoffeeHouse, Arcade, and Study Lounge. Future renovations to the CoffeeHouse and Snack Bar areas will result in those two locations being transformed into one larger area. This will provide more room for events.

The Student Union will be open Monday-Friday from 8 a.m. until 12 midnight. On Saturday and Sunday, it will be open from noon until midnight. However, if a function is being held in the CoffeeHouse, the Student Union will remain open until the end of the event. The Study Lounge will be a non-smoking area, however, the CoffeeHouse will be open for smoking. Alcoholic beverages purchased from the Snack Bar may be consumed throughout the Student Union during operating hours. Any inquiries regarding the use of the WC Student Union should be directed toward Teri Turmel, Student Union Director.

Conservation in America

BIO 489 90 HONORS Conservation in America. It's a rather daunting title for a course. Images of large texts are invoked by HONORS and long hours in the lab by BIO. As a result, only five brave souls are currently enrolled in Dr. Donald Munson's class. Dr. Munson stated that in reality the course is not filled with highly technical terms and theories but is rather "a study of the history of conservation in America."

The course starts with the "classical" conservationists, Henry David Thoreau and his contemporaries, and finishes up by examining the future of the eco-movement. The course touches on issues such as the effect of the sportsman on the push for animal preservation and species diversity in the 21st century. Dr. Munson explained that the texts would not be read with the usual philosophical emphasis but with a biological/ecological slant instead. Dr. Munson admits that conservation is not his area of expertise but he is learning along with the class as they study the works of conservationists. By offering these materials, Dr. Munson hopes to help students to "better appreciate how humans fit into nature rather than above it." He spoke of the need to understand the effect we have on the environment and that we are "a part of nature not separate."

In spite of the daunting title Dr. Munson says that it is not strictly a biology course and there are no prerequisites other than a GPA of 3.0 or higher. It has not yet been decided if the Conservation in America course will be offered again. Students should contact Dr. Munson if they are interested in taking the course in a future semester.

In a telephone interview conducted on February 3, Maureen McIntire, Dean of Student Affairs at Washington College, classified the college's treatment of its off-campus students as a "two-pronged policy."

"Washington College is in the business of being good neighbors with the Chestertown community," McIntire stated. "Firstly, we do a fair amount of work with the off-campus students. In the beginning of the year, we write to all off-campus students with suggestions, practical knowledge for living within the community. We all remain in touch with the SGA throughout the year concerning student problems, including off-campus ones."

"However, secondly," McIntire added, "off-campus students are under the jurisdiction of the town, and they |the students| must be respectful of Chestertown's ordinances. Student Affairs can not intervene in those

The Washington College Student Government Association met this past Tuesday to vote on club funding and to discuss a number of important topics.

Vote On Student Activity Fee Increase

The Senate voted to request the Board of Visitors and Governors of Washington College to increase the student activity fee over a three-year period from $50 a year to $140. The biggest increase would occur in the first year with a jump from $50 to $100 annually. The fee would then increase $20 a year the next two years. Subsequent increases would be tied to the Consumer Price Index (CPI) and would result in approximately 6% raises each year. This proposal must now be approved by the Board in order to be implemented.

Faculty Votes on New Evaluation Forms

A faculty meeting this past Monday resulted in substantial changes to the teacher evaluation forms that students are asked to fill out at the end of each semester. Currently, evaluation forms consist of statements calling for responses in the form of approval or disapproval on a one to five scale with one extremely open-ended question at the end. Responses to this question have been typewritten by staff in order to ensure the anonymity of the student. The faculty apparently determined that the current evaluation forms did not provide effective student criticism.

The new format would ask students to list their year and their major at the top of the form. It would also have a limited number of approve-disapprove questions and an increased number of open-ended questions in order to obtain more constructive criticism. However, these responses would not be typewritten by staff.

A number of senators and Executive Board members were concerned that student anonymity might be compromised due to these changes. SGA President Kevin "Sparky" Kelly was particularly concerned that these changes were made without any input from the Student Academic Council, which is comprised of both students and faculty. The Senate voted to have the Academic Council investigate the matter to determine if there was any student input into the revised form.

Student Reaction: The State of the Union Address

Julie Greene

President Bush's State of the Union Address has failed to bolster the enthusiasm of many Washington College students and faculty, especially concerning the issue of the economy.

Reminding the country of our armed forces' success in the Gulf War, President Bush used a similar strategy in his speech to attack the recession, claiming "This will not stand."

Professor Bailey of the Economics Department, remarked that it seems to him that "the economy is in a pretty difficult mood right now... a pretty pessimistic mood and the administration was counting on consumer spending to bring the economy out of the recession and lower interest rates to stimulate investment. So far, we haven't gotten the impetus to get out of the recession. Are Bush's policy changes going to do that?"

Bailey went on to say that the problems of our domestic economy will not be solved by "quick fixes," but that stability needs to be sought in the long run. The problems with our country's infrastructure are in the long term, not cyclical. "Deep changes need to be made in our educational system, industrial system...we have to do something about health care. We need a series of changes to make the majority of the public feel optimistic about the economy."

While Bush mentioned long run solutions in his address, whether or not they are enacted is in serious doubt. Senior Steve Boucher stated that "they are good proposals, but he said the same things before, and they won't be enacted. He may get a capital gains cut, but not what he wants and he won't get big defense cuts either."

Senior Brett McCrea commented, "Finally, our president is addressing domestic policy. It took four years and a recession."

Boucher added that there was nothing wrong with Bush's foreign policy, "he's done a great job and could win on that alone if not for the recession."

Both Bailey and Boucher mentioned the continuing importance keeping free trade alive. Boucher indicated that our government's administrators are beginning to acknowledge the fact that the automobile industry's problems are not necessarily Tokyo's fault; that perhaps the problem is in Detroit.

Currently, American auto manufacturers are laying off workers, meaning they will now lose their pensions and health benefits. Professor Bailey stated that the Japanese have a policy of making their workers feel secure in the long run, improving morale and productivity. He added that "bashing the Japanese may make some Americans feel good now, but it won't solve our economy's problems in the long run."

Politically speaking, both Boucher and McCrea found Bush's request for the line item veto bold. While McCrea agreed "it would stop a lot of the pork barreling going on and the wasting of funds," Boucher remarked that it would "take all the fun out of being a congressman."

Business Professor J. Wright was more concerned with Bush's views of the family structure. "What offends me most was the President's social commentary. Less than ten percent of people live in the sort of 'traditional family' the President wants to empower. As a former Goldwater Republican, I am concerned about Bush's efforts to discriminate against the majority for the sake of this small minority. The African-American, gay and lesbian, working women, Hispanic, Jewish, Muslim groups - all of whom may choose to live within the traditional family setting- are all growing at faster rates than is the 'traditional family' group. These are the people we need to empower."

Wright also expressed concern for the future stability of the banking system. Bush's proposal to allow people to withdraw from their IRAs will remove long term funding from the country's banks.

The question remains, will Bush's policies be passed or remain empty promises? It was what the majority of the public wanted to hear. As Senior Stephanie Tennyson put it, "you can definitely tell it's campaign time."

Bush's State of the Union Address: Same Old Line

S. Ross Koon

In 1980 Ronald Reagan promised America that he would eliminate the Federal budget deficit. Reagan posited that if taxes were cut increased investment would cause the economy to grow, thereby increasing revenue. Elimination of waste in "Big Government" would wipe out the deficit while simultaneously allowing for ever increasing defence expenditures. At the time George Bush was skeptical-he even coined the phrase "Voodoo economics" to lampoon Reagan's fiscal irresponsibility .

It's now twelve years later, and Bush has long since been co-opted into Reagan's borrow and spend school of budgetary tomfoolery. In last Tuesday's State of the Union address Bush said "I know we're in hard times, but I know something else-this will not stand." I don't know what "we" Bush is talking about, but he doesn't look like he's been missing any meals lately. And as for these hard times not standing-it reminds me of Reagan's promise to eliminate the Deficit. Now, after Reagan, I get a little cynical whenever a presidential candidate starts to make grandiose promises about the economy. Bush's fiscal 1993 budget calls for a $352 billion deficit which is likely to wind up being a $400 billion deficit after Congressional approval. Why on Earth is that deficit so astronomically large? The answer lies in the $214 billion in interest that must be paid in fiscal 1993. The more you borrow, the more interest you must pay. I know that sounds simple, yet if we as a nation do not learn that lesson quickly we are in for an embarrassment far larger than the one which would be created by having Bush regurgitate on the entire UN General Assembly.

Doesn't Bush care that this money must be paid back? Evidently not. Congress doesn't care either. The fact is that Bush and his Republocratic and Demublican cronies in Congress don't give a damn about the deficit because when the repo man comes to cart the Statue of Liberty off to Japan they'll all be too dead to care. We do not have a government of the people, for the people or by the people but rather a government of the old, for the old and by the old. Is it a coincidence that the largest entitlement program is Social Security, a program which chiefly benefits the aged? Is it a co-incidence that Social Security is the only entitlement program Bush explicitly excluded from any budget cuts? I think not. I recommend slashing Social Security to the bone.

Bush said on Tuesday that "Welfare was never meant to be a lifestyle. . . ." The same could be said of Social Security. It was never meant to be the primary retirement income, only a supplementary pension. Social Security is a program which directly siphons money off from the productive wage earner and places it in the well-lined pockets of the infirm, the unbalanced and the senile. It is America's sacred cow. During the past ten years the number of senior citizens living in poverty has declined by 1.4%-while the number of children living in poverty has increased by 2%. We as a nation are investing not in the future, but in the past. It is time to get Big Government out of the business of subsidizing the aged and to let American families take care of their own.

And as for Bush's proposal to withhold something like a dollar less a day from wage earner's taxes, it is nothing more than a hoax. It won't stimulate the American economy-it simply means that every week Americans will buy an extra can of Colombian Coffee rather than one new Japanese VCR when they get their refund check. This measure is nothing more than a band-aid which is remarkable only in that it enlarges the deficit and yet fails to lessen our tax burden by one penny. This proposal is more like a pinprick in the ass than a shot in the arm. And what the hell was Bush doing congratulating himself for the low annual rate of inflation? People aren't saving money because banks aren't paying savers high enough interest to warrant increased savings. The only people who give a damn about inflation are the rich who have large amounts of money tied up in long term investments and pensioners who rely on income from revenues from similar investments.

But what really incited my ire in Bush's speech was the following statement: "When Barbara holds an AIDS baby in her arms, and reads to children, she's saying to every person in the country 'Family matters.'" Aside from the fact that this is a meaningless statement of sentiment which says nothing about the concrete effects of Bush's policies on AIDS patients and families, I find it appalling that Bush not only denies AIDS babies the right to guaranteed national health insurance while simultaneously denying it's mother the right to abort the fetus rather than subject it to a life of slow death. If Bush had allowed the Federal Government to fund abortions for women with AIDS the nation would save money-but more importantly thousands of children would be saved from being born into a body damned by cruel fate.

Bush's position on this issue is representative of his stance on all others. He'll sympathize with people with AIDS while underfunding research to lessen their suffering. As the nation's economic leader he'll stand on the sidelines and cheerlead but he won't put on his pads and helmet. As the environmental leader in 1988 he blasted Dukakis on television for the state of Boston Harbor, yet he failed to even mention the nation's state of the environment in this year's State of the Union Address. As the education President he visits schools while continuing to spend more on subsidizing America's elderly than educating its children. At this point in his Presidency George Bush is looking less and less like Ronald Reagan and more and more like Herbert Hoover. Let's all see to it that his term in office ends just as Hoover's did.

Kaplan Makes Math Fun

By Amanda Burt
Staff Writer

Professor Gail Kaplan finds creative ways to make math fun for her students. She uses games to stimulate the learning process and encourage an active atmosphere in the classroom. Kaplan's unique teaching methods have been recognized both locally and nationally through her participation in math workshops. In December, she was appointed to the Committee on the Teaching of Undergraduate Mathematics of the Mathematical Association of America (MAA).

"Students must take most of the responsibility for learning," Kaplan says, "and my job is to find where their problem spots are and help them learn to learn. I am more like a resource person than an instructor."

WC's own Gail Kaplan.

Although she limits the amount of lecture time in her introductory courses, Kaplan finds that most students are willing to take the responsibility for learning. Because she works with students who often have low esteem and high anxiety, she emphasizes an active atmosphere where there is a give and take between the professor and student and students individually.

Kaplan wants her students to understand that there are lots of answers to different types of mathematical questions. She says that most instructors believe that there is only one way to do certain problems, but learning to creatively search for answers can counterract the pigeon-hole mentality. Kaplan also finds that it is often easier for younger students to be creative, as they have not yet learned not to be creative. Most others must train themselves to be creative.

Even the art student feels comfortable in one of Kaplan's classes. In order to demonstrate the relationship between math and art, she utilizes tess*elations*, a mosaic-like geometrical pattern which fills a plane surface without any gaps. Through trial and error, students must figure out what geometrical shapes will tesselate.

Writing is also used by Kaplan as a technique for learning, and she argues that it is an integral part of math. Mathematical research must be explained, and there is also a strong need to be able to understand math in layman's terms. Kaplan points to several recent best-sellers, such as The Mathematical Tourist, which make math accessible to the general public.

One game that Kaplan uses for Logic and Mathematical Investigations is called the Wiff' N Proof, a collection of about twenty games which forces students to think well. While speed is not important, she says, the first few games go quickly and the students are then willing to be more patient.

"In my Statistics class, I plan to illustrate the relation between predictions and reality by handing out packs of M & M's. Before they open them, I will have the students predict how many are in the package, and how many of each color there will be. Then I will put the collective results on the board and examine the accuracy of the predictions."

Students in Kaplan's Statistics class frequently work in small groups. "The ability to work in groups alleviates some of the tension that is present when the entire class works a problem together, and it stimulates the learning process, " she says. "It is very valuable if you can explain something because you must really know the material." Students in the groups compare their answers and share their reasoning. If there is an error in a student's approach, other members in the group discuss the problem and usually find a solution. Kaplan is used as a resource when the group cannot determine its mistake.

Response to her methods in the professional community is mixed. "Some people are incredibly enthusiastic and realize there need to be changes made in order to spark national interest for those who are less than highly able," Kaplan notes, "and there are significant numbers who believe that the way they were taught was good enough for them, and so it is also good enough for their students."

As a child, she grew up in the generation of "new math." While attending the smallest elementary school in Baltimore City, Kaplan learned advanced concepts in a different manner. Since then, she has dedicated herself to finding fun ways to stimulate interest in math. Kaplan regularly gives workshops at Georgetown East and Montessori International in Annapolis. In addition, she tries to visit one or two other schools each year. "I look at it as my contribution to the community," she says.

The MAA is also committed to improving Math instruction in the United States, and it recently chose Kaplan to be a member of the Committee on the Teaching of Undergraduate Mathematics. There are between twelve and fifteen other instructors from around the nation who are on the Committee. Kaplan's appointment is for three years. "Since we haven't had our first meeting yet, I'm not sure what we are planning to do. In the past, the Committee has sponsored some panel discussions and published a book about college teaching," she notes.

Kaplan came to WC four years ago after taking off one year. Before that, she worked at the Naval Academy for eight years. When she began, the first women students were graduating, and the Academy was not accustomed to having women around. She enjoys the more relaxed atmosphere at WC and the warmth of the students.

"I am glad to have the opportunity to teach innovative techniques here," Kaplan admits. "It's a real risk, both in the class and professionally. But I guess I'm a risk-taker, and I think that's what makes life exciting."

Town Council Meeting

By Martha Kimura
Staff Writer

The Town Council met on February 3 for their monthly meeting. Some issues discussed were the lighting of the crosswalk, the parking situation, and the conditions of the houses rented out by absentee landlords.

The crosswalk on 213 has proven to be a hazard to both pedestrians and motorists. The present lighting causes a glare that interferes with the vision of drivers. Mayor Horsey mentioned the three lights removed by the college for aesthetic beauty. The lights were atop poles, 27 to 30 feet in height, to help alleviate the glare encountered by drivers at night. Town Manager, William S. Ingersoll, resolved to meet with college officials to search for a solution.

The parking situation was another problem which the Council discussed. Since houses were built so close together, there is seldom enough parking. The problem is especially evident on Queen Street and the 100 and 500 blocks of High Street. Council Member Margo G. Bailey inquired about repainting the parking lines. According to other members, more cars can park on the streets without the lines. The council will continue to look for answers to this problem.

In reference to the conditions of the houses rented out by absentee landlords, a series of ordinances from other towns was being examined by the Town Council's lawyer. The Town Council had met with the members of the SGA to insure the safety and the rights of the off-campus students. Peter S. Ingersoll offered to help write the leases with the off-campus students.

Town Council meetings are held on the first Monday of every month. All members of the Chestertown community are welcome to attend.

Fall '91 Poetry Postcard Winners

The following three poems by Raph Koster, Jennifer Reddish, and our very own A&E Editor J. Tarin Towers were selected by William Bowie, a Washington College alumni and poet, to be the winners of Fall '91's Postcard Poetry Contest. Watch for news of the Spring '92 Contest.

EULOGY FOR ALBERTO

I heard someone I knew who died some months ago.
He dove from a car window, taken by the wind, and flew
Across the city streets, over the people standing gaping.
And nobody knew what to say to him as he stroked the sky.

I hope he never hits the ground. Let him shoot on, burn out,
Cross the clouds, bend around the Sun, winged and shouting
As he reaches the shattered fiery stars and bursts onward from
The person I had known. He was not my friend, but it matters to me to know he saw the wings swell from his back, to know he saw the light I cannot see.

-Raphael Koster

CHANGE

It was as if I was just spare change between sofa cushions in your living room, a pleasant extra surprise once in a while,
but not something to count on regularly.

"So you want to fall in love?" you asked me.
You were looking at my hair and caressing
the glass mug of iced tea on my card table.
I couldn't concentrate on my word search:

Villanelle, sestina, sonnet, rondel, rondeau.
The last word was audabe. I'd been circling poems all afternoon and couldn't find that single word to save my life.

I don't like wallpaper or pretzels or picture windows. Dogs make me sleepy, like the Buddah or the Blues for Allah poster.
You like burning things, too. You like seeing silver jewelry and black stockings on me.

You said it took all week to track me down a black bouquet, a black vase, a black gift tag.
You smothered candlelight, you looked like you'd just gotten a new comic book.

I liked making you happy. You brought up your
M*A*S*H*
episode, the one where B.J. gets to wear red. "Of course," we both said, "I don't want a commitment either."

-J. Tarin Towers

On Dyin'

I tells the lawyer - I'm leavin'
My land to me.
I wanna be buried in grass that grows
Quiet, worms and birds eating my body.
I wanna be alone and smell my bones
Crack into dust as a tree bursts
Through my stomach.

The young lawyer grins too wide,
As a dingy gold reflects off his rings.
He mentions my children . . .
What children? - the people who visit
When the sky turns gray in winter.
Pat my hand and purse - and leave Quickly.

The lawyer man just smiles his smile
Returns his notebook to his cracked briefcase,
And leaves me be in my sun.

-Jennifer Gray Reddish

Weissman on Task Force:

Answers Questions
Outlines Goals for Future at WC

Dr. Edward Weissman, professor of Political Science, is currently the chairman of the Task Force on the Status of Lesbians and Gay Men at Washington College. Dr. Weissman proposed the formation of this Task Force at the September, 1991 faculty meeting and has chaired the group throughout the academic year.

The ELM spoke with Dr. Weissman in his office on Wednesday in order to learn more about this Task Force and to ask him about the progress it has made in its investigations.

ELM: What is the Task Force?

Ed Weissman: The Task Force was created unanimously by the faculty, at my motion, to investigate the status of gay men and lesbians on campus. It's broader than just students; it includes faculty and staff. It is concerned not just with the academic program, but with all aspects of life on campus. . . . One of the things the task force is doing is investigating means by which benefits which the college ordinarily extends to the heterosexual partners of faculty and staff can be extended to the gay partners of faculty and staff. Now basically, as you probably know, the college has a general non-discrimination policy, which also extends to the issue of sexual orientation. And basically, the failure of the college in not providing these benefits is a direct violation of its non-discrimination policy. Historically . . . we know of one case . . . in which the college did, on an informal basis, extend these benefits to the life partner of a gay member of the faculty. That was some time ago.

. . . One of the great questions which interests me is why, not just this college in particular, but this country in particular, is basically behind virtually the rest of Western civilization on this issue. It really is like the sewer of Western civilization . . . as it is on other social issues.

There are a number of issues involved in this . . . . One is |that| contrary to the rest of the whole college policy of non-discrimination, which basically is a mirror of society's policies of non-discrimination, both federal and state, in regard to sexual orientation, both levels of government explicitly do not include sexual orientation in their civil rights and human rights codes. And in fact, in this state, as in many other states, technically, in law, because of sodomy statutes, gay sexual relations are illegal. As a result of that, and because this state in particular explicitly bans marriage amongst two men or two women, the problem with extending benefits relates to the issue of insurance. . . . The insurance companies say they can't do it because it's against the law, so there are real problems here. . . .

In my case, this particular battle is a battle I fought almost 15 years ago, when my lover and I, at the time, were able to win the inclusion of spousal benefits for gay couples in Ontario, which set the precedent there. So, that's one concern of the task force.

A second concern of the task force is education, both in and outside of the classroom. Specifically, issues of attitudes and things like that. Another concern of the task force is the provision of other services for students, such as counseling and the provision of gay and lesbian counselors. . . . Concern as well for issues involving AIDS education. I think, ironically, we're in a situation on this campus here . . . probably gay men are the least at risk because they take this all very seriously. Most students on this campus don't know the risks they're all taking. They engage in unprotected sex. And that's another concern of ours. We want to . . . and we will be in the next ten days . . . we will be undertaking a study of attitudes and practices on campus in a systematic and a scientific way to find out a number of answers to a number of questions we have.

We are going to be making recommendations on issues such as additions to the curriculum, . . . hiring on campus, and issues of a more general concern of a minority in this community which is at least 10% of this community. That's what the task force is all about.

Now, I think I should go into why it is necesssary now. It's necessary now because so much of what we are doing now is stuff which should have been done a long, long, long, long time ago. I think one of the questions we are addressing . . . is why was it not undertaken some time ago. I have some fairly conclusive evidence that an earlier attempt to start something of this kind was . . . repressed by the administration. . . . The faculty member who was trying to start such an organization was told not to. I should clarify that by saying none of the administrators currently in place in Bunting were in office at the time that happened. . . .

ELM: It's taken the University of Delaware twenty years to establish a task force. It seems somewhat ironic that the same year GALA comes into existence at Washington College, the Task Force is initiated. Do you see a connection there or, like you said before, has it been a long time in coming? Did GALA have a part in having the task force formed?

EW: I think they basically occurred all at the same time. . . . I think, frankly, GALA and the task force happened because I pushed them . . . I would not take no for an answer. I think that the crucial thing is the absence of leadership, which has been woefully lacking in the past.

ELM: Leadership . . .

EW: I think that in this regard, faculty have, and had, a crucial responsibility . . . in that the creation of these sorts of organizations require faculty prepared to come out of the closet. And with one exception in the past at this institution, that has not been present. I think that everyone has to pay an enormous debt to Richard Brown, who was . . . a professor of mathematics here, retired in 1986, and tragically died just this past fall . . . who was the only one to really stand up a very, very, very long time ago. Basically, I think that's what leadership is most important for, to provide an example of courage, and I think that that's been very lacking.

I think if one looks at this institution . . . and I'm starting to draw conclusions at this stage of the process . . . although it appears to be a tolerant institution, it is very definitely not. It has been enormously insensitive, it's been enormously bigoted, and those are the things which must, and will, change.

ELM: And you see that happening with the task force?

EW: Yeah. What the task force will do . . . when it makes its report . . . will be to make a number of specific recommendations. Some of which are fairly predictable . . . I think it's clear that all benefits must be extended to all members of this community, no matter what their sexual orientation might be. And that decision was already taken when the college passed its non-discrimination code and now it's a question of implementation.

I think the second recommendation deals with students. I think students are particularly significant here because they're what the institution is all about to begin with and . . . I think the ages of 18 to 22 are not just a time of intellectual growth, but a time of growth of one's self-realization as well. And I think that for many students, for many people of that age, which for many is a time when they begin to come to terms with who they are . . . the absence of organized structures to help them deal with that very difficult and, in a sense, life-long process, is . . . well, the provision of services necessary to help with that process is absolutely necessary . . . .

ELM: When do you expect all the results of the task force to be completed?

EW: By the middle of next month . . . I hope.

ELM: When they are done . . .?

EW: We will present them to the president of the college because, technically, this is a task force which he created . . . . The faculty passed a motion creating a presidential task force . . . . He was called upon to create the task force by appointing people to it and there was a charge to the task force as to what they were to investigate. . . . In doing so, we were given the job of doing our studies and preparing the report. We are this late because it's just been a sheer herculean bit of work. . . .

I think I should add that this campus is really behind the world on these issues.

ELM: On many things.

EW: Yeah, on many things and I think that this acts as a metaphor. I think this campus in many respects thinks of itself as Cleopatra, and remember, Cleopatra was Queen of 'De Nile. I think one of the most startling things has been the enormous support we've gotten from students. I think that here is an issue where, unambiguously, most students are 10,000 years ahead of their elders. I believe it is a real generational thing. I think there are pockets of hopelessness and pockets of homophobia, but they will be ruthlessly done away with. I think one of the most interesting things is the enormous growth of GALA and I think . . ., in a way, it's the first concrete result of the task force.

Gay and Lesbian Alliance (GALA): The 'Invisible Minority' Speaks Out

By Patrick Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

Since its formation at the beginning of last semester, the Gay and Lesbian Alliance (GALA), an organization dedicated to providing support and education for gay / lesbian / bisexual concerns within the Washington College Community, has remained relatively unknown / ignored by most of the campus.

On Tuesday, February 4, the ELM spoke with the co-presidents of GALA, Amy Caddle and Gehrett Ellis, about the group's origins, its involvement in the college's Gay and Lesbian Task Force, and their goals for the group's future. The meeting was more a conversation than interview, the three of us relaxing on bean-bag chairs, pre-arranged questions scrapped in favor of a more open, shared discussion.

Pat Attenasio: First off, what is GALA?
Gehrett Ellis: Literally it means Gay and Lesbian Alliance.
Amy Caddle: It's an organization of gays, lesbians, bisexuals, and heterosexuals people too, who support gay and lesbian rights. That's what our membership consists of.
PA: How many members are in the group?
GE: Thirty.
PA: Do they include members of the community as well as the college?
AC: Yes, we have townspeople, faculty members, and students.
PA: Did GALA exist at all at Washington College before this year?
AC: One of the reasons I started it was because I can remember back in my freshman year, there was an organization...I don't think they were funded by the SGA or anything. They would meet, but off-campus. It wasn't really an active organization. As far as I can remember, nothing like GALA has ever existed at WC before, not in my four years here.
GE: Despite the fact it's been listed in the catalogue for years.
PA: Let's go back to the beginning of last semester. What steps did you take in the forming of GALA?
AC: I approached Ed Weissman | Professor of Political Science at WC | in the very beginning of the year, even before classes started, and proposed the idea to him. He told me about his plans for the task force | see task force article |, so it was really coincidental. The two are not related, but they feed off of each other. I think they have stirred up a lot of interest here this year. We did a lot of thinking and planning over the summer about how we were going to present this to the campus, because we know that sometimes people are hesitant to new ideas. It was radical for Washington College, because it hadn't really been prominent on campus before.
GE: A week before classes started, I talked to Amy and she told me she had talked to Ed Weissman about the group. The next week we were in his office making plans.
PA: Describe one of your meetings. How do they go, what do you talk about?
AC: The first half-hour, from 9 to 9:30, we have business. And then fro 9:30 on we have discussion groups on different topics. This lasts until 10:30 or until everyone has had a chance to participate in the conversation.
PA: What are some of the topics you discuss?
GE: Last week we discussed bisexuality. We've done, "What is Sexuality?"...
AC: That was our first topic because we felt that was the most important topic to be addressed. Is it just a sex act? Is it emotional attachment? Is it how you perceive yourself or how others perceive you?
PA: Within the actual group, do you see a division between gay members and straight members?
AC: We don't even see it as a division. They're there to support gay and lesbian rights and to participate in discussion, to open their minds, and that's the most important thing. I give them a lot of credit for coming.

One thing that we've started, that we will incorporate into the next meeting, is that we realize it is sometimes difficult to discuss really personal issues. So, at the next meeting, we are going to break down into smaller groups. We are going to have a men's discussion group and a women's discussion group every other meeting.
GE: Even though you're gay or lesbian, there are personal differences within the group.
PA: Everyone does not fit into the same mold.

Co-Presidents of GALA

AC: Exactly. We have really eccentric people and really reserved people from all areas of the campus.
PA: How has GALA's acceptance been so far on-campus?
GE: You could take it in two ways. One, because there hasn't been that much negative feedback, that the reaction has been pretty good. But, two, we have posted signs on campus that say "Gay people are...with a huge blank space, and people could fill in whatever they felt. We got things back like, "HIV positive," and "close-minded people." Yet, many of the reactions were really positive.
PA: Thirty members for any new group is a pretty strong start.
GE: Yes. But one of the strange things about that is there aren't that many actual gay or lesbian members. We don't expect people, just because this organization is here, to all of a sudden jump out of the closet and say, "I'm here!"
AC: People should know it's not a threatening situation. We're really laid back. Our whole idea is education and positive role-modelling. We're not a militant group or anything.
GE: One of our main concerns is to present gay and lesbian people in a positive light.
PA: Do you consult with or are you aware of GALA groups at other schools?
GE: Yes. We have travelled to the University of Delaware, and they have been very supportive. They are always encouraging us to attend their meetings, get a feel for how they are. We are going back to Delaware in March for an east coast conference of gay and lesbian organizations. That should give us many good ideas for next year.
PA: So there is an active network of schools, not just isolated groups?
AC: Yes. We're looking to start consulting with other schools...places like University of Maryland.
PA: How has support from the administration been so far? Do they recognize GALA?
GE: The faculty and Student Affairs have been very supportive.
AC: And the fact that the SGA has been responsive is very positive.
GE: We've never actually heard anything from President Trout, except for when we signed up for the task force? It upset me due to the fact that GALA is an important group on campus. We're tackling issues on this campus which are, until now, untouchable.
AC: I think the fact that President Trout recognized the task force is great. The Gay and Lesbian Student Union at University of Delaware has been trying for twenty years to get a task force to investigate the statues of gays and lesbians on campus. It's remarkable at Washington College since the same year we organized GALA, we also get a task force.
PA: So, so far the group has been a success?
AC: Definitely. Of all the groups on campus, GALA has grown so much in just a semester. We started out with six people at our first meeting, and now we're up to about twenty people a meeting.
PA: What are your plans for the coming semester?
GE: We want to get speakers because we are still a little bit isolated at WC. We need, as a campus to recognize it as a whole, more so than just a single group. So I think bringing speakers in will help.
AC: We're also co-sponsoring Black Hearts Ball with the Writer's Union. We're taking part in Awareness Week (tentatively scheduled for early April) with Sane-Freeze, Amnesty International, Terra-Firma, Hands OUT, and GALA. We hope to kick that week off with a band, followed all week with guest speakers for each organization. We also plan on another poetry reading and a group dinner.
PA: This is a small, cliquish school in a largely conservative town. There must be concern amongst students to get involved or to 'come out' here. What advice do you have for them?
GE: That's really hard. In our situations, we didn't really 'come out.' We came out to limited groups of people outside of here. This campus is a hard place to 'come out.' The only thing there is as far as a support system is GALA. I feel GALA is a strong enough support system within itself. But, I'm not going to tell anyone they have to 'come out' on this campus.
PA: And it's not like you're officially one thing or another by 'coming out.' A public announcement is not necessary.
AC: Yes. One day you don't just wake up and announce, "I'm out!" It's a continuous process, not just a one day event.
GE: With the task force one of the goals we have is to help people in the 'coming out' process by getting them counselling.
PA: Doesn't the school already provide counselling?
GE: There are counsellors, but in my situation, it was really hard to talk to someone who was not trained in that area. Every situation is different....some people have it easy, others find it to be real hard.

AC: Especially with the people who matter to you, your close friends and family...

GE: If they're not going to accept you....they knew you before you said you were gay, and they liked you before. That's like me going up to someone and saying, "Oh my God, I didn't know you were naturally a brunette!"

AC: It's just such a little part of you.

GE: It's natural. I'm sure people on this campus, when they heard about the formation of GALA, thought we were going to recruit.

AC: We're not out on a witch hunt. We're not going to go knocking on any doors. Our meetings our confidential.

PA: Have you considered the idea of having an all-campus symposium to educate and discuss gay awareness on campus?

GE: I would like to have something where a large portion of the campus can come and state how they feel.

AC: An intelligent dialogue, not a ping-pong letter writing effect as happened in last semester's ELM.

GE: We haven't gotten any legitimate input and reaction. The group's been here for one semester, and no one's really said anything. Whether the feedback is good or bad, we would like to know...we can handle it.

AC: The group is strong enough now to handle any positive or negative reaction.

GE: We're not a group out to cause trouble.

AC: The idea is to portray the image of gays and lesbians as an integral part of the community, not as people who want to go off and live in Greenwich Village the rest of their lives, or get an apartment in Dupont Circle. Gays and lesbians are everywhere. Ten percent, and that's a rough estimate, of the population is gay, so you figure out of the 800 students on this campus, at least, at the very least, there's about 90 people on this campus who are gay or lesbian. They could be your roommate, the guy who plays next to you on a sports team, your sorority sister. Everywhere, they're everywhere. It's easy to discriminate against some minority groups because of visible characteristics, but gays and lesbians are sort of the invisible minority.

The thing that people have to realize is that we don't want to be a separatist group. We come from all areas of the college population.

GE: That would be the worst thing to do. If we became a separatist group we would be doing something that actually happens to us, and that's discriminating against other people, and that's not the way it works.

AC: We're not going to cause trouble, but we're not going to be quiet. We are not going to shut up, and we are not going away. But, we don't want special treatment.

GE: We just want to be recognized as a group, just like every other group.

PA: Do you think people at WC are afraid of you and what you stand for?

AC: People really have to lose their fear. Fear is the biggest obstacle that prevents people from opening their minds, and learning, and accepting people. People have to let go of that fear and realize that gays and lesbians exist, and our lifestyle is just as valid as theirs is. We are not out to recruit, we're out to educate.

GE: We don't want to be the invisible minority.

AC: The way society is structured now, gays and lesbians are at a disadvantage. We just want equal pairing. Equal pairing, not better. People think, homosexuals are going to take over the world. We just want to be treated equally with fairness...

GE: And respect...

AC: The same constitutional rights everyone else is entitled to.

PA: How do you feel about acceptance?

AC: You don't have to accept us. I'd like it if people would say, "I'm not gay, but I understand their lives are just as viable as my life is." Acceptance is a weird word. You don't have to come to our meetings and say, I accept you. A lot of people aren't ready for that.

GE: Accept yourself for who you are, and accept others for what they are.

AC: That's all we ask. Just think about it....

Task Force

GALA is about an ongoing organization; the task force's job, in a nutshell, is really to try to take a snapshot in time . . . to say, here's where we are and here's where we want to be; how do we get from here to there?

. . . One of the great questions which interests me is why, not just this college in particular, but this country in particular, is basically behind virtually the rest of Western civilization on this issue. It really is like the sewer of Western civilization . . . as it is on other social issues. You can look at the infant mortality rate in this country, the health care system in this country. One looks at the pandemic nature of poverty in this society, compared to Western European and Austral-Asian nations, compared to the one nation to the north of us. And I think that they're all tied in.

ELM: One year, or five years, from now; when does Washington College start seeing the results of the task force?

EW: I think we've already begun to see the results . . .

ELM: As far as awareness and hiring . . .

EW: I think that the results are going to happen very quickly . . . . This is an issue, to use the appropriate metaphor, which has come out of the closet . . . .

I want to conclude by saying one thing . . . this really is not about being politically correct. I'm probably one of the least politically correct people around this place. It's basically about letting people be who they are and that has been something which has been woefully lacking here. . . This college is interested in diversity. I think one of the crucial places to start is with minorities which are already here, but which are invisible.

number of sexually explicit messages has sharply increased, and these messages are not just raunchy, they are downright crude. I am not interested in offers of sexual favors, (in these days of AIDS and date rape who would accept a nameless, faceless offer, anyway... or make one, for that matter?) nor am I particularly interested to be informed by a person named "Two balls and a penis" that his balls fit in my mother's mouth, and she likes it. (Are you even allowed to print that, Pat?) Such juvenile messages make me wonder how the author ever elevated his thought processes high enough to get accepted into college in the first place.

Other people I've spoken casually to have been the recipients of similar messages, and it has been suggested to me that there may be some sort of profanity clause that could revoke the network privileges of the perpetrators. I would not advocate such drastic action against people who may think that they are just playing harmless pranks, but I do believe that some reproof is in order.

It could be argued that my chastisement of the perpetrator(s) of this computerized pornography is a curtailment of their right to freedom of expression. Were they to print broadsides of their, ahem... creative anatomical descriptions, and post them alongside WacHappenings in the Dining Hall for the entire student body to read or not read at their discretion, I would have no objection. Directionless obscenity may be viewed as freedom of speech; messages directed specifically at me (or at anyone else) through Broadcast, I would term harassment.

Lest the age-old argument of protectors of the first amendment be used against me (and it's an argument I've used often myself), I will concede that if I am offended by the material being bandied about, I could choose to just remove Broadcast from my computer and not have to receive such messages. In light of the many wonderful conversations I've had with people on Broadcast I choose not to take that step, but rather to issue this appeal to the student(s) who abuse Broadcast.

See, behind all my genuine but high-minded arguments about campus unity lies the real reason that just about everybody with a network connection also has Broadcast - it's just plain fun to call people we don't know and say hi, or ask them why they picked such an interesting name, or why they're still at the computer at two in the morning. Those students who do have a network connection and don't run Broadcast often have been deterred by the same unwelcome attentions that I am objecting to. That a fun and potentially valuable campus resource is having mud tossed all over it is a real shame.

To sum up, then, my message to the (for lack of a better term) renegade Broadcasters is this: Call Dr. Ruth with your personal problems. That's not what Broadcast is about.

Respectfully,
Sherry Ann Menton

Women Composers Concert Review

By Franklin Quincy Adams
Staff Writer

Kathleen Mills' concert last Friday night entitled A Century of American Composers, and honoring the centennial year of co-education at Washington College, was unfortunately only sparsely attended by the public. The fortunate ones who attended the concert got the pleasure of witnessing a true "showwoman" at her best. Kathy Mills captivated the audience in such a dramatic fashion that the comparison to a mid-70's Elvis concert would not be an exaggeration.

When she walked on the stage wearing a full length, jade gown custom tailored by her mother, the crowd was thrown back in their seats with amazement. Dr. Bennett Lamond, English Department Chairman, was quoted as saying, "Her mother made that dress! It's a great dress. I wish her mother would make something for me sometime."

Kathy Mills' evidenced misgivings as to whether, during her performance, she would be able to block out the vision of a dead cat seen that morning along the side of the road. On the contrary, she seemed perfectly at ease from the beginning of the concert. Indeed, Mills was more disturbed by the lack of patronage than by the recurring visions of roadside gore, but fortunately, she stated, the small "cult following" was an enthusiastic audience.

The second piece, "Variations on Balkan Themes, Op. 60" by Amy Cheney Beach was an especially difficult piece that seemed to be well conceived and well played. She said that she was especially proud of having performed "Variations," considering the difficulty in the ultra-chromatic piece, containing many variations — not to mention the epic twenty-three minute length.

After entertaining the crowd with a couple of ragtime pieces, she once again challenged the listeners with two relatively short but sophisticated pieces by Ruth Crawford Seeger entitled "Prelude No. 2" and "Piano Study in Mixed Accents." These pieces were the highlight of the evening. They were both well written and well performed pieces that would seem to contradict Arron Copland's infamous statement that women cannot compose good serious music because they cannot think analytically. Obviously, Copland had not researched the music of female composers adequately before commenting. Seeger's pieces were definitely on an equal level with the other experimental composers of the first half of the 20th-century, such as Henry Cowell, Carl Ruggles, and Charles Ives.

"Solitaire," the piece by Barbara Kolb was written for piano and a prerecorded tape accompaniment. However, it was unfortunately sabotaged by the notorious sound system in Tawes Theatre. The tape was playing fragments of a prelude by Chopin, which Ms. Mills was to accompany, but since the volume was set on 11, Ms. Mills' section was lost in the din. This mostly 20th-century concert was truly a rare format for not only our school, but for that matter, anywhere. Kathleen Mills' concert demonstrated that, in some cases, female composers have not received the respect that they deserve, especially in light of the fact that the majority of the compositions, each of them a professional and skilled piece, were never published.

LOVE/HATE

poetry reading

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

The second annual Love/Hate poetry reading, in preparation for St. Valentine's Day, will take place this Saturday night at 7:30 in the O'Neill Literary House. This will be an open reading, with plenty of traditional Lit House refreshments. Come with your friends, your loved ones, and a poem or story to read (it can be your own, or published, or both if you're flashy). Get in the mood for romance or revenge next week the old fashioned way (this is, after all, a writing school).

Until the End of the World: Why See It?

By Alexander Rowlett
Connoisseur and Bon Vivant

Why would you go? There are so many reasons: the title, the soundtrack, Solveig Dommartin, William Hurt. . . If you saw any of his other works, for example, "Paris, Texas" or "Wings of Desire," you would certainly go because of director/writer Wim Wenders. In a flash.

You might go because it's 1999 and there's a beautiful woman running wild through Europe. Some will go because there's a rogue nuclear satellite orbiting the earth. Others will go because they've never been to Australia.

Yet, many are going for one reason in particular: U2, R.E.M., Lou Reed, Talking Heads, Neneh Cherry. . . We went last Friday, in a culture van sponsored by the Writers' Union, partly for that reason, the music. In fact, some of us pretended we were about to see MTV's Top 20 Countdown, sans V-Jay and commercial interruptions. It was a subtle game of low expectations that proved unnecessary. We were blown away.

Wim Wenders rocks even without the music. His movies are visually arresting and compelling. They breath and pulsate. Through his eyes the world shakes and twists, often taking unexpected turns. Unlike many American films, with their formulaic storylines, his tend to throw you off balance. "Why did he do that?" you wonder. To imagine he is trying to take you anywhere in particular is a mistake.

Not that he isn't saying anything, but it is never any one thing and it is often beneath the surface. It is the art of storytelling that he possesses, rather than the craft of following form. His is a subjective vision of the art form, art as an end in itself. Wenders' method of compiling the music might serve to illustrate.

Rather than asking one artist to compose a work specifically for his film, or flipping through his record/CD collection and picking out his favorite suitable tracks, he wrote a few letters. He gave a brief outline of the film, but was careful to avoid specifics. He feared that the songs, in coinciding with the film too much, would serve as "commentary."

He is utterly successful in this. Lou Reed responded first with "What's Good," which is also on Lou's latest album. The moment the song enters the film, it fits. Yet, it doesn't seem to refer at all to what is taking place. It just feels right. And this is not just because it's a nice song and you're watching pretty pictures.

The movie begins and we are introduced to the main character, Claire, played by Solveig Dommartin. She's been waking up in some strange places, and the music she wakes up to, Talking Heads' "Sax and Violins," is a strange and silly song. What is Mr. Byrne trying to say about the year 1999?

Claire meets William Hurt's Trevor character, and we hear "The Adversary," by Crime and the City Solution. Again, the words and even the sound doesn't fit, but something feels right. It makes you dig what's going on even more.

It's a credit to his artistry that so many of the musicians Wenders wrote to responded to his request. They think he's special, too. U2 wrote, "Until the End of the World." Patti Smith came out of hiding and wrote, "It Takes Time." Elvis Costello performed Ray Davies' "Days." And CAN wrote their primeval "Last Night Sleep."

All the songs fit, but don't fit. We left the theater like catatonic pods, wondering what Wenders was really getting at. No wonder we ended up at "Chick and Ruth's" in Annapolis among a lot of drunks. "Why try to make sense out of art and life?" some of us even wondered as we drank 3 a.m. cups of coffee.

If it feels right, does it really need a name? Until the End of the World is certainly important and is still having its effect on us. It rocks from beginning to end, but don't expect it to be one long boring MTV Top 20 Countdown. If you do, the movie could really do some damage. It's that subtle and brilliant. Go early, stay late. And don't forget to stop at "Chick and Ruth's."

Former Ambassador to Speak

Sir Oliver Wright, a British career diplomat who has served as Ambassador to the United States, West Germany and Denmark as well as in the British Government's domestic and foreign offices, will visit Washington College for several days in February. Three public events are included in his schedule of class visits and lectures.

On Monday, February 10 at 7:30 p.m. the William James Forum presents Sir Oliver Wright discussing "The Soviet Union: Will the Revolution Go Backwards?" The lecture, which will be in the college's Hynson Lounge, will cover the movements of glasnost and perestroika leading to the recent breakup of the Soviet states, and will include a discussion of probable consequences of these changes regarding East-West relations, NATO and the new unified European community. Wright will bring to this discussion his extensive diplomatic experiences in Bonn, Copenhagen and Bucharest as well as his service as Deputy Under-Secretary for European Affairs for the British Foreign Office.

On Tuesday evening, February 11, Sir Oliver Wright will lecture on the European Community under the sponsorship of the Goldstein Program in Pubic Affairs. This lecture, scheduled for 8 p.m. in the Hynson Lounge, will focus on the European and British political and economic scene following the establishment of a single European market, an economic and monetary union and relaxed commercial flow between the European countries.

Also Tuesday, February 11, Sir Oliver will join his wife Marjory Wright, an actress who has performed with the Folger Shakespeare Theatre in Washington, D.C., for a reading of "Theatre Verse." This informal exploration of British theatrical verse will be held in the O'Neill Literary House at Washington College at 4:30 p.m. Lady Wright has performed in theatres in Horley, England, as well as in Bonn, Washington, D.C., Berlin and South Africa. She serves on the boards of the Folger Theatre and Arena Stage in Washington, and was the first recipient of the Folger's Distinguished Service Award in 1988.

All three events with Sir Oliver and Lady Wright are free of charge and open to the public. For more information about the schedule call Washington College at (410) 778-2800, ext. 402.

Annual Freshman Reading

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

Next Thursday, February 13, top students from the Freshman Creative Writing classes of Professors Day and Wagner will be reading selections from their work. The annual reading is a counterpart to the Senior Reading held in April, which highlights the leading graduating writers. Readers of poetry and fiction from the freshman writing class include Paul Briggs, Amy Brodie, Rebecca Bryant, Rachael Fink, Andrea Nolan, and Deirdre Swinden. After the Freshman Colloquy's success last semester, we should be in for an interesting reading. The public is welcome to attend; come to the O'Neill Literary House for the reading at 7:30; a reception will follow in the Lit House kitchen.

Washington College Billiards Contest Winners

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

On Tuesday, January 28, the new pool hall, Louie's Side Pocket, located next to Superfresh, held a billiards tournament. Although the competition was stiff and some games were close, three WAC students made it to the winners' circle. First place went to junior Biology major Brian Heubeck. The second place winner was Eric Markey, sophomore. and sophomore Ciaran O'Keeffe, also a sophomore, pulled a close third.

O'Keeffe has qualified to try his shot at the next level of competition, the ACY Regionals, to be held at College Park this weekend. Wish him luck!

Scott Read: Wimbledon Bound?

By Charlie Linehan and Chris Vaughn
Sports Editors

Prior to embarking on a trip to Australia on the twentieth of this month, Scott Read, former Washington College tennis star returned to his Alma Mater for a short visit.

On February 4, 1992, Scott granted us an interview in which he expounded on his plans to play in the Australian tournament, as well as on his career plans and his time at Washington College. Here is what Scott had to say:

ELM: What have you been doing since you graduated last Spring?

Scott Read: Well, first I went home and got a teaching job at an indoor club nearby. From the beginning of the summer until early January, I taught tennis about sixty-five hours a week—basically put the money in the bank, to save it, so I can go on the tour. I did a lot of teaching in the afternoons and nights and then, most of the early mornings I would go and play with the different touring pros around Houston and the surrounding areas and work out with my coach down there—

ELM: What's your coach's name?

SR: My coach's name is Adrian Bey. He's from April Sound. He actually was a professional level player. He made the semi-finals of the U.S. Open and Wimbledon when he was a player. He was ranked about eighth in the world in the late sixties—so he was a real good player. Anyway, I'm down here talking to Fred Wyman—everyone's favorite here at Washington College—about sponsoring me . . . I have one small advertising sponsor in Houston that's going to help me out also with some money, some finances over there, because it is an expensive thing to travel and play the circuit but, we'll see what happens.

ELM: As far as financing then, do you have to get your own equipment? You're not being sponsored by anyone in that regard right now, are you?

SR: Well actually, the Wilson representative and the Nike representative down in Houston are sending me rackets, shoes, clothes, strings and stuff—so actually, equipment-wise, I'm taken care of, basically, for awhile. I met a real nice guy down in Houston. When I was teaching there, I signed a contract with him . . . he was going to sponsor me and help me out with the equipment and stuff, so that's worked out pretty good.

ELM: For those of us who are unfamiliar with the world of tennis—could you fill us in on the details of the tour?

SR: Basically, when you start out on the tour, everyone starts out at the lowest level even if you're the top collegiate player or—if John McEnroe quit for a year, he would have to start out again at the lowest level. You have to accumulate a certain amount of points, ATP points and, based on the number of points you have is how high a tournament you can get into. They break it into three income brackets—100,000 dollars and over, 25,000 dollars to 100,000, 25,000 dollars and under. Everyone starts at the 25,000 dollars and under and you're there not to make money really, you're there to get points so you can move up into the next bracket. If you're in the top 200 in the world, you're making a good living—you're probably making close to six figures. If you're top 300, you're getting by and you're making money. If you're outside the top 300 you're in the red. You're making money yet you're putting out more for expenses. So, the whole object is, when I go to Australia I'll play a series of four tournaments in four different cities. What you try to do, you try to qualify just to get into the main draw. So you've got to get to the semis of one tournament just to get into the main draw of another tournament—and that's the one where you get points. Once you get in that tournament though, and win one round, you automatically get one ATP point. For instance, the number 150 guy in the world is a friend of mine, he played at University of Texas, his name is Steve Bryan—he's got about 300 points. The number 250 guy in the world has probably got about 30 or 40 points—so it drops off heavily after about 200. So basically, I'm going to Australia just to get points. It's my first satellite and people say it takes at least a year to get used to it and get on the circuit. It took this Steve Bryan, who won Division I National, a year of doing terrible before he even got a point. So, if I could come out of there with two or three points I would be really happy.

ELM: How many points do you need to move up?

SR: It depends on the tournament. If you play in a 50,000 dollar challenger, you'd probably have to have 4 ATP's just to get into the qualifier. If you play in a 25,000 dollar challenger, you could probably get in with one or two points. . . . The hardest thing to do is get your foot in the door because there's about 5,000 players out there all trying to get that first point. . . . once you get that point then you're automatically put in the main draw of all the rest of the satellites—then you just have to win one round and you get another point.

ELM: Were you selected for this tour or did you just decide that you wanted to enter the tour and try to get onto the big circuit?

SR: Basically, anybody can do the tour if they want to . . . they've paid their money and they can go on the tour. The reason I did it—two reasons. One is, I think it's a great opportunity to see the world, travel. The other reason is, I've got some guys that I know and have beaten—in fact, I was just looking at a magazine down there, one of the guys that got on the team, a guy named Tom Burrwell from U.C. Davis who I beat a year ago at Rolex Nationals. He's got 3 singles ATP points and 9 doubles ATP points, so he's making money—and I beat this guy in straight sets so, that gives me confidence . . . if this guy's doing well, I should be able to do pretty good too. That's the kind of stuff that gives you hope. But then again, there's a friend of mine who's playing, and he's a good player, and he's ranked 1130 in the world and he's got one ATP point so, it's tough. But, I chose on my own accord to go ahead and do it and I'm still working on trying to get a sponsor—a big sponsor, I've got one small one. Fred [Wyman] may help me out. . . . The killer costs are hotel and airfare. Food—the tournament helps you out. And a lot of tournaments you can get housed. Each tournament you go to there's a host family that you get to stay with—they feed you and take care of you—so that cuts down on great expense. Not all tournaments offer housing—Australia does, luckily . . . .

ELM: How would you describe your tennis experience at Washington College? Did it prepare you for what you might face on the tour?

SR: In high school tennis and in junior tennis I wasn't the player that I was in college. I got to college and I really developed as a player. A lot of that was due to a number of things. . . . The schedule we played at Washington College was very strong—we played a lot of Division I schools, a lot of Division II schools. We didn't play a lot of Division III schools . . . We always played Maryland and Richmond and—all the big Division I's—Villanova, all the local Division I schools. . . . You go to any school in the nation and they've got a good number one player . . . I never had an easy match hardly, except for the inner-conference matches. And that's one of the reasons I was considering transferring to a Division I school after my Sophomore year. But, because of the strong schedule and because of the exposure I got . . . I travelled the whole nation because I did so well in Division III—I think that I stayed there for that reason. . . . Another thing that was good about Washington College was the coaching atmosphere. He [Fred Wyman] let us practice as much as we wanted to. . . . A lot of schools don't let you do that—the big schools. He was a very good influence for us. He put a lot of extra money into the program, too, that got us a lot of extra things that we normally wouldn't have gotten. So, it [tennis at WC] definitely prepared me for it [the tour].

ELM: How far are you planning to go with tennis? Are you looking at tennis as a possible career?

SR: Basically, what I'm going to do is I'm going to play the circuit as long as I have money. . . . Peter Maller got the graduate assistant job at Florida State—he's the assistant coach and he's going to graduate school. And that's full tuition waiver, room and board paid for, plus a stipend of about five to six hundred a month. I put out 125 letters two weeks ago to all the different MBA schools . . . and I've gotten about thirty-five responses and some numbers so I'm going to go contact those coaches. . . . Depending on how those go and what kind of deal I can get—like there's one at the University of South Carolina. It's one of the best graduate business schools in the nation—excellent Division I team, they're ranked in the top 20 in Division I. If that comes through, I'll have to seriously weigh how I'm doing on the tour and make a decision based upon that because that's kind of a deal you can't really pass up. So, I'm definitely not going to teach tennis for the rest of my life—I taught and it's fun but I'm definitely going to go to graduate school as soon as the tennis is over.

ELM: Can you tell us about the effect that you think the absence of Coach Wyman will have on the Washington College tennis program?

SR: Well, this is a very touchy subject and I know that in about three days they're going to decide who the new coach is. The schedule—I've seen the schedule for this year and it's extremely weak compared to what we've played in the past. The team's not ranked—they have no national ranking. I'm good friends with all the guys—Alberto |Diaz|, Trevor |Hurd|, those guys. They're going to have a pretty good team. This year, they're going to suffer a great deal. Depending on who the coach turns out to be will determine how much they suffer in the future. I don't know a lot about the situation . . . I know that Tim Gray |former Washington College tennis player| is up for the job and I know he's a strong candidate. . . . There's another gentleman that used to coach at Cornell and he seems to be a pretty strong candidate. But, I think that Washington College Tennis—I don't think it will ever be as strong as it was, I really don't. Depending on how strong a recruiter—that's the most important thing, the recruiting—and Fred was such a strong recruiter. I think if Tim Gray gets the job, I think Fred will help him because Fred has a lot of ties. Then maybe we can get some recruiting back into here. I just don't see the program being nearly as strong as it was before—-and I'm not saying it just because I'm gone, I'm just saying it because I don't know what kind of commitment the Athletic Department wants to make to tennis. . . . What they've got to do this year is they've got to basically go undefeated. If they go undefeated—I'm talking about the men's team—if the men's team goes undefeated they will probably make nationals because they play Emory, who's ranked number 7 and they play Skidmore, who's ranked number 12. But if they lose to either one of those teams, they're not going to make it for the first time in I don't know how long. . . . They're good enough to make it—if they had a strong enough schedule, I think they could prove themselves. Now the women are also on the borderline of making nationals too, . . . I don't think their schedule is very strong either. I think that the '92/'93 season is definitely going to suffer because of what's happened here—obviously, it couldn't not suffer. I mean, they don't have a coach and we're already into the Spring of the season. They didn't play at Rolex. They missed out on all the Fall workouts. People were sitting out. . . . I just think it's unfortunate for the school itself as well as the tennis program and the people that play tennis because it's really tough on the team. . . . If I had to make a bet on it, I would say that Washington College tennis will never be the same.

See Scott Read, on pg. 14

Scott Read Interview

ELM: Okay—the big question: Do you think we might one day hear the name Scott Read in the same sentence as Wimbledon or French Open?

SR: Well, realistically . . . you never know. I was talking to my coach and he said he got out of college and he had 200 dollars to his name and he said, "Well, I'm going to go try the tour and see what happens." He got in his first tournament and he rolled over one, was ranked in the top 100 after about six months and then he was up to number eight in the world. It all depends on how strong mentally I am when I get out there. I know in college, one of my assets was that I was really tough mentally. I think I have the physical requirements—not necessarily to be number one in the world but I think I could break the top 100 or top 50 if . . . if . . . I put in the work that I need to and I get it together in my head. I think it's all mental. What more could I ask for than to play tennis for a living—that would be the greatest thing ever. I have dreams about it. . . . You know, I've got a certain amount of money that's sitting right here and it just gets smaller and smaller and smaller and once it gets too small, that'll do it. So, I'd like to do it, it would be great and I'm going to give it my best shot, but . . . . I think maybe in doubles there's a chance. I really feel strongly about my doubles play. . . .I've always been a good doubles player. The guys like Flach and Seguso—they're not any good in singles but they're tops in the world in doubles every year. Maybe I could do something like that. So, you never know. You never know what the future holds—it would be nice though.

The Team Nobody Wanted, But Now, Everybody Loves

The Washington College Women's Basketball team romped over Chesapeake College with a score of 72-12. This was the Shorewomen's last game of the season which boosted their record to 4-2 for the year. Although short in numbers, as only 6 team members played, the Shorewomen had no problem proving themselves. The team dominated in rebounds, allowing for several fast breaks. With their offensive power, there was just no stopping these Shorewomen.

The team certainly did shock most people. They started as 10 women wanting the chance to play intercollegiate basketball. Their wish was granted as they devised a 6 game schedule. Who would have thought these 10 women would end their season with a 4-2 record?

Leaving the team this year are seniors Kristy Hilgartner, Margaret Doyle, Miriam Dittman, and Claudia Baldwin. Although the team is losing several key players, there are many talented underclassmen to form a strong backbone for next year's team.

Sophomore point guard Pam Hendrickson and junior center Tina Lennon will lead the team in continuing it's winning tradition. Juniors Jen Sloan and Eleanor Shriver along with freshman Megan McCurdy will also contribute to next year's powerhouse.

A special thanks to coaches Judy Berry and Sue Brown for their constant support and encouragement throughout the season.

Way to go Shorewomen!!!

Meanwhile, back at the ranch... Spiderman and The Vaughnster have chosen a new member to join the select few that hold the honorable title of NEWT's Player of the Week. But first we must give credit where credit is due. You may know him affectionately as EMU or -ashburger but we just call him Doug. That's right, Doug Hoffberger was gracious enough to bless us with his creativity and allow us to use his idea of having Player of the Week Sponsered by Newt's. Thanks Doug, you're the kind of guy every girl wants to take home to meet mom... and you still can't play caps. Anyway, this week's selection is... The STAR of the women's B-Ball team, forward Margaret Doyle. Not only was she one of the leaders getting this program off the ground, but she led the squad in scoring with almost 18 points per game. Combined with her powerful inside game, Margaret was also proficient from the three point mark. An outstanding athlete all around, Margaret leaves the basketball court and walks right out onto the lacrosse field to start the Spring season. Congratulations Margaret and thanks for the killer articles!!!

Crew Rises Early

Day after day, as the temperature hovers around 30 degrees, the WC rowing team is hard at work preparing for the spring racing season. Hidden away in the boathouse, the athletes complete the grueling winter workouts with their hearts set on victory; each erg piece and weight circuit bringing them one step closer to the goals they have set for themselves.

The men's varsity team has maintained a solid number of rowers. Losing only one member, they have gained three strong stallions: Glenn Warner, Lance Mercereau, and Tim Stoltzfus. With captains Will Brandenburg and Matt Conaty leading them, the men's team is working to develop the strength that will be needed to dominate in the upcoming races.

Coach Davenport has changed the men's practice to afternoons and is training the rowers mentally as well as physically for racing. The men are working to intensify team unity and will be ready to hit the water in two weeks at the most.

Glenn Merry, the coach of the men's novice team, is enthusiastic about his team's progress. With dedicated members, the novice team exudes spirit. They are in a frenzy of excitement for the upcoming competitions. Doug Peterson was elected captain for the novice group and will represent his team in the Rowing Rules Committee.

The women's varsity find themselves in quite a different predicament. They have lost six rowers this semester and are now only comprised of seven rowers. However, they are very determined to overcome this setback. The remaining rowers have bonded together in order to make it through the intense winter training.

With senior Lisa Blume as captain, the women's team has set their goals on winning and winning big. The strength and desire of the rowers on the team has helped to pull them through the early morning practices. The team is concentrating on mental imaging as well as strength work and endurance.

Coach Peter Martin is looking forward to racing a 4 man and a 2 man during the spring season. With the addition of rowers Theresa Lurch and Conci Pope, the women's team will be ready to hit the water in roughly two weeks as well.

The women's novice team, also coached by Peter Martin, is off to a strong start. Down to 10 women from the initial 26, these dedicated racers are working to put together an 8 man or 4 man for the spring races. Mary Clay Thomas was elected as the women's novice team representative at the Rowing Rules Committee.

The Crew crew will be facing competitors such as Johns Hopkins, Lasalle, Skidmore, Georgetown, George Mason, and George Washington. Besides the regular season, the team has raised money to send the top boats to the SIRA's in Orland, Tennessee in mid April and they will also face some of the best rowing teams in the country at the Dad Vail Regatta following exams.

The men and women of Washington College Crew are ready to walk all over their competitors and take the season by storm!

B-Ball Hits Streak

By Melissa Harmeyer
Staff Writer

Congratulations are in order for men's basketball this week as they showed they are truly a team to be reckoned with. They pulled off 3 strong wins over Swarthmore, Haverford, and Ursinus to become contenders for the MAC playoffs and to gain second place in the MAC standings.

Their winning streak began in Collegeville, PA. last Tuesday with a 74-62 victory over Ursinus. With 14:18 left in the first half, Adam Poe sank 2 big free throws to give Washington the lead. At halftime the Shoremen were ahead by 7 and by the conclusion this lead almost doubled as WC went ahead to win by 12.

Tim Liddy was top scorer with 19 points followed closely by Lester with 14 and Basel with 12. Darren Vican emerged as the leading rebounder with 13.

The Shoremen then travelled to Swarthmore, PA. on Thursday, January 30 to lay waste to a scrappy Swarthmore team, 87-58. After a heart-breaking 78-77 loss to Swarthmore just five days previous to this re-match, the Shoremen really could taste the sweetness of this one. They took the lead minutes into the game with a 3 pointer by sophomore guard, Charles Cummings. Swarthmore lead only once throughout the trouncing as WC pulled ahead by 28 at the half. The Garnet's leading scorer, Scott Gibbons, was held to only 12 points, nine of which were in the second half. Washington held a lead of 26 points throughout the second half with the biggest lead at 80-47 with 6:46 left from a 3 point shot by freshman Jay Devlin.

The win also gave Coach Finnegan his 278th career game win to put him ahead of J. Thomas Kibler, who tallied 277 wins over his 26 coaching years from 1913-1939, as the winningest B-Ball coach ever at Washington College. He will be honored following the home match-up against Ursinus on February 15 so don't miss it!!

Two days later the streak was kept alive as the boys, excuse me, MEN, of WC travelled up to Haverford for a slightly tougher match then Swarthmore. Darren Vican had an incredible game with a season high of 26 points and 14 rebounds to contribute in the 75-69 win. With 14 minutes left in the first half, Allen Lester hammered a two pointer to put WC up for the remainder of the half. They held the lead thanks to Vican's 8 points in the first 5 minutes of the second half. However, the game stayed unnecessarily close as the Shoremen missed 10 free throws in the last 2:30 of the game. Yet WAC prevailed thanks to great games from Geoff Rupert, who had 16, and Allen Lester, who contributed 18.

Thursday the Shoremen began a streak of 3 home games facing Western Maryland, a non-conference match-up, and then confronting Haverford Wednesday and Ursinus next Saturday. Don't miss 'em!!!

NOTE: The game versus York, scheduled for February 8th, has been postponed, which will be announced at a later date.*

Lacrosse As The State Game?

By Chris Vaughn
Co-Sports Editor

That's right. Lacrosse could very well become the Maryland state GAME. Take note. I said game and not sport because, in the political world, there is a very big difference.

Just ask Janviere Thuman, the WC student working to push this bill into law. Interning under Delegate John Bishop from Baltimore County District nine, Janviere says, "Unsuccessfully, we have been trying to put Lacrosse in as the State Sport since 1967. However, Jousting is the State Sport and we don't want to end that. We just want Lacrosse to co-exist with Jousting, allowing them both the recognition they deserve."

She also stated, "Almost every major college and university in Maryland has a Lacrosse team and considering almost 1 million Marylanders have been involved with Lacrosse in one form or another it seems the only right thing to do."

Looking at the sport's financial aspect, it has offered quite a few things to the state. Baltimore's MILL team, The Thunder, and stores like STX, Bacharach Rasin, Ulman, and Lax World, which are Lacrosse specialty stores, are just a few things that stimulate our economy. And the 1989 NCAA Division I Championship, which was held at the University of Maryland, brought in close to three quarters of a million dollars. In addition, Lacrosse contributes to the monetary funds and activities of secondary schools and institutions of higher learning. Just look at Washington College.

Yet, for any of this to happen, the bill must pass through the Constitutional and Administrative Committee, a 21 member committee, which may not be an easy task.

If you would like to see this bill pass and want to aid Ms. Thuman in successfully completing her project, she can be reached at 778-9870 or by visiting Caroline 304. Any support would be greatly appreciated.

Jason Ronstadt wisks by a defender in the open court. Jason is a freshman from Dover, MA. who shines in the point guard position. He leads the team's free throw average with an astounding 87.5% and has an unheard of 50% average from the three point line. Says Coach Finnegan, " We're really pleased that Jason is developing into a college guard that will be able to play at either the point or the two-guard position. Clint Baer Explains Reasons Behind Mail Delays

Editor-in-Chief

WC students, accustomed to receiving their mail at 11:30 a.m., anxiously pace outside the locked mailroom, located in the Casey Academic Center. However, with recent changes in mail service at Washington College, students, as well as faculty, staff, and administrative offices, must now wait at least an additional hour for their mail, usually sometime between 12:30 and 1 p.m. This delay is a direct result of a reevaluation of the Maintenance Department by the Office of Planning and Special Projects, as well as the appointment of a new postmaster in Chestertown. Since the mid-1970's, WC Maintenance has picked up the college's mail at the town post office and delivered it to Central Services by 9:30 a.m. After the construction of the Casey Center, maintenance workers have delivered student mail directly to the new mailroom. Under the new system, in place since February 3, the post office now delivers the mail to Central Services on their route, usually around 11 a.m.

In an ELM interview on Feb. 12, Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, stated the old system was "reasonable, but tied up one maintenance employee for most of the day." For the past few years, Baer's department has been in the process of evaluating every position in Maintenance to "achieve the greatest amount of efficiency and to control costs." According to Baer, the recent adjustment in the mail system reflect both those goals.

For the past several months, Baer has actively worked with Bill Kimble, new Postmaster of the Chestertown Post Office. A main topic of concern at these meetings was the handling of the college's mail.

"Basically, one of our staff members was doing a job the post office is paid to do," said Baer. "The new postmaster agreed with this, and has worked with us in initiating the new system. This allows us to reassign the maintenance worker from mail pickup to groundskeeping, an area requiring increased workers with all the improvements we've made in the past few years" he added. "It seems logical the Post Office should be involved in the college's mailing, not maintenance."

Baer also stated there has been a conscious down-sizing of Maintenance over the past few years. "We were once as high as 56 workers, and now we are down to 48," Baer said. "The department has been made more efficient and effective," he added. "They are doing a better job now then a few years back."

Other plans for the new mailing system include the relocation of the mailbox by the Reid and Caroline dormitories to behind Smith Hall. The Chestertown Post Office will also install a stamp machine and a mail slot in the mailroom this Spring, allowing students to purchase stamps and mail them without leaving the mailroom.

"We're trying to make this transition [in the mail system] as smooth as possible. Things should smooth out in the next few weeks," Baer stated. "I encourage feedback from people who have problems with this new system," adding, "We are working directly with the post office to fix these problems."

TUTORING PROGRAM BENEFITS WC AND KENT COUNTY STUDENTS

By Doug Smith
Staff Writer

For two hours a day, twice a week, the Casey Academic Center is overrun by hordes of elementary and intermediate school children. You might have seen them playing football on the firelane with the guy who lives across the hall, or wandering through the library with the girl in your philosophy class. Washington College students have started a tutoring program in conjunction with Garnett Elementary and Chestertown Middle Schools, and it is already taking off.

The project is the brainchild of Stephany Slaughter, a sophomore currently spending a semester abroad, and junior Jen Del Nero. "We volunteered to work with the students at the elementary and intermediate schools," said Del Nero, "but we decided that the students needed more than an hour a week." Slaughter set to work, soon coming up with an extracurricular program that provided more tutoring hours as well as using the college student body as a pool to draw more tutors from. She also recruited sophomore Maria Jerardi to help, and to manage the program with Del Nero in her ab-

Tulip Poplar to Replace the Elm Tree

By Sabrina Kenny
Staff Writer

A tulip poplar and three to five Washington hollies will be planted in front of East Hall to replace the Elm, a victim of Dutch Elm disease this past summer. Donated as a gift from the Mount Vernon Ladies Association, the trees will be transported from George Washington's Virginia estate this weekend, February 14 or 15.

Last Thursday, February 6, Neil Horstman, the resident director, and Dean Norton, the horticulturalist at Mount Vernon met with a committee comprised of Dean McIntire, Gene Hessey, Professor Cades, SGA President Kevin Kelly, Dean Taylor, Reid Raudenbush, Karen Price and other college officials to discuss the possible acquisition and siting of the new trees. Rather than planting the trees in the same spot as the old elm, a new site was chosen allowing better visibility of the Hill dorms and George Washington's statue, while opening a clearer area near the flagpole. The tulip poplar, a fast growing tree which reaches great heights, will be placed in front of East Hall. The Washington hollies will be dispersed behind the brick border surrounding the kissing rock.

Both breeds of trees, unlike the red elm, are indigenous to the Mid-Atlantic region. They are not easily susceptible to disease, and have a greater storm resistance than elm trees. George Washington also had a preference for both the tulip poplar and the Washington holly. Having made notations in his journal, Washington removed two tulip poplars from the Washington College property and replanted them at Mount Vernon. The hollies are a special breed of American holly named after Washington.

The trees and transportation are a gift from the Mount Vernon Estate. Washington College made a small investment to prepare the ground. President Trout asked Jeannie Baliles (Class of '62), the former first lady of Virginia, and member of the Visiting Committee, which is an advisory capacity to the president, to intercede on behalf of the college. The gift was made possible as a direct result of her support.

The trees will be dedicated to the memory of Washington following Convocation on Saturday, February 22.

Editorial

Volume 62, Number 17

(A Brief Segment of Exposition Concerning a Particular Aspect [Area of Interest] of Campus Life That Does Not Necessarily Reflect the Opinions of the Washington College ELM, but that of its Editor)

Something about Valentine's Day brings out the worst in mail-related troubles here at Washington College. Last year at this time, the mailroom was moved from its more logical position adjacent to Central Services to its present location in the CAC (logic? Casey building? I don't think so). This year, delays in the mail service......inciting angered students to take-up arms and burn the CAC down to its hollow-columned foundation. What's in store next year? Betty Ann and Tommy shooting the mail down the firelane with a leafblower? Five years from now students won't even have access to their mail anymore. Just these little notes from the postmaster saying, "tell your grandmother she spelled encroachment wrong."

Which brings me to the key word of this editorial: CONSPIRACY (my apologies to Doug Smith). We here at the ELM are just getting used to to being named after a dead tree. I'm thinking thick, sturdy roots, trunk branching out, leaves offering shade and solice to all its visitors. The whole metaphor there involving a small liberal arts institution. The history. The ambiance. The tuition hikes. It's kind of romantic, you know? So what do they do to me? They go out and get another tree! A tulip poplar. Tulip poplar? What the hell am I supposed to do with that? The Washington College Tulip Poplar? I'd get laughed out of every college newspaper office this side of the UC-Santa Cruz Banana Slug. I'd get letters addressed to the paper with little notes tacked on saying things like, "this isn't the real name of your paper, is it?" It's hard enough creating a banner for a nonexistent tree (hence the neo-Naziesque Osprey and this issue's festive little cherub), but what are we supposed to do with the Tulip Poplar? Have Matt draw some really cool Dutch-guy holding a bouquet of tulips?

First I was going to leave the name as is. Figured I caused such a stink already, I might as well keep it. We'd be a throwback, in order with an established tradition. Then I read Sabrina's article and find old George never even liked elm trees! Had such a fixation for the tulip poplar that he "borrowed" two from WC for his Mount Vernon estate. Does anyone see a conflict of interest in there somewhere? We name our college after a guy who cut down a cherry tree and then stole some tulip poplars from our own campus? Father of our country - Tree thief. Was the Elm originally planted to thwart all earnest efforts at improved journalism on campus? And what's Sandy Sandison's role in this whole scheme? All these questions remain unanswered, including what we're going to call the newspaper next week.

Until then, I leave you with these parting words of Valentine's Day glee: Editors make the best lovers, just not on Wednesday nights.

New Teacher Evaluation Form Criticized

Dear Editor:

Regarding the recently adopted changes to the teacher evaluation form, and the lack of student input into the process.

The evaluation form that each student fills out at the end of every semester's classes is the most important tool that the student body has for effecting any sort of change upon the faculty. When a teacher is considered for tenure or dean appointments, these forms are weighed very heavily by the selection committee. These forms also can influence changes in a professor's teaching style or in a course's curriculum. Thus the evaluation form is a vital facet of the student's ability to direct and shape his or her own education.

Recently, the faculty of Washington College adopted several changes to the old teacher evaluation form. These changes had been developed and considered over a period of six years. In that time no student had any input whatsoever in the process. It is imperative that the student representative body be provided the opportunity to review the new forms and make suggestions.

The major changes are:

1. Essay questions replace the short answer questions
2. The addition of questions asking the student's major, year and reason for taking the course
3. a copy of the original will be

Clint Baer Responds to Handicapped Access Letter

To the Editor:

The thoughtful letter from Jen Del Nero, Troy Petenbrink, and John Phoebus regarding handicapped access is well stated. However, Washington College is aware of its responsibility to the handicapped and has made considerable progress in making the campus accessible achieving compliance with the American Disabilities Act of 1991. Over the past few years, each building renovation has included handicapped access through ramps and/or elevators. Bathroom facilities, drinking fountains and doorways are modified for handicapped use. In addition, as part of the campus "masterplans" handicapped parking and curbcuts have been provided to eliminate obstacles.

Planning is now underway to renovate William Smith Hall. One of the primary focal points for that renovation is to

Security Director Clarifies Neighborhood Article

To the Editor:

I would like to take this opportunity to clarify some of the information Martha Kimura reported on the front page article of the ELM titled "Neighborhood Association Discusses Off-campus Students." Martha stated in this article "the Kent County Police Department has a book containing the names, addresses and phone numbers of every off-campus student as well as the phone numbers of their parents. This book was compiled by Jerry Roderick of the Security Department in order to insure the safety of off-campus students." She then quotes Chief Bradley as saying "The ones (college students) he knows are trouble people, he lets me know... The college has been very, very cooperative."

Floating Boats Adrift in the "Sea" - House

The Boston-based band Floating Boats will be playing this Saturday night in the Coffee House from 9:30 -1:00. The party is sponsored by the CIA/SGA, and admission is free.

The Boats have been playing at colleges and clubs from New England to Nassau since 1988, and have even opened up for such big groups as the Del Fuegos, Katrina and the Waves, Flock of Seagulls, the Guess Who, and the Alarm. They've released one album, Shack with a Satellite, and are working on their second album right now.

The Caribbean sound of Floating Boats is mixed with a little ska, a little heavy rock, and even some calypso and 1940's swing. Even though some of their songs deal with the heavy topics of drugs, poverty, and racial harmony, all of their music is danceable and packed with high energy. It promises to be a wild and wacky night. Attendance is mandatory.

1,500 Books, Including Sophie Kerr Collection, Donated to Miller Library

Mary Elizabeth Taylor, of New York City, has donated to Washington College more than 1,500 books and albums from her collection of her late husband, Davidson Taylor, and that of the late fiction writer Sophie Kerr, an Eastern Shore native who lived most of her life in New York City.

Mrs. Taylor, 85, was a distinguished newspaperwoman with the Associated Press in New York and with the Courier-Journal in Louisville, Kentucky. She also wrote fiction with the encouragement of her long-time friend Sophie Kerr. Mrs. Taylor, co-executor of Ms. Kerr's estate along with New York attorney Ferdinand J. Wolf, inherited Ms. Kerr's personal property and her literary rights. Mrs. Taylor's late husband, Davidson Taylor, was a broadcasting executive and the first Dean of Columbia University's School of the Arts.

Washington College, the nation's tenth oldest chartered college, is renowned for the Sophie Kerr Prize, the largest undergraduate literary prize in the country. Worth approximately $25,000, it is awarded each year to one graduating senior who shows promise as a writer.

The College already owns a large collection from Sophie Kerr's library; this most recent gift consists of the last of her books and a collection of personal memorabilia.

"There are leatherette bound editions of the books she wrote, many books from her personal library, and five of her plays," says Washington College's Librarian William Tubbs. "Also of note is Sophie Kerr's scrapbook with notes in her hand and letters written to her."

Among the books donated to Washington College from the Taylor library are a set of books written under the Federal Writers' Project in the 1930s, a good collection of early editions of 20th century American authors, and several museum catalogs on 20th century art. Of particular historic value is a two-volume set on entymology, published in 1749, in which the illustrations are hand-colored, says Tubbs.

The Taylor gift also included more than 300 recordings, musical scores, antique children's books, and part of Sophie Kerr's collection of cookbooks and cat books.

Mrs. Taylor also provided Washington College with several items on indefinite loan, including her husband's radio broadcast of the Allied landings on the western coast of France during World War II. At the time he was chief of radio for William S. Paley's psychological warfare division of Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower's Allied command in Europe.

Proper Form for Student Mail

A recent memo by Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, provides suggestions for students on the proper form for their address here at Washington College. The correct method is:

Washington College
Name
Your College Box Number
300 Washington Ave.
Chestertown, MD 21620-1197

You are asked to notify your friends, etc. of the proper address. The Postmaster guarantees that using the accurate address and the complete 9-digit zip code will speed up mail delivery.

Valuable Educational Equipment Stolen from Dunning

By John Griep
News Editor

A Pioneer Laser Disk Player and a Macintosh SE computer, worth a combined total of $2400, were stolen from Room 113 of Dunning Hall sometime between 2:30 p.m. on Wednesday, February 5 and 11:30 a.m. on Thursday, February 6. This equipment is used by the Biology, Chemistry, and Psychology Departments in academic presentations. The laser disk player was connected to the computer and a television set. Information from a laser disk can be displayed on the monitor of the computer and on the TV simultaneously in order for the class to observe the instructor's visuals.

Washington College Security Director Jerry Roderick remarked, "These are very valuable academic tools for those departments. They will be difficult to replace due to current budgetary restraints. Ultimately, the students in those classes will be the ones that will suffer the most as the result of someone's greed." Another laser disk on campus is being temporarily used in place of the one that was stolen.

Dr. Michael Kerchner of the Psychology Department was the last person to see the equipment in Dunning 113. Dr. Kerchner told Sergeant Lenny Thompson, the investigating officer in the case, that he observed the cart of equipment on Wednesday afternoon. Dr. Rosemary Ford of the Biology Department discovered the theft on Thursday when she went to obtain the equipment for a class. Sergeant Thompson also reported that the Chestertown Police Department has been notified of the theft and is assisting with the investigation.

Anyone who may have observed a person, or persons, in Dunning 113 between the hours mentioned above on the 5th and the 6th is asked to contact the Washington College Security Department at 778-2800 (ext. 310) or 778-2835. Anonymous phone calls will be accepted.

Mixed Reaction to 'Beyond the Shadow of a Trout' Debut

By Sabrina Kenn y
Staff Killer Writer

The premiere of the SGA funded "Beyond the Shadow of a Trout" received mixed reactions upon its release this week. The new student publication is a satirical/humor-oriented broadside which claims it will print "essays, cartoons, jokes, or anything humorous, satirical and/or controversial." On Monday, February 10, the first issue, a crossword puzzle focused on campus history and the Washington College community, appeared with a cover of a cut-out finger puppet of President Trout.

The first issue of "Beyond the Shadow of a Trout" met with both congratulatory praise and disapproval. President Trout responded, "As my friend Dr. Ed Weissman has put it, if 'Beyond the Shadow of a Trout' were a musical on its pre-Broadway run, it would have bombed in New Haven. On the other hand, there is no accounting for taste, and I know that students had great fun with the puzzle, some of which I, too, found amusing. So did my cocker spaniel: Barley wants Tanya Allen to know he was honored to be '98 DOWN.'"

President Trout then suggested, "I wish she would drop the cover. Fish jokes...I'm into it. It doesn't phase me in the least. I give out fish memorabilia, fish Christmas cards. It doesn't bother me in the least. On the other hand, the notion of a finger puppet. Come on. It doesn't bother me personally, but on behalf of the office of the president, that's another matter. I think that it diminishes all of us." He continued, "I'm all for people learning about the history of the college and its present. A small school encourages that. It produces a sense of community. But, the cover makes me wonder what is coming. And I think the SGA would wonder what is coming."

The SGA allocated $100 to the publication of "Beyond the Shadow of a Trout." Brian Gimelson, SGA Treasurer, said, "When Tanya applied for funding, she said she wanted to induce school spirit and by drawing on so many questions of school history and little tidbits of trivia, she's done that." Gimelson added, "She's not taking personal pokes and that is clever, because it shows how life shouldn't be taken seriously all of the time. I'm sure she'll handle her new gained stature responsibly." A recent SGA senatorial opinion poll almost unanimously approved the publication of the broadside.

After the features section of the ELM, which included "Josephine the Fly," was cut this semester, Tanya Allen decided to create another outlet based upon objectives similar to YAWP (the broadside of Young Aggressive Writers and Poets). These objectives are an outlet for humor, and to amuse and unify the campus through controversial and exciting topics which many would want to read.

When planning the introduction of the broadside Allen said, "I was making finger puppets for Christmas. I thought it was funny. I didn't mean to horribly offend. We want to do controversial things, but not to the point where we get sued. He just has an excellent name. Come on."

Upon hearing the reactions of the broadside's debut, Allen responded, "I was very happy, very amused at the amount of feedback. I just want to make sure that we can follow up with future issues that would be equally accepted, that we can keep up what we started. At this phase, it's a very day by day thing. We're not sure what direction it's going to take. We're trying out things and seeing the reaction. We've been getting a lot of really good suggestions. We need submissions. We guarantee anonymity and we would like the student body to help out, because it is their paper."

President Trout added, "I think tasteful humor and satire, if well done, can be an asset."

Central Services Questions Changes in Mail Service

By Patrick Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

Although students have been moderately inconvenienced by the recent changes in the college mail system, perhaps even more affected by these changes are the employees of Washington College's Central Services. This department, located in the basement of Smith Hall, employs four full-time employees, and several part-time students, responsible for collecting, sorting, and delivering the college's mail.

"The Post Office brings the mail to us at their convenience," stated Tommy Shreck, Director of Central Services. "This is anywhere between 9:30 and 11 am," he added.

When asked how this new system affects his department's handling of the mail, Shreck replied, "It has changed the operations. We're used to students working at a certain time. We can't now depend on the mail being here at a certain time, so the student workers come, there's no mail for them, and then they leave for class."

"When I hired them [the student workers]," Shreck added, "I hired them for a certain time [9:30-11:00 am]. I don't want to hire all new students. I'll try to work around their schedules."

One such student worker is Senior Michelle Beattie, an employee in Central Services for the past two years. "Students are in an uproar about getting their mail so late," she stated. "They want to know why this is happening. Many of them are blaming Central Services."

Beattie said her schedule does not conflict with the new system, but other student worker's schedules do. When asked about the possibility of hiring new workers, Beattie replied, "It's a really bad time to get workers because it's lunchtime. Most people don't realize how big a job it would be to train new workers." She added that the addition of new workers "will only add to the length of time involved in getting the mail ready. They wouldn't be familiar with the routine."

One of the chief problems Beattie cites with the new mail system involves the location of the mail's delivery. "Maintenance used to deliver student mail right to the mailroom, where it was sorted," she said. "The Post Office drops the mail off in Central Services where it must be pre-sorted before reaching the mailroom."

When asked if she will leave her position in Central Services, Beattie replied, "It's hard to find a job on campus."

Clint Baer agrees the student worker situation is a problem, stating that once the new system has been implemented, Central Services may well have to hire new workers. "I am confident we can work with the students to find them gainful employment elsewhere if necessary," Baer said.

"It's a hardship which we are managing," Shreck stated. "We just have to work around what time the mail comes in, and the student's schedules," he added. "Hopefully things will improve."

SGA Report

With John Griep

The Washington College Student Government Association met this past Tuesday evening, February 11th, in the Casey Academic Center Forum. Several important topics were discussed in the course of the one hour long meeting. They include:

Evaluation Forms Devised Without Student Input

The Student Academic Council discussed the revised teacher evaluation forms which were approved by the faculty at their last meeting. According to SGA Vice-President John Kelly, there wasn't any student input into the new form during the six-year period in which it has been worked on. The ELM obtained a copy of the form and has reprinted it below. Anyone with concerns about the revised form should discuss it with their dorm senator. After receiving input from their constituents, the Senate will discuss further action at the next meeting.

New Evaluation Form:

Student Reactions to Courses and Instructors

Your answers will be read by the instructor, the chair of the department, and the members of the Committee on Appointments and Tenure. The responses will assist the instructor in improving his or her performance and are also one of several factors weighed in decisions about tenure and promotion. You may take up to twenty minutes to complete the form.

1. Please provide the following information by circling responses:
   Your class: Freshman Sophomore Junior Senior Other
   Your reason for taking course: Elective Major/Minor
   Distribution Other requirement
   Your estimated final grade in this course:
   A A/B B B/C C C/D D D/F F Don't know
   Your initial attitude toward the course:
   Highly positive Positive Neutral Negative Highly negative

Please write a paragraph in answer to questions 2 and 3:

2. What is your overall assessment of this course?
3. What specific comments do you have about the teaching of the course? (For example, what aspects of the teaching of the course should be kept the same, and what aspects might benefit from a change of presentation?)

The back of the form will contain 11 characteristics to which a student is asked to circle a response from 5 (Excellent) to 1 (Poor) or NA (Not Applicable), as well as an area in which to amplify any of those responses.

Sparky, Gimbo to Speak to Board of Visitors & Governors

SGA President Kevin "Sparky" Kelly and Treasurer Brian Gimelson will present a report on the suggested student activity fee increase to the Student Affairs Committee of the Board of Visitors and Governors at their meeting on February 22nd. If approved by the Student Affairs Committee, the proposal will then go the Finance Committee for a final decision.

WC Students Tutor Local Kids

sence.

The program targets second- to seventh- graders, especially those identified as "problem" kids, a term that runs from children from broken homes to recent immigrants struggling to learn English. Del Nero and Jerardi believe that by targeting these children as early as possible, they can instill a greater desire in the students towards education; hopefully, their interaction with WC students will spur many of them to pursue a post-secondary education.

Stephanie Sall is a sophomore tutor who is particularly enthusiastic about her work. "I like it. It gives me a chance to share my knowledge, and to apply my education productively." She also enjoys her relationship with her student. "She's like the little sister I never had." Her favorite thing about her work is "seeing her smiling face when she learns something."

Jerardi and Del Nero, in implementing their tutor program, have been careful to steer clear of the typical pitfalls that can besiege an endeavor of this nature. Tutors were carefully matched with the students according to their respective skills and needs, and a degree of consistency is maintained by the same groups of tutors and students meeting each week, in addition to creating an effect similar to that achieved by Big Brother/ Sister programs across the country."We've got a lot of freshmen involved, and we're hoping they will stay with it and provide the project with some kind of longevity," Del Nero remarked, adding, "This is the first program of its kind between the college and the community. We'd like to help promote better town-and-gown relations. And we're also making good use of the CAC building."

WASHINGTON POST OMBUDSMAN JOINS WC FACULTY:

EXPANDS CURRICULUM, OFFERS EXPERIENCE TO CAMPUS JOURNALISTS

By Amanda Burt
Staff Writer

Richard Harwood, Ombudsman, or internal critic, and columnist for The Washington Post, brings his journalistic expertise to Washington College this Spring in the form of a new American Studies course, aptly titled, "The American Journalist." The course, designed to follow the development of journalism as a vocation in the United States, will highlight the economic, social and political circumstances that contributed to the evolution of the American newspaper.

Throughout the past five years, Harwood has been involved with WC's own newspaper, the ELM. He was responsible for bringing distinguished editors and photographers from the Post to the college to participate in small journalism workshops with the students. "They were interesting bull sessions," he says, "but some felt as if they weren't useful in terms of putting out the ELM. Writing an article is an abstract subject to discuss, and in terms of meeting the practical needs of the ELM, the sessions didn't work."

Although there has been little interest in the workshops for the past two years, President Trout, Professor Robert Day and other administrative officials recognized that journalism and media, in the institutional sense, are significant forces in our society. Since Washington College has no specific curriculum involving journalism, they decided it would be beneficial to implement "The American Journalist", a course Harwood had taught before at the University of Maryland.

"I like teaching, although I have not done much of it," says Harwood, "and I have always enjoyed young people." He admits that he is unsure of how to teach and claims he is still inventing the course. "I am still putting materials together, and I like the research involved. But it's hard work," he says.

Harwood's introduction to journalism came about almost by accident in the 1940s. A member of the Marine Corps during World War II, Harwood discussed his future plans with a friend on their return home from Japan. They both agreed there was a large demand for electrical appliances, previously unavailable during the War, and determined there would be a corresponding need for people who were able to fix these appliances. Harwood arrived home in Nashville and began working as an apprentice electrician, but his friend started working at a sawmill.

When Harwood learned of the G.I. Bill of Rights, which entitled him to receive tuition for college from the government, he began taking night courses and was introduced by a classmate to the Managing Editor of a local newspaper, The Nashville Tennesean. "He told me that he would try me out for a week as a reporter, and I've been in journalism ever since," Harwood says.

His first assignment involved covering a "bacchanalian feast," which was actually a DuPont company picnic in Tennessee. He laughs about that article now and says that the humorous phrases he used then were a result of reading "too much flowery literature." Future stories would be more succinct. When General McArthur was fired after the Korean War and returned to Nashville to visit relatives, Harwood reported the story. He feels that his career as a journalist was fascinating and enabled him to be a privileged spectator to history. "I have covered every Presidential campaign since 1952. I used to walk with Truman. He would be able to walk through the middle of town without fifty secret service agents surrounding him."

Harwood cites the Sixties as an exciting time to be a reporter, a period when he covered the Vietnam War, Martin Luther King's assassination, urban riots and the huge anti-war demonstrations in the United States. He was also very close to Robert Kennedy and was with him when he was killed. "If Kennedy had been elected, I'm sure our friendship would have continued," he notes.

Harwood's involvement with editing began in 1969. He was the National Editor and Assistant Managing Editor for The Washington Post before moving to New Jersey in 1974 to be the Editor for The Trenton Times, a Post subsidiary. He returned to the Post as Deputy Managing Editor in 1976 and remained in the position for twelve years. During that time, he was able to travel and cover special assignments, which included civil wars in Nicaragua, Angola, Rhodesia, El Salvador and Lebanon. He also had general correspondence from areas in the Soviet Union, South Africa, Asia and the Middle East.

Harwood remains sensitive to third-world countries and admits that the creation of democratic institutions may not be appropriate for those societies. "It is difficult to impose or help create in different cultures a replica of the United States," he says. "It isn't as easy as putting up a McDonald's joint."

In 1988, Harwood became Ombudsman and columnist for the Post, and his articles are published every Sunday in the Outlook section. He has written for several national magazines and has co-authored and contributed to a number of books, including "Lyndon," a biographical essay on the late President Lyndon B. Johnson; "Of the Press, By the Press, For the Press (And Others, Too)," a collection of essays on journalism; and "Fall of a President," the story of the ill-fated Jonestown colony; "The Wounded Generation: America After Vietnam," "The Pursuit of the Presidency: 1980;" and "Unfinished Journey" and "That Shining Hour," essays on the life of Robert Kennedy. He also co-wrote (with Bob Woodward) "Under Siege," an original screen play for NBC.

Harwood was appointed a Nieman Fellow at Harvard University in 1955 and was the first Carnegie Fellow in Journalism at Columbia University in 1965. He has also won many journalistic awards, including two Sigma Delta Chi medals and the George Polk Award for national reporting, and a second Polk award criticism.

Besides his "American Journalist" course, Harwood also lends his experience to the current ELM staff, offering criticism and suggestions concerning the paper's content and layout on a weekly basis. We at the ELM welcome him to Washington College. His presence is a significant step in the college's new dedication to improved journalism on campus.

the Chestertown Police Department, concerning these quotes. He informed me that the information reported does not reflect what he said. Chief Bradley did, indeed, speak of a book which has names and addresses of Washington College students during this meeting. However, I must assure you, I did not compile this information. The book he was referring to is more commonly known as the Washington College Campus Telephone Directory 1991-1992.

The other point noted in the article refers to my identifying "trouble" students for Chief Bradley. Chief Bradley said the quote was not accurate. He advised he was informing the Association that when problems arise with students at these off-campus locations, he and I will share information in an effort to resolve the complaints. Chief Bradley does forward all reports of student criminal activity to my office as required by the Federal Campus Security Act. I assure you, I do not single out students that may be potential troublemakers for the local police. You are citizens and, therefore, are entitled to the same rights that I live by and am sworn to protect.

make our major classroom building accessible on every floor. This issue had been a concern for a number of years and we continue to work toward that goal. The Hodson Hall Student Center renovation will also make the entire building accessible and will eliminate the temporary ramp that does not provide equal access. At the same time, it is unrealistic - and in some cases - impossible to make every building accessible. The College does provide dormitory facilities which are accessible to the handicapped. Finally, we will soon have a campus directory which identifies handicapped facilities on campus.

I am happy to answer any questions anyone might have regarding this issue.

ELM Interview: Neighborhood Association President, Betty Ann Connolley

By Martha Kimura
Staff Writer

The Old Chestertown Neighborhood Association is an organization dedicated to community improvement. The organization is particularly concerned with the relationship between local residents and off-campus students.

The ELM spoke with the founder and president of the Old Chestertown Neighborhood Association, Betty Ann Connolley, on Tuesday, February 4, 1992, to discuss the formation of the organization and its functions within the community. Connolley is employed as a clerk in the office of Central Services at the college.

ELM: How did the Old Neighborhood Association start?

BC: In the spring of '91, I had a lot of neighbors that were being awakened at night by a lot of noise and drug trafficking. The neighbors got together and discussed that every Friday and Saturday night, they would get no sleep because of the noise from the parties. Then we discussed the insecure feeling you get just walking down the street because of the open-air drug traffic. With that in mind, we organized and looked into the problems. Fortunately, there was a raid, a joint effort between the police department, the drug task force, and the SWAT team. Things have been getting better, though. Then the people across town said they had problems in their neighborhood with loud parties and they were afraid to do anything about it in case the college students would be mean and angry with the neighbors. Then we all organized ourselves to see what we could do to solve the problems.

ELM: The Old Chestertown Neighborhood Association is sponsoring a Neighborhood Watch program. Is there a lot of participation from the people of Chestertown?

BC: Yes, I was really pleased with the amount of people who are very interested in this Neighborhood Watch program. I'm looking to have a meeting soon of all the Block Captains and to try to get someone from out of Chestertown that has a watch program so that we can learn from others to help our watch program be more effective.

ELM: About the Block Captains, how would an off-campus student find out who his or her Block Captain is?

BC: The intention is that in each block, the Block Captain will find out who his neighbors are and will contact each and every one of them. He would then ask them to fill out a form with their phone number, address, and how many people live in their house. This way, the residents will get to know their Block Captains and if there is anything going on in the neighborhood that they feel is necessary to report, they can contact their Block Captains. The idea around the Block Captains is to protect the neighbors from crime and then also to free up some of the police lines. There is a certain communication that goes through the Block Captain. We are thinking that if we let them (the police) know who the Block Captains are, when their number shows up when they are calling, the police know that it is the Neighborhood Watch.

ELM: What made you personally get involved?

BC: I have two young daughters, a nineteen year old and a twenty year old, and I know that a lot of times, especially with my one daughter, part of living is partying and having a good time. I think that you have to get a well rounded idea of what is going on in the neighborhood and then try to solve problems and find answers that would suit everyone as nearly as possible. That is what we are all about. We are about solving problems that the neighborhood is having regardless of what the problem is. We are about knowing who to contact about for help, finding out what we can do about the problems, and then solving them.

Elbow to Speak

Next Thursday, author and professor Peter Elbow will speak about writing and reacting to writing. His lecture, entitled "Ranking, Judging, and Liking: An Exploration of Three Responses to Student Work," follows a career of writing about writing.

Elbow is a professor of English at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. He has taught at M.I.T., Franconia College, Evergreen State College, and SUNY Stony Brook, where he directed the Writing Program for five years.

Elbow's new book, What is English?, explores the profession of English, and is put out by MLA and NCTE. He is also the author of such books as Writing Without Teachers; Writing With Power: Techniques for Mastering the Writing Process; Embracing Contraries: Explorations of Learning and Teaching; A Community af Writers (with Pat Belanoff); and a book on Chaucer, Oppositions in Chaucer.

The lecture, sponsored by the Writing Program and Writing Committee of Washington College, will take place February 20, at 7:30 p.m., in Hynson Lounge.

Sir Oliver Wright Speaks

Theatre Verse: An American Premiere

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

Last Tuesday in the O'Neill Literary House, a premiere performanc was given by Sir Oliver and Lady Marjory Wright, as well as two of WC's own drama majors, Carey Smith and Jason West. Theatre Verse was a reading of poetry about or from the theatre, taken from The Methuen Book of Theatre Verse. Compiled and edited by Jonathan and Moira Field, friends of the Wrights, this 1991 volume will soon be a part of Miller Library's collection.

Sir Oliver Wright, as you have doubtless heard by now, was at one time the British Ambassador to the U.S. Lady Marjory has acted all over the world, including at D.C.'s Folger Theatre, where she is on the board of directors. Jonathan Field spent a large part of his life in the theatre, both literally and figuratively, and was in the process of compiling a book of verse on the subject when he passed away.

Field's wife, Moira, finished editing the collection and saw it through publication. Selections from the book have been performed twice in England (once by the Wrights and once by the Royal Theatre Company), and for the first time in America on Tuesday in the Lit House.

The selections chosen span from 1612 (Sir Walter Raleigh's "on the Life of Man") to 1990 ("Superstitions," by Field himself). The performance was divided into eight sections, such as "Audience," "Actors," "Backstage," etc. The prevailing idea involved the demonstration of the conduction of the "electricity across the footlights," or the interaction between audience and theatre company.

Two poems were on theatre cats, one by T.S. Eliot and "The Old Trooper" by Don Marquis. They were both examples of one prevailing theme, "it ain't what it used to be." One poem proclaimed that all the good actors were dead — and was written in 1615! The whole thing, while a bit maudlin in spots, was done more tongue-in-cheek than chip-on-shoulder.

Some highlights included two poems on "Chocolates." The piece by Guy Boas was a charming duet about a man watching Hamlet, and his wife obsessing over a box of chocolates. While the pieces done by the group as a whole were the weakest point in the repertoire, largely because of the lack of rehearsal time/space (the Wrights only got here on Monday), the piece called "Charge of the Late Brigade" used this choppiness cunningly to portray an audience and the people who come in late and step on them.

The acting itself was outstanding for the most part. Dramatic readings have their advantages in not having to memorize the work; the obvious drawback is that the actor is by definition tied to the book. This was not a distraction at all, but rather a self-referential quality that lent itself to reading from writing about plays, acting, and the theatre.

However, out of a moderately sizeable audience, only six students bothered to show up. Seeing great literature performed by great actors not only shouldn't be a bother, it should be a requirement, especially to those students who consider themselves playwrights (or writers at all). Excepting those students in classes on Tuesday afternoon, a general "shame on you" should go to both students and professors — not one of whom was present, excepting Lynn Doyle and Dr. Cousineau — the one who teaches at Delaware. Hopefully Mr. Elbow will get a better reception next week -- and a bigger audience.

Political View

By S. Ross Koon
Staff Writer

This past week has been a very busy one for Sir Oliver Wright, formerly of the British foreign service. He delivered two speeches here at Washington College on international politics. His speech on Monday, February 10th, sponsored by the William James Forum, detailed current conditions in the former Soviet Union. On Tuesday, February 11, Wright addressed the question of whether the European Economic Community will be a partner or a rival of the United States. This speech was sponsored by the Goldstein Program in Public Affairs. I attended both addresses with the interest and the hope that I would agree with Sir Oliver because I, like most Americans, hate to pan anyone with a title.

Sir Oliver's address on the future of the former Soviet Union began with a lengthy explication of the history of Russia. This background information, while interesting, was probably not new to most of his audience. He made a very intriguing remark when he dubbed the U.S. and the U.K. the "successors of Rome" but he did not choose to back up this statement or even to take note of the possibility that our societies may in fact suffer the same fate as Rome.

His speech included many sweeping generalizations. He intimated that it was primarily the cost of competing in the arms race with the U.S. which caused the collapse of the U.S.S.R., not the inevitability of the partition of a state which over the years had exacerbated nationalist sentiment within its republics through its excessively Russocentric policies. He said that his "guesstimate" of the probability of the success of democracy in the former So

Crossword Winner

The infamous "Beyond the Shadow of a Trout" crossword puzzle, containing such trivia as the President's dog (Barley), and the most prescribed medicine on campus (erythromycin), has a winner. Our very industrious ELM Managing Editor, Julie Greene, has turned in her completed crossword for the $25.00 Grand Prize (SGA funded, of course). So instead of bugging Tanya Allen (the girl with the rainbow trout purse, not the one with the nosering), you could Just Say Julie to find out who's worked with The Incredible Hulk (Jay Meranchik), or what professor rhymes with bagel (Dale Daigle). By the way, is it a coincidence that Ms. Allen called the dorm she lived in "the biggest eyesore on campus" (Queen Anne)? Speaking as someone who was a few answers short of the big prize, I think congratulations are in order to both Allen and Greene.

Fellowship Rooms Assigned

The recipients of the O'Neill Literary House Fellowship Rooms for the Spring Semester are as follows: Jenifer Grindle, for work on her novel; Humanities Majors Amy Caddle and Cynthia Fields-Bélanger, to share the Douglass Wallop Room; and Bruce Hamilton and Tina McCuen, who will share the garret room for work on Creative Writing and Translations.

Auditions for Pippin

Shan Driscoll will be directing Pippin, the first musical at Washington College in two years. The last musical was Sweeney Todd, which Peter Johnson directed and Driscoll assistant directed. Mike Tyson was the musical director, and he will again serve in this capacity in Driscoll's drama thesis project. Auditions will be Monday the 17th from 5:00 p.m. until 7:00 p.m., and Tuesday the 18th from 6:00 - 8:00 p.m. If you can sing, act, dance, play a musical instrument, or help with the technical aspects of the show, show up to one of the audition dates or leave a message at ext. 269. Preparation of a musical selection is encouraged, but not required.

WCR Returns

The Washington College Review will be revived this semester under the direction of Lynn Doyle, this semester's Associate Director of the O'Neill Literary House (replacing Kathy Wagner, on sabbatical this semester in Spain). Our own Editor-in-Chief, Pat Attenasio, was to edit the publication, but he had to withdraw upon receiving ELM editorship. Student editors this semester will be announced in the near future.

Submissions under these departments, as well as reviews and scholarly essays, will be accepted until a tentative deadline of March 15. For more details, contact Lynn Doyle at extension 460.

Learn how to Submit at the Lit House

Calling all writers! No money? No clue on how to submit to a magazine? Saturday, February 15 at 2:00 p.m., you'll get your chance to have the glory of being considered for publications from all over the country — absolutely free. The Writers' Union is sponsoring a "Submissions Workshop Party" in the O'Neill Literary House. Stamps and envelopes will be gratis, as well as refreshments, reference books, and advice from some students who've played the game before. Just bring your typed work to submit, and if you don't know how to write a cover letter, information and a typewriter will be provided. Contact Tanya Allen for more details.

Floating Boats Adrift in the "Sea" - House

By Sally McGee
CIA Concert Coordinator

The Boston-based band Floating Boats will be playing this Saturday night in the Coffee House from 9:30 - 1:00. The party is sponsored by the CIA/SGA, and admission is free.

The Boats have been playing at colleges and clubs from New England to Nassau since 1988, and have even opened up for such big groups as the Del Fuegos, Katrina and the Waves, Flock of Seagulls, the Guess Who, and the Alarm. They've released one album, Shack with a Satellite, and are working on their second album right now.

The Caribbean sound of Floating Boats is mixed with a little ska, a little heavy rock, and even some calypso and 1940's swing. Even though some of their songs deal with the heavy topics of drugs, poverty, and racial harmony, all of their music is danceable and packed with high energy. It promises to be a wild and wacky night. Be there.

WCDS to Host Cherry Pie Bake-Off

Sir Wright

viet Union was 20%.

He based this largely on what he perceives to be the essentially "chaotic" nature of the Russian national culture, the "fact" that Russia has never had any form of democracy, and his calculation of the amount of capital needed to refurbish Russian industry. All of his points can be argued against — but suffice it to say that he believes that a successful foreign policy is one which guards against a "worst case scenario." While it is true that this is an essential component of a valid foreign policy, I would hypothesize that it is also useful to construct a "best case scenario" — and then determine precisely what is needed to bring it into reality. History, after all, is largely the history of people overcoming history. Anyone who in this day and age still speaks of "containing" the "Soviet Union" (as Sir Oliver often mistakenly referred to that politically disconnected area once known as the Soviet Union) is an old cold warrior whose service should be recognized but whose worldview is out of date. To continue to fight a cold war which already has been won is to tilt uselessly at windmills.

After Sir Oliver's reactionary speech of the night before I attended his speech on the European Community (EC) with a sense of uneasiness, chiefly because it is easier to write a review of a speech which one agrees with than one which one disagrees with. I came fully prepared to again be disappointed. To my surprise, however, Sir Oliver's speech on Tuesday night was brilliant. Rather than the backward reactionary of the night before Sir Oliver appeared as a forward thinking visionary with sound ideas and argumentation. Sir Oliver is, in short, a good European.

He emphasized that the EC is assuredly not a homogeneous body, that each nation will continue to seek its own national interest, and that "Altruism is in pretty short supply in Brussels." He correctly pointed out that the EC protects America's national interest by promoting stability in Europe, and that Europe has always been a reliable partner when their interests coincide with ours. He spoke knowledgeably on the history of British intransigence in the European Community, which he aptly explained by describing the EC as a car in which Britain plays the role of the brakes.

Evaluation

seen by the professor, untyped

The most disturbing aspect above is the lack of student anonymity. We realize the impossibility of asking that every form's essays be typed. We also recognize the teacher's right to confront their accuser. Thirdly, we believe the majority of professors at Washington College would be able to accept constructive criticism without hostility, but this is unrealistic. Imagine if a student were required to take the second semester of a course in which there were no other sections. If that student had criticized the professor in his first evaluation, it is conceivable that the professor might harbor subliminal animosity, and unknowingly retaliate.

In contrast to the basic right to confront one's accuser, we put forth the right to anonymity. The use of pen names to prevent retribution is a necessary part of free press. Political Science professors teach us this about Madison, Hamilton and Jay's Federalist papers, written under the name Publius. The practice of accusing those who hold power over you from behind the shield of anonymity has precedent in America. Anonymity is necessary unless one depends on the accused's goodwill.

To provide this opportunity, we propose: 1) the student be provided with the option of anonymity. If the student notes this on the form, then their form will be typed. and that: 2) the identifications asked for on the top of the form be made optional and that this be stated in the form.

We believe that the faculty should not be given the opportunity to accidently determine the identity of their critic nor develop unintended animosity towards that student. It is unfair to both the student and the professor to provide this trap in which both can become mired quite accidently.

In conclusion, we wish to note that the arbitrary actions taken by some of the faculty over a six year period are more important than the specific changes to the form. The student's basic method of redressing wrongs has been summarily toyed with by the faculty in an unrepresentative way. We cannot allow tyranny in the form of unrepresentative government to arise here. The faculty and students must share the responsibility for all decisions that effect the interests of both.

New Tennis Coach Chosen

By Gary Brown
Sports Information Director

Tim Gray, a former Washington College tennis star, has been named head coach of both the men's and women's tennis programs at WC. He will also be the director of the college's new Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center.

Gray will act as assisstant to current coach Tom Finnegan for the remainder of the Spring Season, at which point, Gray will take over. Coach Finnegan was asked to run both programs after the college, in compliance with a commitment to hire full-time coaches for its 14 intercollegiate teams, did not renew the contracts of former part-time head coach Fred Wyman and Holly Bramble in June of 1991.

Gray is a 1986 graduate of Washington College and was a nationally-ranked tennis player for the Shoremen in 1985 and 1986. He returns to Washington College from the Greenwood Country Club in Greenwood, South Carolina, where his responsibilities as a tennis professional included organizing tournaments and United Tennis Association league play, teaching private and group lessons, and managing the facility and maintenance crew and Pro Shop staff. Gray's coaching experience includes a one year stint at Widener University as a head coach in 1987, and one season as an assistant at the University of Maryland in 1984.

Gray' responsibilities as Director of Washington College's Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center will include scheduling, staffing and maintenance of the 48,000 square foot recreational facility for the Washington College students, faculty and staff.

"My days as a student at Washington were some of the best in my life,"Gray said of his appointment. "I'm thrilled and honored to be able to return in a different capacity, and I look forward to continuing the winning tennis tradition at a Washington College."

Tim's enthusiasm and experience is a perfect blend for this position," said Washington College Athletic Director Geoff Miller. "We feel that Tim has demonstrated the kinds of abilities necessary to run a nationally prominent tennis program and manage our beautiful new facility. His being an alumnus of the college will also be beneficial in this transition period. We gleaned Tim from a very impressive applicant pool, and we are excited to have him aboard."

The Marseys: WC's Dynamic Duo

By Charlie Linehan
& Chris Vaughn
Sports Editors

Anyone who has played on a Varsity athletic team at Washington College in the last six years will smile instinctively at the mention of Bill and Nancy Marsey. Rain or shine, Bill and Nancy are always there, ready with your game bag or your uniform, or just to exchange some practice clothing. No matter how badly your day has been going or how much you might be dreading the upcoming practice, you can always count on the warm smiles of Nancy and Bill to lift you up a little when you go down to get your equipment. After a win, Nancy and Bill are the first to let you know how proud they are, and the first to console you after a tough loss. In short, Washington College athletes and coaches have a lot of love and respect for this dynamic duo who, over the past six years, have played such an important role in the success of athletics here at WC.

The Marseys

Both Delaware natives, Bill Marsey was born in Yorklyn in 1927 and Nancy Brittingham was born in Wilmington in 1928. They attended Conrad High School, where Bill played football and Nancy played field hockey and softball, and that is where they first met. Says Bill, flashing a romantic smile in Nancy's direction, "I used to stand at the top of the steps coming out of the cafeteria and just admire her walking up the steps . . . and I finally got enough nerve to ask her out." For their first date (according to Bill) they went to the movies ("I'm glad he remembers these things because I don't," Nancy teases.) A short time later, in October 1947, the high school sweethearts were married in Marshallton, Delaware.

Prior to their arrival at Washington College, the Marseys both pursued very different careers than they do today. Says Nancy, "I worked at a florist shop designing and assembling wedding bouquets, corsages, that sort of thing." Bill was employed as an electrician by the National Vulcanized Fiber Company in Wilmington for thirty-nine years.

Marking her time at Washington by the number of years old favorites Beth Matthews and Carol Reece were here and how long they have been gone, Nancy figures that she has spent six years at WC—going on seven. "I've been here nine years in April," Says Bill. "I started out collecting students' trash, on the trash truck. I worked my way into the athletic building as a janitor for approximately two years. I've been in this room the balance of the time (six years)." Bill took over the equipment room after the departure of the late Horace Needles.

While every Washington College athlete remembers the Marseys, there are many Sho'men who occupy a special place in the Marseys' memory. In addition to the aforementioned Matthews and Reece, Mrs. Marsey's favorites among the girls have included Donna White, Amy Tiehel, Lee Ann Ledwin . . . . When asked about the guys Nancy laughs, "Charlie Linehan!—Charlie's the only one that ever came up and asked me, 'Mrs. Marsey, I forgot to bring my practice clothes. Could I borrow your car keys to drive back over to the dorm?' He said, 'It'll only take me a minute.' And I said, 'Yes, that's what I'm afraid of!'" Nancy also has fond memories of Bobby Martino, 'Rup' [Greg Ruppert], Matt Petz, 'Squirrel' [Chris Brandt], Matty Wilson, 'Bull' [Chris Jamke] . . . . When asked about his favorite female athletes over the years, besides Amy Tiehel, Mr. Marsey responds, "Um, . . . Amy." Among the guys, Bill's favorites include Bobby Martino, Timmy Hormes, Matty Wilson, Charles Duckett, Buddha [Heath Bethune] (Nancy laughs, "I got so many bearhugs from him . . ."). Bill smiles, "As far as I'm concerned, all the boys were good to me, that's all I know." "Too many to single out" Nancy adds.

In addition to a few favorite athletes, the Marseys are particularly fond of some of the Washington College coaching staff. When asked about his favorite coach, Bill responded, "My favorite coach is Mr. Finnegan because he's on the ball and he gives us all the information we need—in plenty of time. He not only coaches basketball but he also thinks about the equipment room." Nancy identifies Diane Guinan as her favorite coach for the same reasons and adds, "She generally cares about what her people are wearing—if they're wearing the proper thing and that they get it at the proper time."

Given the Marseys' tenure at Washington College, they have some valuable impressions of the athletic program to share. When Nancy first arrived at the school, there were separate equipment rooms for men's and women's athletics. Eventually, they were combined into one room, a change which Nancy feels was for the better. In addition, Nancy feels that athletics at the college has come a long way. "I think that the college, as a whole, is becoming more aware of athletics . . . . The way I've read about it and heard about it from people who have been here a number of years, athletics was just something that was there, I think, for a long time. Moneywise, the college is giving more money out to sports. I think we have a president now, who is behind sports and that's a big plus for the athletic program. So, I think it's come a long way."

Washington College athletics certainly have come a long way, but it couldn't have happened without the the Marseys. In the words of Athletic Director Geoff Miller, "We're truly blessed to have people like this working for us. They are just marvellous people, they've got great personalities, they really care about young people. We've had an accountability and a control down there that is probably the envy of many an athletic department. We're just tickled pink to have people as genuinely kind, caring, and as efficient as Bill and Nancy Marsey."

NCAA Gives Ruling: Tennis Team Issue Resolved

Chestertown, MD—Washington College was notified today that the NCAA has completed its review of reported violations in the College's men's and women's tennis programs. A letter from NCAA Enforcement Representative Cynthia J. Gabel to Washington College Athletic Director Geoff Miller stated that the case has been classified as secondary, a designation used by the NCAA to describe violations which provide only a limited recruiting or competitive advantage and that are isolated or inadvertent in nature. The NCAA has asked Washington College to prepare a report, prior to the beginning of the 1992-93 school year, outlining steps taken by the college to monitor compliance and to avoid a recurrence of similar violations.

Ms. Gabel's letter also stated that "the institution's actions in this matter were meaningful and indicate appropriate efforts to operate the university's athletics department in compliance with NCAA legislation."

"I'm relieved that this issue is now behind us," said Miller. "This has been a painful process for all parties involved. We feel we have a great coaching staff in place now and we look forward to a terrific season for both teams."

NEWT'S Player of the Week

Charles "The Hands" Cummings

NEWT'S CHESTERTOWN BAR
Trust Me
(410) 778-9819

It's the Bleacher Creatures—IN YER FACE!! That's right folks, Spiderman and the Vaughnster comin' at you once again. Before we get to the NEWT's Player of the Week, we have a special award to give out. The Post-Party Faux Pas Award goes out this week to Laurie McClellan and Jenny Golden in recognition of their criminal activities last Tuesday afternoon. It seems that these two girls, distressed about the full keg sitting in their kitchen on Tuesday, proceeded to pour the contents of the keg down the drain of the sink, pitcher by pitcher, until it was light enough to be removed. Far be it from us to criticize you girls but, what is ya, IGNORANT?!

Anyway, now for the big news—This week's NEWT's Player of the Week: The new kid — a 6'1 sophomore guard, hailing from the great city of Baltimore, MD, Charles Cummings. Charles has come on to fill the shoes of the late great Greg Rogers extremely well. He's been shooting an astounding 50% from the three point hash and currently has the third best total shooting average of 45.7%. Says coach Finnegan, "Charles has really come on during the second half of the season. He has stepped into the starting line-up and he has provided us with some good defense and some very good offensive outbursts. We're looking forward to having him with us for two more seasons." Good Job Charles!!!

WC B-BALL, 1/2 Game From First

By Melissa Harmeyer
Staff Writer

After an 87-69 victory over Western Maryland, the Men's Basketball record has improved to 12-9. The team is now in preparation for four important MAC Southeast matchups against Haverford, Ursinus, Widener, and Johns Hopkins. Victories in these upcoming games could earn the Shoremen an MAC championship and a chance at postseason play.

The team displayed extreme talent on both the offensive and defensive ends in last Thursday's win. Cummings' 3 pointer combined with a layup by Greg Rupert gave the Shoremen an 11-4 lead only 3 minutes into the game. And to round out the half, Mike "That's right I have PIPES" Swanson contributed the final four points to give WC a 44-28 lead at the break.

Western Maryland was able to come only as close as eleven as Pete Basel put the nail in the coffin and the game out of reach when he hit a three point clincher with 7:47 remaining.

Allen Lester's 17 points, along with Tim Liddy's 14, kept the Shoremen ahead for the remainder of the game. Starters Daren Vican and Charles Cummings also contributed greatly in the points column. In addition, Vican, the All-MAC junior, had 12 rebounds for a game high while Cummings sunk his 11 points all in the first half.

All in all, WAC dominated by outshooting, out rebounding, and hitting 50% of their three pointers. Who says this team isn't for real?! With Hopkins losing there last two games against Ursinus and Widener, WC is only a half game out of first place. These last four contests will be the key as WC goes up against Hopkins in their last battle of the season.

On another note, the annual alumni game is this Saturday before the WAC faces Ursinus. Returning players include a few you may remember from the Final Four team of1989-90: Jim Keehan, Charles Duckett, Chris Janke, and Chris Brandt. Many other players from previous years will be there as well.

The focus, however, will be the ceremony which will honor Washington's winningest basketball coach, Tom Finnegan, who has 280 wins in 22 seasons. So come out and cheer on this powerful coach and powerful team!

REC Sports Update

By Kristy Hilgartner
Staff Writer

The REC Sports program is already in full swing for the spring semester with a plethora (nice wordage Kristy) of activities for both men and women. The program offers a wide variety of opportunities for the college community in the areas of recreation, intramurals, and education. Student participation has been its highest this year as compared to previous years.

Scuba classes will be offered at the Casey Swim Center beginning March 10th. The first session will consist of six classes held on Tuesdays and Thursdays from 7-10pm. A second session of classes will begin April 7th. The cost will be $195 and equipment will be provided. Please sign up at the swim center as soon as possible as spaces are limited.

There are still a few openings left for both aerobics classes this semester. On Monday, Wednesday, and Friday afternoons, Tracy Greenawalt leads high and low impact aerobics with some incorporation of step aerobics. Maria Banashak and Judi Berry are now offering a complete Step Aerobic program on Tuesday, Thursday, and Sunday evening. Both classes provide both intense and enjoyable workouts, and they're a great way to get in shape for the spring. For new participants the fee is $15 for the semester. Returning members pay half-price.

Men's indoor soccer began last Sunday and consists of eight teams. In the first round of play Die Ubermenshen defeated Bad Brains 4-2 and the Sweathogs beat Pepe 1-0. Also, on Tuesday night, Farfegnugen and Lumpy Snacks went the distance and finally into overtime but remained tied 5-5. The schedule for the rest of the season has been modified, so all teams should contact Dennis Berry as soon as possible.

A silent auction is now underway for a pair of brand new Trak cross-country skis. Keep in mind how ideal these would be getting around Chestertown during these treacherous winter months!! If you would like to place a bid, drop off it off at the REC sports office in the Swim Center. The winner will be determined on February 21.

Openings for positions on the REC Sports Staff are available for next fall. Job opportunities include Student Director and various assistant positions. Anyone interested in any of these should contact Dennis Berry.

Thank you for your support.

Aqua-Men Paddle Past Lebanon Valley

By Chris Vaughn
Co-Sports Editor

The men came away with their second win of the season over Lebanon Valley with a drowning score of 126-38. "This was an entire team win with some terrific times turned in today. Every member scored important points to add to the victory," said Coach Lessard.

The medley relay teams started off big placing first and second early in the meet. The combined efforts of Tim Whittier, Brian Basso, Ty McCarthy, and Jason Campbell along with Dave Czekj, Andy McKim, Troy Petenbrink, and Mike Frey made this possible.

Freshman Dave Cola continued to look impressive by winning the 200 free, 500 free, and 100 fly. The 200 was a new school record and should get him in the top heat at the MAC's. Chris Freisheim swam a personal best in the 200 and 500 free which put him as WC's second fastest in those events behind Cola.

Tyler McCarthy also gave his contribution by winning the 100 free and placing second in the 50 free. Another freshman, Mike Bowman, was right on the heels of McCarthy with his placements of 2nd in the 100 free and 3rd in the 50 free.

Continual efforts to lower times were often exemplified. Mike Frey had a personal best time in the 100 and 200 free with Jason Campbell winning and decreasing his own time in the 100 breast. Andy McKim and Brian Basso came in 2nd and 3rd respectively behind Campbell. Added to this were Jarrod Wunderlich and Troy Petenbrink swimming their fastest times in the 200 IM and 100 back. Dave Czekj also lowered his time again placing third in the 100 back as Tim Whittier continued to add important points with his finishes of 2nd in the 100 back and third in the 200 IM.

The final event, the 200 free, was also taken by the Aquamen and it leads them into their next meet here, against Juniata, tomorrow at 1pm. Be there!!!

The women swam right past Lebanon Valley last weekend and never looked back as they walked away with a victory of 125-41. Sophomore Mimi Devlin led the group with 2 firsts in the 200 IM and 500 free. Coach Kim Lessard put it best when she said, "Mimi looked great today. She is so valuable to the team with the ability to swim so many different events. She successfully filled Kasey Carroll's void who is out with an injury."

Nancy Whittman also had a big day and became the 5th fastest 100 freestyler in WC history breaking a minute and winning the event. Behind her, Magdelena Fuchs scored an important 2nd in the event and 3rd in the 50 free with Ramsey Bigham trailing closely in 4th.

Meanwhile, Amy Draper continued to look impressive in the 100 fly, finishing first, as Joan Colton scored a strong second. And Jen Green was back to form in her 100 backstroke win after being out for two weeks while Karen Pendergast brought WC a second in the same event.

Senior captain, Leslie Newcomb, as usual, proved tough in her forte as she won in the 100 breast and placed second in the 200 IM. At the same time Beverly Diaz improved her times as she placed second behind Leslie in the 100 breast. Let's not forget old Eleanor Shriver who added key points from her 3rd place finish in the 500 free and 4th place finish in the 200 free.

The relays also had a terrific day. Two WC squads placed first and second in the 200 medley relay and the free relay teams iced the cake with their respective finishes of first and second as well.

The team is doing rather well and according to Coach Lessard, "If everyone would get healthy the MAC championships should be exciting."

Fitness Center Nears Completion

By Patrick Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

The Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center, under construction since September 1991, will be open for general use in mid-March. According to Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects at Washington College, the building's completion marks the end of a long, multi-department effort to upgrade the college's athletic facilities.

"We signed the contracts in June 1991, and construction is nearly done, so the actual work took less than a year," Baer stated. "But, this project took many years to develop...including several years of fundraising, and ten months of planning." The Fitness Center, designed by architect Bob Brasso, is being built by the Metropolitan Construction Company, under the management of Arena and Company. According to Baer, much of the site's quick completion can be attributed to the participants involved, often working seven days a week and nights to make the targeted March deadline.

The Fitness Center, named for Benjamin A. Johnson (WC Class of 1911),former Chief Justice of Maryland, whose family contributed greatly to the project's fundraising, cost roughly five million dollars (with one million of that figure to be placed in endowment to provide for maintenance and other future costs of the center) is adjacent to the Cain Gymnasium, covering some 55,000 square feet.

Handicapped Access at WC:

College Officials Address Student Concerns

By John C. Griep
News Editor

"Public accommodations . . . may not discriminate on the basis of disability" is the primary message of The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) of 1991, which became effective on January 26 of this year. The act also calls for the removal of "physical barriers in existing facilities . . ., if removal is readily achievable" and the provision of "auxiliary aids and services . . . to individuals with vision or hearing impairments or other individuals with disabilities, unless an undue burden would result." The ELM discussed the issue of handicapped access on campus, as well as the effect of The Americans with Disabilities Act, with a number of college officials. The interviews were conducted separately throughout the past two weeks.

Our first question was concerned with the past performance of Washington College on the issue of handicapped access.

Dean McIntire: "In the distant past, we [WC] did an abysmal job with handicapped access. I don't think we were any worse than any other institution. It just wasn't an issue, unfortunately, for lots of colleges up until the more recent past . . . . I think in the more recent past, we've made some efforts to make our buildings handicapped accessible. I think we've got a long way to go before they are really accessible."

Gene Hessey, Senior Vice President of Management and Finance: "We certainly weren't the leaders when the initial guidelines on accessibility were put in place, although we did take part in a number of statewide meetings to address the issues of handicapped access. . . . I would say that we have been actively involved in maintaining contact with the issue of handicapped access from the outset, when legislation was first implemented. As we have proceeded with a fairly substantial renovation and capital investment program on campus, we've obviously kept those requirements in mind. In recent years I think we've come a long way in making the campus facilities much more accessible than they originally were. We still have a way to go obviously."

President Trout: "I think that we have made every effort to conform with what the state and federal laws require and I believe, nevertheless, that there is still progress to be made."

The ELM next discussed the difference between accessibility and "equal" access for the handicapped.

McIntire was especially concerned about this distinction. She stated, "because we have so many old buildings that are difficult to make handicapped accessible, sometimes we have chosen ways of doing it that to the handicapped person must make them feel a bit like a second-class citizen . . . back-door access, rather than front door. . . . The ramp to the cafeteria is a good example of what I'm talking about. At the time that [the ramp] was put in . . . it was put in specifically for a handicapped student that we had . . . it was the best solution the college could come up with given the resources that we had, given our understandings of the issue, our expertise of the issue. We understand more about those things now . . . . The question is, as we have added to the campus, have we added positively to the handicapped access? And I think there are a couple of areas where we are missing the boat. . . . I think we've got a ways to go here in making equal access for handicapped people . . . ."

Hessey: "I guess [equal access] would certainly be the ideal, where accessibility is virtually the same for everyone, everywhere. I think most of us are a long way from reaching that ideal. . . . And I think in some ways that the guidelines for handicapped access, in and of themselves, indicate that differentiation . . . ."

Trout , when asked about McIntire's comments, responded, "I can understand that the present ramp could give that impression. On the other hand, thank God we have a ramp. In the new configuration . . . the handicapped access will be down those back stairs with a little elevator that will take them up and down. Is that second-class citizenship because they have to use an elevator? In other words, I don't find that a particularly useful distinction. . . . I think we first have to make sure that everything is accessible and then, over time, come to grips with the question of equal access, But it is very expensive. If equal access were provided, I suspect that the price tag for that would be astronomical. . . . I think we have to think about what's reasonable for the college, as well as what's reasonable for the handicapped, and come to some sort of balance that's fair. We want a barrier-free campus . . . within the bounds of reason."

The ELM then discussed the college's plans for handicapped access for the future and the effects of the American Disabilities Act on the college.

Gender Issues on Campus:

Panel Raises Questions of Equality

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

A panel discussion on coed life at Washington College, held last Monday and sponsored by the Margaret Horsley Society, provided some interesting insights into the way the College views itself. The crowd was rather sparse; in fact the audience and the panel had roughly the same number of members. And although the panel was unified in purpose, by no means were they cohesive in view.

The members included President Trout, Dean Sansing, S.G.A. Vice-President and R.A. John Kelly, S.G.A. Senator John Phoebus (also an R.A.), G.A.L.A. co-Presidents Amy Caddle and Gehrett Ellis, Dr. Beverley Wolff, senior biology major Karen Brady, and sophomore Ramsey Bigham, a member of the Women's Issues Discussion Group.

The discussion was described as a continuation of a similar panel held during the Alumni Weekend Coeducation festivities. The previous panel had women representatives spanning each decade from 1920 - 1990. The theme in both cases had to do with what it means to be a woman at Washington College, focusing mainly on campus life, both in and out of the classroom.

President Trout said he was interested in making this college "a coeducational institution, as opposed to an institution to which female students happen to go." He continued this train of thought by saying if he heard, via that discussion or others like it, that there were serious problems he would actually be encouraged. He said it would be a good thing to hear concern about women's issues, because only then could we begin to tackle the problems that prompt those complaints.

However, Phoebus characterized the campus as "apathetic," a word that Kelly used to describe his own position towards problems of sexism or harassment on campus. A misuse of the term "apathetic" was (hopefully) evident in Kelly's case, as he described himself as being more unaware of problems than unsympathetic towards them. In fact, when discussing the topic of campus activism, he asserted, "I guess there should be a women's group on campus — I don't know if we funded one this semester." He was not only a member on a panel coordinated by one of these groups, he also (via S.G.A.) funded two more such gender-oriented groups (Gender Studies Reading Group and G.A.L.A.).

Brady presented a similar stance. She claimed that she had never had any problems of sexism in any of her classes or, as she put it, "I don't know. It never happens to me."

So who does it happen to? Is the debate still male vs. female, or "us against them?" And if the women aren't even aware of what the problems are, how can we expect to fight them?

Awareness and education seemed to be the largest stand, as it apparently should be. What does go on is shocking. Is "sexclusion" from the literary canon by male professors acceptable? What about the denial given to one student from writing a scholarly paper on any women artists (the student was male)? In actuality the Backlash against contemporary feminism is more prevalent on campus than most people are aware of — or choose to be. "We're not oppressed — not seriously oppressed," was Bigham's statement, which served as a summary of women in the '90's.

What about date rape? While this touchy subject was discussed at length, no real solutions were proffered, other than showing more "mandatory" movies. Awareness is a necessity, and though it can't be expected of a rape survivor to go on the lecture circuit, there are steps to be taken.

Supporting the topic of awareness in men, Kelly suggested that a women's group approach fraternities or sports teams, and have a similar discussion with them on the same issues, so that ignorance would no longer be an excuse for foul treatment of women in social or sexual situations.

General safety is also a concern. Although the sophomore class' plans for an escort service are gradually getting under way, two further points should be addressed. First, no women will be permitted to serve as escorts, only as dispatchers. This is disregarding the physical and emotional strength of both the men and women who are potential escorts.

Second, safety within buildings is not guaranteed by escorts, or even by campus security, who can only do so much. The break-in in Queen Anne House last semester, involving a visiting sports team and theft of valuable personal property, is a perfect example. So are the thefts and defacement that run so rampant campus-wide. Ignorance of these events provides more evidence in the case for education.

The bulk of the latter part of the discussion was to make the case for the implementation of some sort of Women's Studies or Gender Studies Curriculum. The stress was on both equalizing the focus to appropriately reflect the contributions of women, and on the installation of specific courses that would focus on the works of women. An example would be Professor Kathy Mills' women's music course. There was enough fuel to spark not only discussion, but the interest of President Trout, who helped to introduce a Women's Studies program at Colgate University.

The topics were so diverse, and the conversation was so lively, that it was a shame so few people attended. At any rate, the content of the discussion is felt, or rather lived, on campus every day. Although not much time was taken to stress the positive aspects of coed life, the first steps are being taken to institute necessary changes in not just structures, but attitudes.

Handicapped

Trout: "I haven't studied that act in much detail, but clearly we have to come to terms with that act. . . . Some of the provisions of that act are very, very tough. . . . Handicapped bathrooms, the dimensions have to be changed, in some instances that could mean knocking out walls . . . the door handles, as I understand it, on every door that is a handicapped accessible door have to be changed from a knob to a latch-type mechanism . . . there have to be signs and some of the signs have to have Braille. It's a very, very tough and potentially expensive . . . very expensive . . . piece of legislation. Obviously, we will do what we must to be in conformance with that law."

Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects: "Washington College is already developing the plans to renovate William Smith Hall and one of the chief reasons we are doing that is to make the entire central classroom building handicapped accessible. Furthermore, one of the reasons we're building the new academic center is to have a central classroom building . . . to make sure that as many classrooms as possible are handicapped accessible. We're working on plans to have hearing impaired telephones on campus. All of the campus master planning we have done has included pathways for physically disabled people. . . . You can, in fact, get from here to there. Not every facility has to be handicapped accessible. You do have to insure that a certain percentage of your facilities . . . are handicapped accessible. . . . Keep in mind that the requirement isn't to make this easy. Handicapped people recognize the difficulties implicit in their disability. Nobody every said that life was fair or easy."

McIntire concluded, "I think we all need to be more conscious of this issue. . . . Troy Petenbrink's comments to the SGA, echoed by others in their letter to the editor, and now echoed by the ELM . . . will probably do more to raise all our consciousness on this issue than all the legislation ever written. There's nothing quite as effective as a group of students concerned about an issue."

Fitness Center

purpose fieldhouse, roughly 35,000 square feet in area, its walls stretching 55 feet high. Clint Baer describes the room's floor (a rough, green surface consisting of layered acrylic and urythene materials) as "the best money could buy." He added, "The Athletic Department did a lot of research concerning the floor. It's a pelletized surface, not smooth, so it has some give to it, which will prevent orthopedic problems." Last week, lines were painted on the floor providing for three basketball, volleyball, and tennis courts. A two-lane jogging track encloses these courts, separated by a movable, red vinyl curtain.

Also included in the Fitness Center is a 4000 square foot strength and conditioning room (featuring all new free-weight and machine equipment), a 2000 square foot dance studio (with new sound system, and Gerstung flooring - hardwood over a cushioned surface), two squash courts, 2 racquetball courts, the multi-purpose Wellness classroom, men's and women's locker rooms (equipped with saunas), lacrosse locker room, and a seminar/team room with audio-visual capability. Athletic Department offices in the center include ones for John Ferber, Head Athletic Trainer, Terry Corcoran, Head Lacrosse Coach, Karen Smith, Dance Instructor, Mike Davenport, Rowing Coach, and Tim Gray, Tennis Coach and Fitness Center Supervisor. According to Baer, the Fitness Center will be "100 percent handicapped accessible." Its connection to the Cain Gymnasium makes that facility completely handicapped accessible also.

"This facility turned out better than we ever dreamed," stated Geoff Miller, Director of Athletics at WC. "We looked at fieldhouses from other schools, and were very involved in discussions of this one's design, because we have to live in it." Although Miller feels the center will be an important recruiting tool, he stressed its multi-purpose nature, and wants it to be utilized by all factions of the campus community. Miller said the fieldhouse will chiefly be used as an inclement weather training facility for the college's athletic teams, working on a rotating schedule based on need, not priority.

The Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center will be officially dedicated on April 25, at 11 a.m., coinciding with the Board of Visitor's and Governor's meeting and Parent's Day. After the ceremonial ribbon is cut, tours of the new facility will be given from 11:30 until 1:30. Other events for the celebration include lacrosse, rowing, and softball matches, and a squash/racquetball tournament. An all-campus Luau at the college's Truslow Boathouse that evening will cap the day's festive events.

MAINTENANCE HELPS ITS OWN

By Doug Smith
Staff Writer

Early in the morning of Saturday, February 15th, John Marcus' house caught fire and burned down. Marcus, a groundskeeper for the college, is probably better known to WC students as the wizened old man perpetually planting shrubs around the CAC and squinting through the constant blue smoke-cloud of a permanently attached cigarette, prompting some students to wonder, "Does he ever put that thing out?"

When Marcus returned to work this Monday, the Maintenance staff immediately responded to his predicament, giving him all the time off he needed and donating supplies from the college to help him get back on his feet. Although the house was destroyed, Marcus' garage had been spared and was serving as temporary, albeit Spartan, quarters. Reid Raudenbush, Director of the Physical Plant at WC, stated, "We gave him a bed, some blankets. We've got a petty cash fund and bought him a lantern and canned food. There was a combination refrigerator/stove somewhere someone brought out. Oh, and we got him a smoke detector."

It is unsure whether Marcus will be allowed to stay in his garage. A collection is being taken up for him by members of the staff. "It's unfortunate when anybody's house burns down," remarked Raudenbush, "and when it's somebody in your department you do whatever you can."

WC Debate Society Formed:

To Discuss Greek System on Campus at First Meeting

By Adria Nesberg
& John Griep
Staff Writers

"This house will ban the Greek system" is the topic to be addressed when the Washington College Debate Society meets for the first time. The first debate is tentatively scheduled two weeks from now,and will hopefully be in the Casey Academic Center Forum. Every member of the student body at WC is a member of the Debate Society.

Kate Absher, founder of the Debate Society at Washington College, is attempting to introduce a system of debate which is used at St. Andrews University, Scotland, where she studied last year. At St. Andrews, according to Kate, the voting for the Debate Society Committee takes place during the student government elections and the positions of student government president, debate society president and newspaper editor are equal to one another. The benefits for the student body is it provides a forum for everyone to discuss important issues.

Two people will debate on each side of the issue, for and against. The form of debate will be six minutes for the main debaters and one minute for anyone else when the floor is opened up by the Chairman. After the debating is finished, the issue is put to a vote. Kate is interested in getting people to argue against their own beliefs. Chris Kleberg, member of the Phi Delta Theta fraternity at WC, for example, has agreed to debate against the Greek system. By asking people to debate against their own beliefs, Kate hopes it will help defuse the issue.

Kate believes the Debate Society will give everyone a chance to discuss their beliefs and stated that this is very healthy for the campus. She plans on holding debates every two weeks to discuss political and campus-related issues and encourages everyone to attend the debates.

Your favorite flower: Iris. Anyone else's? NOT. Unfortunately you don't know how to use your time constructively and can often be found playing with finger puppets, writing anonymous letters in crayon, and making those oh-so-satirical and insightful comments like "So-and-So kicks butt." Another thing worries me however... Are you registered to vote ?!? Iris, You don't even know what time it is.

CAPRICORN: Trust your instincts this weekend. Something you have waited for will arrive. An accident will prove to be a blessing; be patient, but not spineless.

AQUARIUS: Break routines and you will be rewarded unexpectedly. You are currently bombarded by subliminal messages- try to be more alert. STOP

SAGITTARIUS: You're been feeling trapped due to the small size of this school. Go on a trip or get drunk enough to see double- it will appear as if there are more people.

PISCES: How would you feel if you came home to find that your roommates had been replaced by midgets??

ARIES: Wanderlust is at a record high. If you discover obstacles in your path, remove them rapidly.

GEMINI: You're too sexy for this school, too sexy for this town, too sexy for this horoscope. Whatever, nevermind. You know what's best.

LEO: Don't break any confidences, doing so could cause grief for several people. Stay on your guard constantly.

LIBRA: Your generosity will be appreciated by many. However, be wary of the generosity of others... Sincerity can be hard to locate.

TAURUS: Try to find humor in things which ruin your day. Being able to laugh at bad jokes is a virtue.

CANCER: Pay special attention to your dreams this week. Your subconscious desires want recognition; your dreams have an important message to convey.

VIRGO: Go easy on those cute white lies you tell. They could ensnare you this week. Flaunt your natural cool-ness instead.

SCORPIO: Multiple challenges arise this week. Pay attention only to the ones you want to and ignore the rest. They'll go away eventually.

Out with The Old, In with The Griep

(Genoa, Italy - 1794) – One-third his way through conquering Europe, Napoleon Boneparte was asked by a journalist how he felt. The French commander, who for twenty years dominated the Western world, virtually controlling Europe from 1809 to 1812, replied, "I'm tired."

198 years later, we're putting the fifth issue of the ELM to bed, exactly one-third the way through our tenure as the newspaper's editors. I was in France once. I can remember spitting off the Eiffel Tower only to have it boomerang back at me. That, and all the doorknobs seemed rather small. And that's where the Napoleon comparison ends. Only the tired part rings true. Very true.

Editorials are no place to air a newspaper's dirty laundry, but, this week, I do have some spit on my face that needs to be wiped off. Last week I officially hired John Griep as the ELM's new News Editor. I say officially because from the get-go, Griep has been a key player in revitalizing this paper. John "The Hardest Working Man in Journalism" has been my right-hand man ever since the *This Is Not...*days. Like me, he shares a passion for reporting the facts, and covering stories we feel are important at WC. Unlike me, Griep is quiet and reserved, resisting the opportunity to shoot his mouth off on any given occasion. We weren't sure if John would have the time this semester for the ELM, spending all his time managing the new SuperFresh, writing his thesis in the Dairy section. But every Wednesday night, there's Griep right along side Justin and I, patiently pouring over every article, every sentence, every word. I never asked him to do anything, but still he came to me with story ideas. He helped with layout. He checked up on the writers, and actually got along with them. His professionalism and dedication has been remarkable, and for the benefit of the ELM, I had no choice but to wholeheartedly, without any reservations, proclaim him the official News Editor.

Which brings me to my next point. Yes, I handled this situation poorly. Yes, the transition between News editors should have been smoother. Yes, the phrasing "neo-Naziesque" in last week's editorial was in poor taste, but in no way meant as offensive. For those of you who know me, no further explanation or justification is necessary on that. For those of you who don't know me, let me assure you, I am not some autocratic tyrant (at least I hope not) pulling all the strings on the ELM. With the addition of Griep, I now feel my staff is the best this paper has ever had. Guys, you are doing a terrific job. Your hard work makes all the sleepless nights and missed Chaucer classes worthwhile (just kidding Prof. Lamond).

Napoleon literally destroyed himself with his unyielding bravado and fighting. Last week I almost got into a fight. Shit, I haven't been in a fight since sixth grade. What was I thinking? Damnit Jim, I'm an editor, not a fighter! I'm not pro-Nazi. I'm not anti-French. Those people make great fries, tasty salad dressing. I'm just a tired editor who had to make a tough decision last week. One that was necessary for the better of the newspaper, not my ego.

I AM NOT A VIOLENT MAN! I LOVE ALL THINGS HERE & THERE. But when that dude began leaning against my Melanie I thought: "I WILL KILL HIM. I WILL KILL HIM."
But then reason stepped in with the following points: 1) He is big & will hurt me, 2) Melanie is not mine. I have no rights there, & 3) Politically, it would be socially unacceptable to start trouble for no apparent reason.
I was hoping for a disagreement. With just one difference in point of view, I could distance my scrap by claiming that it had nothing to do with Mel, it was entirely about the Jeffersons or the Gulf War or something. Then I'd take a hit to the jaw for sympathy & hit him with my beer bottle (Coors - nice neck for that.) or try to kick out his knee.
But he refused to disagree. He said that although he did not like the Jeffersons, he could see how it played an important part in the evolution of sit-coms. Likewise with all my other points of contention. Oh how I hate him for that! My hands were shaking & actually it seemed Mel was leaning against him too. She smiled at him & touched his ear three times. I left. Came here. Cars go by. Beer is gone. Last smoke. Still shaking.

Letters to the Editor

Wallenberg Resigns

Dear Editor-In-Chief,

I officially resign my position on the ELM as News Editor on the principle that I cannot and will not work for a paper which refers (with amusement) to its logo as "neo-Naziesque." I also cannot work for an editor who refuses to tell me when meetings are or what he expects me to do as News Editor. Your unprofessionalism in this matter is intolerable.

Sincerely,
Kristin E. Wallenberg

Crime & Punishment

Society today is caught up in lies. Some may be ordinary "white" lies. An example is when one remarks, "Oh! you look great tonight." Usually, the person is not telling the truth. We also see lies in advertising, historical events, and daily life. This makes it hard for some people to see the truth. But the reality is that everyone has their own responsibility of being truthful. This means that if you are under the age of 21 and in an establishment that sells alcohol you are breaking the law and also your responsibility of being truthful.

The question that was asked of me by the judge was, What provokes students at WC to commit the crime? He also said that, "you think that they would know better since they are college students." I thought to myself that maybe it was the thirty-five cent draft, the pool tables, live music, the relaxed atmosphere, that entertained me and made me have fun. Yes, it is all of this and more. It is an unending game for any student at any school to at least attempt to enter a bar. It gives an exciting thrill to be someplace where your presence is restricted by the law. Also, it makes the night even more thrilling to pretend to be someone that you are not and cheat your way into the establishment. There are the ones who never get caught; however, the real question is can you beat the system forever?

Looking around that day in the courthouse there were many people that had broken the responsibility of being truthful. Some even looked like repeat offenders. These people had lived too many lies. Probably, some of them started with small ones like me. But as their lives progressed they moved onto larger crimes, such as the assault of a police officer. I got caught early and I am serving a severe punishment. I have learned from my mistake and hope that my name will never be on a list to appear in court.

By all of this I am trying to say that if you think that you are beating the system, in the long run it will make a turn around for the worse. Whether you are impersonating a brother, sister, or cousin it is not you on the ID and therefore you are breaking the law. By the way, there is a sign posted on the front of bars saying "no one under 21 permitted." This means you!!! So instead of breaking the law do something else. Be truthful and be twenty-one.

Men's B-ball Strikes Hard

By Melissa Harmeyer
Staff Writer

Men's B-Ball did it again this past week, using the home court advantage at the Cain Dome and blowing away two of their top MAC foes, Haverford and Ursinus.

Wednesday was yet another night the men of WC proved their worthiness dusting Haverford by 24 points, 92-68. Charles Cummings, a sophomore guard and former NEWT's Player of the Week, began the trouncing by hammering a three pointer 17 seconds into the match-up to give the Shoremen the lead, which they held throughout the game. The WC squad never looked back from that point forward as they continued to roll over Haverford, increasing the margin to 22 points at the half.

The second period proved much like the first. With 10:30 remaining, Darren "Legs" Vican scored to give Washington one of its biggest leads of the game 67-37. They recaptured the 30 point difference with 9:25 left and again with 6:20 remaining. Tim Liddy and Darren Vican topped the charts with 16 points each and freshman guard Adam Poe contributed 11 points.

The Shoremen's offensive dominance was equally balanced with defensive genius. The closest Haverford came to WAC's lead in the second half was 20 points . In addition, the Shoremen sunk 15 out of 20 free throws and totalled 45 rebounds compared to Haverford's 37.

If you missed Wednesday's action, hopefully you were there to witness Saturday's excitement versus Ursinus. The pre-game show began with the return of an array of alumni basketball players as they reminisced and relived the old times battling it out once again under the lights at the Cain Spectrum. Following this were the award ceremonies which included awards for the winningest b-ball coach at WC, Tom Finnigan, the b-ball team's two graduating seniors, Tim Liddy and Allen Lester, and the graduating cheerleaders. Then the spot light fell on freshmen guard Jason Ronstadt, who opened the game with his melodious voice in a rendition of the Star Spangled Banner.

Once the game was under way Tim Liddy put Washington on the board early by hitting two free throw attempts. Later in the first half, with 7:35 remaining, junior guard, Peter "Tough Ride" Basil, went on a tear of his own scoring his 7th point within a two minute frame to put WC up by 10. By halftime however, the Shoremen held only a 2 point lead.

This quickly turned around as our WC squad regained momentum shortly into the second half with Cummings getting a three point opportunity, nailing the two pointer and free throw awarded from the foul. This spark brought the WAC attack back and the drive was sustained for the remainder of the game. From the outset of the second half they continually increased the lead and went onto win by 17, 77-60. In the final two minutes alone WAC scored 5 times, two baskets by sophomore Geoff Ruppert, one by Ronstadt and two free throws by Basil, giving them a 19 point lead. Ruppert had a total of 17 points, the highest of the game with Peter Basil contributing 14 and Darren Vican contributing12.

These two wins put the team in exactly the position they wanted to be in. They finish off the season away with important games against Widener and Hopkins, well in contention for the MAC championship. If you're not attending the Birthday Ball this Saturday come support them at Hopkins at 8pm. Best of luck to the WC 1991-92 B-Ball team!

Guess who. . . WRONG!- It's the Beacher Creatures- IN YER FACE! In the words of the late great Ed McMahon from the Carsenio Hall show, "Ho, Ho, yes oh great one! Ha, Ha. Heeeere's Spidy and The Vaughnster."

Let's get right to it, what you've all been waiting for, this week's NEWT's POW. . . the captian of the men's swim team, senior Brian Basso. Brian holds the record in the 200 fly, which he broke again on Wednesday night, and shares the record in the 400 free relay with his three other partners in the event. He has also qualified for the MAC's in the 200 and 100 fly this season. As Coach Lessard stated, "It's a shame that Brian is a senior this year because his time inprovement has been exciting. This is really only his first formal year of swimming at WC, so his achievements are that much more impressive." Way to get nice Brian, congratulations!!

Swim Teams Lose Two Close Ones to Juniata

By Chris Vaughn
Co-Sports Editor

The men's swim team may not have been able to match up with a formidable Juniata opponent last Saturday but, they continued their school record assault shattering another seven records.

They began early on in the 400 medley relay with Jason Campbell, Brian Basso, Tyler McCarthy, and Tim Whittier, bettering the old record by 2 seconds. Whittier, a freshman, also set a school record of 58.3 in the 100 back. Jarrod Wunderlich went on to break the 100 free record while Troy Petenbrink lowered his time by an unbelievable 6 seconds.

The impressive Dave Cola kept his winning style alive as he won the 200 free with a quick time of 1:51. Another freshman, Chris Freisheim, swam to an important third in the same event and achieved a personal best time in the 500 free for 2nd place.

The aqua-men scored a second place finish in the individual medley by Jason Campbell, who lowered his school record to 2:13, and scored another second place finish by Campbell in the 200 breast, where he broke the record for the fifth time this season to bring it down to 2:24.1 and was out touched by only two tenths of a second for second. Andy McKim, behind Campbell in the two events, did a superb job for his first time in the IM and once again scored in the 200 breast while lowering his time by 6 seconds.

Senior co-captian and NEWT's Player of the Week, Brian Basso, had his best meet of the season breaking his own school record in the 200 fly by 3 seconds and taking WC's second first place finish. Wunderlich was right on his heels and rounded out the one two finish in the event.

The freshmen sensation the team has witnessed all year continued with Dave Czekaj breaking the back record by an astounding 15 seconds. He out touched Tim Whittier and Tyler McCarthy to claim this new time.

The final new record was set by the 400 relay team of Mike Bowman, Brian Basso, Dave Czekaj, and Chris Freisheim. When asked about the upcoming MAC's, Coach Lessard responded, "The men are doing a superb job for a second year team and will surprise many people at the MAC Championship with having men score in the top 16. It should be a very exciting three days for the program." Keep up the crushing pace!

Much like the men's team, the WC women knew they would have to swim their best meet against the 9-0 Juniata team this past Saturday. They hung in there right until the end but lost a heartbreaker, 110-96.

Senior co-captain, Kasey Carroll, was back in action after being on injured reserve for a short period and swam in her last home dual meet. She definitely went out with a bang by taking three first place finishes and posting another school record. Pulling Carroll from her specialty, the 1000 free, a strategy move by Coach Lessard, turned out to be a success as she went on to win the 200 IM with a season best time, the 200 fly for a new record, and the 200 free.

Sophomore star Mimi Devlin filled Carroll's shoes in the 500 and 1000 free and did a terrific job winning both events and becoming WC's second woman ever to finish under 12:00 in the 1000. In addition, Magdalena Fuchs had her best swims of the season in the 100 and 200 free giving her two third place finishes.

Freshman Amy Draper broke her 200 fly time by 3 seconds to become WC's third fastest and, another freshman, Dede Swinden did a fantastic job in the 200 IM and 500 free, both season best times and on WC's top 5 charts. Swinden also joined Draper, Jen Green and Leslie Newcomb for second in the 400 medley relay while lowering their time by 4 seconds.

Co-captain, Leslie Newcomb, had a terrific final home meet swimming a season best in the 200 breast for a second place finish. Another senior who swam her last WC home meet, Joan Colton, also had a personal best in the 200 fly and 200 breast.

Jen Green and Karen Pendergast added important second and third place finishes in the 200 back and also placed fourth in the 200 free and 200 IM respectively. Eleanor Shriver, swiming the 1000 free for the first time, did a fantastic job with an important 5th place finish.

Finally, Beverly Diaz added important points in the 200 breast as did Nancy Whiteman and Ramsey Bigham in the 50 and 100 free. Said Coach Lessard, "The meet went down to the 400 medley relay with WC getting edged out. But the team of Draper, Fuchs, Devlin, and Whiteman placed second with Bigham, Diaz, Pendergast, and Shriver finishing in a close third." She went on to comment, "The main thing was it was senior day. It was the last home meet, and WC career meet for that matter, for some of our top senior swimmers. I will hate seeing superstars Carroll, Newcomb, Colton, Basso, and Petenbrink leave."

New Tennis Coach Hits WC

By Charlie Linehan
Co-Sports Editor

Washington College students, especially Washington College tennis fans, will be glad to hear that the controversy surrounding the WC tennis program is finally at an end. Last week, the Athletic Department announced its decision to hire Tim Gray as Head Tennis Coach, a position which he will take over in July, and as head of the new Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Center immediately after it opens next month.

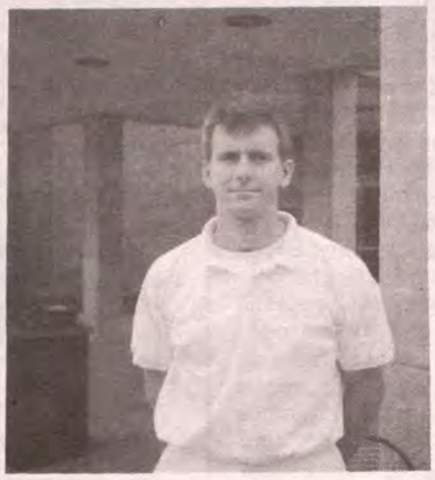
Gray, a former Washington College tennis player and a member of the class of'86, returned to campus this week to begin preparations for the tennis season and for the opening of the fitness center. I caught up with him in the Cain Dome and asked him a number of questions regarding his experience here at Washington College and his expectations for the upcoming season. Here is what Tim had to say.

ELM: Can you tell us a little about yourself? Where you're from. Where you went to high school.

TG: I was born in San Diego, California. My Dad was in the Navy, so we moved around a lot, but I was really raised in Greenville, South Carolina. I grew up playing Junior Tennis in South Carolina since about the age of twelve. Actually, I played tennis and soccer growing up—a little bit of everything, sort of the Jack-of-All-Trades, master of none! I went to a junior college in South Carolina for two years and then transferred to Maryland. I actually went to Maryland to play soccer and then decided after the soccer season to play tennis. So, I walked onto the tennis team and just kind of got more interested in tennis. I played tennis in junior college. Anderson College, which is where I was in South Carolina, was always top 4 in the nation at the junior college level. A lot of people think—well, junior college tennis, but, some of the players that junior college has produced—Michael Pernfors [Swedish, has been top 20 in the world], several national champions, NCAA champions—a lot of good players come out of junior college, my self not included!

ELM: Can you tell us a little about your career as a player here at Washington College?

Tim Gray: Let's see, I came here in the Spring of '85. I transferred from the University of Maryland. This was really the first year that they started to build the program and we went from then to the next year, making the Nationals in '86. That was the first time in the history of the school, as far as I know, that we had any wins over nationally ranked players as well as nationally ranked players on the team. I finished all my course work in the Fall of '86 and walked in the Spring of '87—so I was just here for two seasons but I had a great time, I loved it.



Tim Gray: soon to be WC's new Head Tennis Coach

ELM: Have you been doing anything in tennis in particular since you graduated?

TG: After I graduated from college, I coached at Widener University up in Chester for a season. That year was the first winning season they've had, we went 18 and 6, and they haven't had a winning season since. I left there and I've been Director of Tennis at the Gatewood Club which is in Greenwood, South Carolina. I left there and was at Greenwood Country Club until I moved up to this position.

Elm: What was your competitive status as a tennis player at Washington College?

TG: Let's see, I was ranked 59th in the nation—that was my final ranking. Probably one of my highlights was in '85 in a dual match against Swarthmore—I beat the number 2 player in the nation.

ELM: Given the trouble that the Washington College Tennis Program has had this year, what are your plans for helping to get the program back on its feet?

TG: Well, Tom [Finnegan], myself, and Todd [Helbling] are going to be putting our heads together. Tom is really going to be helping me to get established. I take over as head coach in July this year, so Tom will really be acting as head coach this season. But, it seems like, the players have all rallied around the interview process. I think they were just excited to have someone in there full time who has a tennis background. As far as trying to get them motivated, it seems like they've done a lot of self-motivation and they're really hungry and excited—maybe they're not as physically fit as I'd like them to be, maybe they haven't hit as many balls as I'd like them to see but, you know, it's going to be sort of trial by fire—we're going to all jump into it together and hopefully we won't sink. We're just going to have to be meticulously organized. You know, running both the men's and the women's programs and the fitness center, it's going to be a little crazy this year. So we're going to have to make use of everybody's time in a pretty wise fashion and just keep everybody positive and not look too far ahead.

ELM: From what I understand, Swarthmore and Emory are going to be big games this year. Are you looking forward to them?

TG: Yeah. Let's see, for the women, it will be Mary Washington—I think they're top ten. Trenton State, Emory, those will be big with probably Mary Washington and Trenton State as the two biggies. So we'll really be focusing a lot on those. For the men, we'll have Penn State—it won't mean anything as far as rankings are concerned but it will kind of show us what we've got. Our first real big test will be Emory—they'll be a top ten team. Skidmore, April 5th, that will be another huge one—they're top 20. Actually, Swarthmore dropped us off the men's this year but we've got them back for next year. Emory, Skidmore, Rochester—those are all top twenty teams. Possibly Averett, which is in Virginia. I know in the past they've had some guys from Finland—three of their top six were from Finland, all ranked. But we've handled them in the past so I don't feel like that will be a problem.

ELM: I understand that you're going to be put in charge of the new lifetime fitness center. Can you tell us a little bit about the responsibilities that you'll have over there. Do you feel pretty well equipped to run that huge building?

TG: Well, it's a little overwhelming coming in and trying to bite off all this. Again, it would be almost impossible to try to do everything by myself. That's why I'm thankful that I've got Tom and Todd and, of course Geoff Miller is going to be invaluable as a resource. But, I'll be in charge of the whole nine yards as far as the fitness center goes, as soon as we open up, which is anticipated for the first couple weeks of March. I'm excited—it's a beautiful facility, I've been in there a couple of times and it's really coming together. I think it's going to be an asset to the campus and to the entire community—I think it's going to be great.

ELM: Do you have anything to say to the Washington College community at large?

TG: I'm really excited to be here and I want to just have a good time and do the best job I can and have a good relationship with the college community as well as the community at large. I think it's going to be a really positive experience. I'm looking forward to getting to know the townspeople and to working with everyone in the community. A lot has been printed already so, I'm really excited, I'm looking forward to it—I'm just ecstatic.

Foxwell Speaks on Harkin Campaign

By Andrea Nolan
Staff Writer

Last Monday SANE/FREEZE and the Democratic Club brought Len Foxwell, a Tom Harkin campaign representative, to campus to speak on an obvious topic — Harkin. Although attendance was small, Foxwell had plenty to say on the behalf of the Democratic candidate — things that any educated voter should, but probably does not, know.

Harkin, a Senator from Iowa, has gained the support of many special interest groups, especially peace organizations. These organizations' only major problem with Harkin is his support for Israel. This not withstanding he has a strong liberal record: he opposed the Gulf War, favors 50 percent cuts in Pentagon spending, reductions in warheads, test bans, etc.

Environmentally, Harkin splits his supporters with Bob Kerry, a democrat from Nebraska. Kerry would declare the costal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge a wilderness area. This is the same plain Bush plans on opening up to oil rigs, although it would only supply approximately 200 days of oil. Harkin would strictly enforce the Clean Air Act to severely cut down on pollution. The rest of his positions read the same as above, and if his campaign promises hold true he could actually use the title "Environmental President" for more than just sounding politically correct.

An "Environmental President" is exactly what Tom Harkin is hoping the American public will vote for. His concentration on the environment and other national policy issues is the trump card he hopes will win the democratic primaries and the presidential election.

The Democratic Club and SANE / FREEZE are planning on holding discussions with representatives from the other candidates' campaign committees. In this way, they hope to raise the awareness of the voting population on campus. Dates and times will be posted.

Ray Carver: In Memoriam
Barth, Day, Fessler to Read

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

In honor of several writers who have died in the past two years, the O'Neill Literary House is sponsoring a memorial works reading. "Will You Please Be Quiet, Please?" is the title of the reading, and also of one of Carver's books. This observance of silence is the rationale for Carver's own works not being read. Instead, the authors Howard Nemerov (1920 - 1991), I. B. Singer (1904 - 1991), and Donald Barthelme (1931 - 1989) will be read by, respectively, Prof. Robert Day, Prof. Audrey Fessler, and novelist John Barth.

Normally such readings, for example the Thomas McGrath memorial held last fall, represent authors who have died within the last year. However, Professor Day decided to make an exception in this instance, and hold a reading en masse for several writers whose passing occurred in the last few years. Barth wanted to read from the works of his friend, Barthelme, and Day decided he could dispose with the rule altogether and honor Ray Carver, who died in 1988. As Day said, "Mr. Death doesn't follow such rules, so neither will we."

The reading will be held in Norman James Theatre, February 28, at 4:00 p.m. This is not only an opportunity to honor the works of some late, great writers, but to hear some great living persons read.

Distinguished Women Honored at Convocation

By Patrick Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

Washington College's centennial celebration of co-education continued last Saturday, February 22, when five distinguished women received honorary degrees and awards at the college's Spring Convocation. The event, which took place in Tawes Theatre, along with the Birthday Ball later that evening, coincided with the annual celebration of George Washington's birthday. Immediately following Convocation, participants in the assembly, including President Trout, members of the Board of Visitors and Governors, faculty, and students, were invited to the Campus Lawn for a short dedication ceremony of a new Tulip-Poplar tree to replace the deceased Elm.

Convocation began with the Academic Processional of Faculty, led by Edward L. Athey, Faculty Marshal. The Reverend Charlotte A. Nichols of the United Methodist Church in Easton, Maryland gave the Invocation, followed by the official welcome from Charles Trout, President of the College, and greetings from The Honorable Louis L. Goldstein, Chairman, Board of Visitors and Governors. Kevin "Sparky" Kelly, President of WC's Student Government Association, then presented a speech on academic truthfulness, abjuring student plagiarism and the increasing number of "pass-throughs" slipping through the scholarly ranks at the college. John B. Taylor, Acting Provost and Dean of the College, completed the list of speakers by announcing the recent students selected into Omicron Delta Kappa, the National Leadership Honor Society.

The highlight of Convocation was undoubtedly the conferring of honorary degrees and awards to Sylvia Alice Earle, Marian Wright Edelman, and Linda Koch Lorimer. Martine van Hamel and Billie Whitelaw were also presented with the Award for Excellence. Past recipients of this award include Helen B. Tausig (1977), James Michener (1978), Art Buchwald (1985), and Richard Wilbur (1988).

Sylvia A. Earle, a renowned underwater explorer and a professional conservationist, is a woman of many accomplishments. The world's best-known woman marine biologist, Earle is also recognized as one of the most intrepid divers in the history of underwater exploration. Known affectionately among her colleagues as "Her Royal Deepness," she frequently has gone "where no (wo)man has gone before" in her efforts to better understand the underwater world and its inhabitants. In 1970, a year after astronauts had landed on the moon, she gained national attention by living underwater for two weeks as part of the government-sponsored Tektite II Project. In recent years she has been called upon to assess the environmental impact of the Valdez oil spill in Alaska and the oil well fires in Kuwait.

Students Attend Model United Nations Conference

By Jennifer Reddish
Staff Writer

Ten Washington College students of the International Relations Club represented Afghanistan at the 38th annual Harvard National Model United Nations February 20-23. The group, consisting of Stephanie Sherwell, Lionel Dyson, William S. Gibson, Brendon Norris, Jessica Aspiazu, Steve Boucher, Laura Rindfuss, Kate Towery, Chris Spezio and Alberto De Castro, worked with 2,000 other students of over 300 different schools from around the world to solve international problems.

Preparation for the trip began a week earlier with a visit to the Afghanistan Embassy where students received a briefing by the Charge d'Affairs concerning the intricacies of Afghan foreign policy. The members of the groups served on different committees concerning issues such as political, security, nationalism, hostage taking. Each committee's goal was to reach a resolution that would effectively solve the problem.

However, solving the world's problems is never easy. As Brendon Norris stated, "It was a very slow process that required a lot of give and take with not a great deal of results". The mechanism to reach a resolution seems simple. Each country is part of a bloc based on its geographic location and each bloc is represented in a committee concerning a certain issue. Committee sessions, conducted in parliamentary procedure, are divided between formal debate and caucus. In caucus, each bloc meets to formulate a working paper of its views to present before the committee after chair approval. In the formal debate, the delegates have a chance to discuss the working papers presented and amendments are added. The working paper may become a resolution if it receives a majority vote.

This description does not include the long hours of debate and amendments. Sometimes the rivalry between the different blocs became tenacious. As Stephanie Sherwell of the Nationalism

Editorial

The Washington College
ELM
AN INDEPENDENT NEWSPAPER

Last week, Washington College planted a new tree. I hesitate to call it a tree just yet, for right now it's nothing more than a 27 foot-tall twig. More of a CB antenna than a tree. But someday this twig will rise to a mature height of some 160 feet. Impressive. Barring illness or Dan Kretzer on a drunken rampage, this tree will outlive every one of us. Maybe even our grandchildren. Hundreds of graduating classes will toast to their future every May under this tree. It is to this future which I wish to direct this editorial.

Where I am from, there doesn't seem to be the same fascination with trees as exists here in Chestertown. Trees are not symbolic, they're just something clotheslines are fastened to and little kids fall out of on windy fall afternoons. Whenever my Italian relatives move into a new house, the first thing they do, even before unpacking, is cut down every tree in their yards. No elms, maples, pines, tulip-poplars; just grass, shrubs, and concrete Madonnas. I asked my Uncle Sal why he went to the trouble. What do you have against trees? I asked. Trees fall down on your house, he replied. Trees crack the foundation of the house, he added.

Last week, Washington College planted a new tree. Sometime this week, The Board of Visitors and Governors will pass the budget for the coming academic year. With the current state of the country's economy, students can bet tuition hikes are on the agenda. In 1989-1990, the total cost to attend WC was $14,900 a year. For the academic year 1991-1992, total cost increased to $17,242 a year. Following this trend, students can expect to pay over $20,000 a year to attend WC within the next three years.

Last year, the admissions pool for the 1991-1992 Freshman class at WC included 200 applicants with a 3.0 GPA or higher along with average SAT scores equal to or above 1100. Of these 200 accepted applicants, 30 decided to attend Washington College. The number one reason the other 170 potential students gave for rejecting WC was financial. In most cases it was the sole reason. If the college could have attracted this upper 20 percent of its admission pool, rather than settling for the bottom 20 percent, the average SAT scores amongst freshman would have risen 50 points! Currently, the average SAT score at WC is 1010. The average SAT score at WC's competitor schools equals 1073. Of the 225 freshmen at WC this year, a whopping 13 made the Academic Dean's List for the Fall semester.

Last week, Washington College planted a new tree. In the same week, Shaila R. Aery, Maryland's Secretary of Higher Education stated that she has discussed with legislative budget committees a proposal that higher education spending be stabilized for the next three years as part of a "memorandum of understanding," for financially-strapped students. This past week also saw the emerging journalistic skills of two members of this years' illustrious freshman class. Calling themselves simply Matt and Ben, these young go-getters took it upon themselves to obtain a list of the GALA members for a future exposé to appear in the ELM. This was apparently some Lambda hazing prank. Gee, I remember the good ole days when all the Lambda pledges had to do was strip down naked on the soccer field and hump the muddy turf. But as an editor in need of writers, I've decided to hire Matt and Ben on as full-time staff writers. Their special report titled, Homophobic Meatheads on Campus will appear in next week's ELM.

Last week, Washington College planted a new tree. The Lifetime Fitness Center will open in two months. Ground-breaking for a new academic building will occur within the next year. Obviously, more students will be needed to fill the seats and exercise machines at WC. But what kind of students will they be? The bottom line at any institution is paying the bills, making ends meet. When the upper 20 percent has financial difficulty, the bottom 20 usually has no trouble making payments. You know the kind I'm talking about: the ones that fail out one semester, only to return the next. The ones that should be in day-care rather than college. The ones who get confused over knock-knock jokes.

Last week, Washington College planted a new tree. Before another brick is laid, before another tree is planted, before another "pass-through" is allowed his fifteenth chance at re-admission, WC has a very important question to answer: Are we getting bigger before we are getting better? Regardless of how nice this campus looks in five years, if good students can not afford it, they will simply "window shop" their way through Chestertown en route to another, equally prestigious, but less expensive liberal arts institution.

Last week, Washington College planted a new tree. A tree that stretches towards the sun, growing taller, stronger, better, everyday. A tree that symbolizes the foundation of George Washington's commitment to higher education. But now, in 1992 is the college in his namesake headed in the same direction? Will the class of 2050 be any more than a prestigious day-care center? Will the Sophie Kerr be awarded to a graduating Senior with "the best ability to one day spell his/her name correctly?" As the statistics indicate, all that can be avoided. Stop the babysitting. Stop the tuition hikes. Leave the ceremonies and symbolism aside. Give the future graduating classes something to toast besides a tree. Like a quality education at a reasonable cost.

Letters to the Editor

GALA Presidents Confronted by Phony ELM Reporters

Dear ELM Editor,

I am writing to express my concern about an event that happened on February 24. I was approached in the hallway of my dorm by two male students who claimed to be ELM reporters writing an article about the different clubs on campus. They asked me, as a co-president of the Gay and Lesbian Alliance, if they could ask me a few questions. Now, I know everyone on the ELM staff personally and found their request a bit suspicious, especially since GALA was featured in the ELM a few weeks ago. Nevertheless, I granted their request. I thought maybe they were interested in joining the organization but were too embarrassed to ask me about it under other auspices. The two men posed questions and diligently wrote down my responses. Then, they asked to speak to some of the members of GALA. One went so far as to request a list of our members so he could contact them for an interview. I told him that our membership list is confidential—actually, a list does not even exist. Confidentiality goes hand in hand with membership in GALA, and by keeping a list this confidentiality could be jeopardized by an incident such as this one. When I denied them the "list", the two looked rather frustrated and left.

I was informed by a legitimate ELM staff member that no such article was being written. I was later told that a student was allegedly offered bribe money to locate a GALA membership list. I was also told that the students trying to locate the list are allegedly pledges of a fraternity which was recently denied official acknowledgement by this college, and that one of their pledge requirements is to get a list of GALA members. What they planned to do with the list, I do not know. But since they attempted to procure the "list" from me through deceitful and subversive means, one can only predict that their actions would be far from courteous.

What bothers me is the fact that hateful acts such as this one occur every day at Washington College, but pass by unnoticed and unchallenged. This goes beyond the issue of freedom of expression; the behavior of the two men involved may be likened to acts of terrorism. There is a difference between graffiti on walls and someone confronting you in your own home: distrust, suspicion and fear is bred by such intolerable acts. The behavior of these two men is one of the reasons why lesbians and gays are so closeted at Washington College.

As members of the Washington College community as well as the global community, we should embrace tolerance and diversity, not hatred and deceit.

Sincerely,
Amy R. Caddle

WC Professors Publish Research

By Amanda Burt
Staff Writer

Although the pressure to publish or perish is not as urgent to Washington College professors as it is to professors at larger institutions, the productivity of faculty members at WC is not suffering. Doctors Amt and Wilson of the History department, Doctors Brien and Anderson of the Philosophy department, and Doctor Cousineau of the English department, will all have their scholarly research published. They spoke recently with the ELM to share their different projects.

Dr. Emilie M. Amt

During the past two years, Amt has been working on Women's Lives in Medieval Europe: A Source Book. It is an anthology of primary sources which focuses on the day-to-day lives of twelfth and thirteenth century women.

The anthology contains medieval documents, laws, lawsuits and records describing women's lives. Amt translated the documents from French and Latin, and it is the first book of its kind to be written in English. "There is a lot written on medieval women," she says, "but very little is available in English."

Amt is quick to note that her book is not about the lives of queens. Rather, it explores the conditions which affected the lives of ordinary women and does not limit itself to the Christian and Germanic majority. The anthology recognizes the minority, which included Jewish and Muslim women as well as women who were in heretic groups. In her research, she discovered that women were involved in a variety of activities and found their concerns to be similar to modern concerns in terms of family and business life.

"I don't reach any conclusions in my book," Amt says, "it is for students to use to reach their own conclusions." An earlier draft of the anthology was introduced in one of her courses, and she will encourage her students to use the book as a resource and tool for learning. Amt feels that publishing is part of being a good teacher, and claims that she does not feel pressure to publish.

Because her priority is teaching, most of her research must wait until summer. "It is hard to concentrate on a book when you're teaching a course," she admits. Amt collected documents in England one summer on a Faculty Enhancement Grant, and she is grateful for the college's support. The anthology will be published by Routledge in December.

Amt is also in the last stages of completing a book on Henry II of England, and another future project includes editing a set of Royal financial records.

Dr. Robert J. Anderson

'For more years than he can count,' Anderson has been working on a commentary of the Theaetetus, one of Plato's major dialogues. The book addresses two themes, one of which is a comparison of Greek mathematics with modern physics. The second considers the relation between mathematical intuition and the cognizing of perceptual objects.

In his comparison of Greek mathematics to modern physics, Anderson analyzes how the Pythagorean-Euclidean reaction to the discovery of irrational numbers differs from that of modern mathematicians such as Descartes and Newton. "All in all," Anderson says, "this project is an analysis of the consequences for modern and contemporary metaphysics of the abandonment of the ancient concept of number." He will also consider the implications these ideas have on the philosophers Frege and Wittsgenstein.

Anderson feels that his research has interacted positively with his teaching and says that WC is one of the rare colleges that takes teaching seriously. "WC has an extremely healthy conception of publishing," he notes. "Research is encouraged, perhaps expected (not necessarily as manifested in publications), and it is essential to keeping us alive as teachers."

The book will be completed by December of this year, while Anderson is on a fall sabbatical.

Dr. Kevin M. Brien

In his personal development as a philosopher, Brien finds himself attracted to Karl Marx, Friedrich Nietzsche, Martin Heidegger, and Buddha. He is currently working on a book whose goal is to transform and transcend the four different perspectives so that a fusion of the positions is possible.

Brien admits that some might consider Marx, Nietzsche, Heidegger and Buddha to be a strange combination. "I find something in all of them which is viable, though I do have serious reservations with each of them about certain ideas," he says. The Buddhist element is perhaps the most unusual, but Brien argues that the Eastern religion focuses on certain elements of the human condition which are ignored by the Western tradition.

During the summer, Brien had the opportunity to supplement his project. He attended a two-month long Nietzsche seminar at the University of Illinois with eleven other professors from around the country. There, he reread all of Nietzsche's material, an activity that he is also doing now for his Nietzsche course.

Brien believes there is a healthy pressure to engage in scholarship at WC, but he does not feel as if he must publish or perish. "I think that President Trout recognizes the different ways in which scholarship can be manifested," he says. "There is scholarship that goes into the creation of new courses and also in activities involving special panels with students on selected subjects."

Though Brien is unsure of when his book will be printed, he is familiar with the publishing process. In 1987 he completed Marx, Reason, and the Art of Freedom. On April 30, he will give a lecture at Wesley College in Delaware titled, "The Changing Face of Eastern Europe and the Meaning of Marxism."

Senior Returns from SEA Expedition

Jennifer Hannum, daughter of Mr. Richard Hannum of Boothwyn, Pennsylvania and Cathy Hannum of Mt. Laurel, New Jersey, recently returned from 6 weeks at sea learning about marine science and sailing a 125-foot research sailing vessel offshore. After 6 weeks of academic preparation ashore on the campus of the Sea Education Association (SEA) in Woods Hole, Massachusetts, she and other students from colleges across the country set sail from St. Thomas, The U.S. Virgin Islands on November 26. Their six weeks aboard the SSV WESTWARD included three brief port stops and ended in Miami on January 6.

The Washington College Senior had to fulfill responsibilities on deck, in the science laboratory and in the engine room, standing watches to take care of the 24-hour workings of the vessel. Jennifer Hannum learned to examine temperature structures, as well as chemical, biological, geological and physical differences of water masses. She also completed an independent scientific research project.

SEA is the only organization that gives undergraduate students the chance to study the deep ocean first-hand. (Some other programs use cruise ships or stay close to shore.) The Sea Semester program emphasizes the study of the marine environment; students of any discipline are encouraged to participate. The program, for which students earn a full college semester's credit, offers courses in oceanography, nautical science and maritime studies (which includes history, literature and politics).

SEA offers college semester programs 5 times a year, along a variety of cruise tracks. SEA also offers shorter educational programs for adults, high school students and teachers. For course information, people can call Judith Froman at 1-800-552-3633.

New Psi Chi Inductees

Last Monday, February 24, Psi Chi, the Psychology Honor Society, inducted thirteen new members. They are as follows. David W. Bright, Cynthia W. Burns, Abigail Clifford, Kristin L. Coyne, Shannon E. Cupka, Franci L. Green, Sally L. Haynsworth, Dawn M. Manion, Marie M. Mohler, Gretchen C. Rogers, Christian L. Rummell, Erin E. Talbert, Christine M. Webb.

Pi Sigma Alpha Members, for Second Year

The Sigma Beta Chapter of Pi Sigma Alpha, the National Political Science Honor Society, recently inducted new members for the spring semester. Pi Sigma Alpha is dedicated to "stimulating productive scholarship and intelligent interest in the subject of government."

The Washington College Chapter of Pi Sigma Alpha was established last spring as the result of the efforts of Dr. Dan Premo, chair of the Political Science Department, and Dr. John Taylor, who was acting chair of the department last spring while Premo was on a sabbatical leave.

The newly inducted student members for the spring of 1992 are: Jennifer Albers, John Beachley, Michelle Beattie, Steve Boucher, Lori Hastings, Cathy Lease, Sandra McLelland, Suzanne Mazzullo, Karen Reck, Stephanie Sherwell, Jennifer Sloan, and Stephanie Tennyson. Only three members who were inducted last year still remain at the college. These are: Brooke Frank, John Griep, and Kim Millender.

Party's Over For Another Underage Drinker

To the Editor,

I have been instructed by The Honorable Judge Thomas Sisk, to address the subject of truthfulness, specifically the responsibility of truthfulness. I have been given this judgement due to the fact that I attempted to enter a class D tavern (one where people drink heavily) under the age of twenty-one.

I think it is the responsibility of everyone to be truthful. Without truthfulness, we would never be able to get anything accomplished in life. We all usually assume our friends are truthful. However, when we are assuming they are being truthful it is because we are also assuming they are being responsible enough to tell us the truth. There are times when we jokingly might not tell the truth, but to deliberately and constantly avoid the truth is a bad thing. When we ask someone a question, we hope they will give us a truthful response. If one goes around being dishonest then how can he or she expect others to be honest to them. Without faith in truthfulness we would have a much weaker society. I think this is a very important subject but I am not going to dwell on it. When one is paying $18,000 a year, he or she should understand this idea. However, the problem is not understanding it, but forgetting it at times as I did. I will tell you the truth of my case, since the truth is the important thing.

The truth is I wanted to go out and have a good time. As the Great Pharaoh Benjamin T. Hinkle once said, "good friends, good beer, and drunk women spell out a good evening." My first class was not until one o'clock on Thursday and since nothing really exciting takes place at the WAC during the week, I thought I would venture out to Newt's. Not thinking of the harm I could bring to Newt's by sneaking in with a fake ID, I planned to go out. A good majority of my fraternity brothers are over twenty-one and I wanted to go out with them. The social atmosphere on this campus is not there. Any exciting social activity takes place off campus because the school bears down on the fraternities so much. Josephine The Fly calls this school "WAC HELL." The great Pharaoh Benjamin T. Hinkle would add to this saying, "to hell with the WAC, let's throw a Farm Party." That is the truth of the matter. The parties and events people talk about are those that take place off campus. Maybe if the school would lighten up on the Frats and let them throw more substantial parties, people would stop trying to go to the bars all the time.

I made my I.D. and was on my way. Unfortunately I did not know Mr. Stetson was on the prowl looking for fresh kills. Walking up by myself, I thought I might get turned down, but to my surprise Mr. Stetson was lurking behind John Naundorf, the owner of Newts. Mr. Naundorf turned down my ID as he should have since it was a feeble job, and Mr. Stetson took pleasure in writing me up for my fine. To his unfortunate pleasure I was not actually attempting to buy alcohol so he could only get me for attempting to enter. For those who are not keeping up, Mr. Stetson is the Liquor Inspector of Chestertown. I was untruthful and so I paid my fifty dollars and got to work with WAC's maintenance staff. Snoops, Snake, and Jimmy often reminded me of the ignorance and dishonesty of the act I tried to get away with.

I got caught and that is the truth of the matter. Most of us here at the WAC are old enough to know what being truthful means. We also know that there are those natural instincts that we as human beings are sometimes going to use in place of truthfulness at times. This was one of those times. I will truthfully be at Newts when I turn twenty-one.

Sincerely,
William E. Bloom

Environment Meets Liberal Arts?

By Julie Greene
Senior Office Manager

The possibility of Washington College starting a Chesapeake Regional Studies Program has been discussed among the college community on several occasions, including during the Wye retreat in January. Whether or not this program will ever be enstated remains to be seen; however, many courses in the current curriculum could contribute to such a program.

Recently the issue was discussed again when Dr. Peter Brown, Director of Public Affairs at University of Maryland, College Park, talked with interested students and faculty about College Park's environmental policy track. It was suggested that students who wanted to continue their education in the direction of environmental studies may want to take more varied courses during their undergraduate studies instead of focusing on a specialization. Since Washington College is a liberal arts institution and is located in an environmentally advantageous region, WC would be considered ideal for starting a preparatory program for these students.

Dr. Brown suggested that faculty involved with UMCP's program should visit WC's students earlier during their undergraduate studies, while they are freshmen and sophomores. These students would be encouraged to take more disciplined science courses, such as general biology, as well as to take some economics and philosophy courses.

Two selected topics courses being provided this spring involve environmental studies. The first is Dr. Donald Munson's Conservation in America: Past and Present. Although the course was described in the Spring Course List as an upper level honors Biology class, it is really for anyone seriously interested in environmental studies and does not require a great deal of technical science. The course covers literature relative to the environment by such authors as David Thoreau, John Muir and Aldo Leopold.

Although the course itself does not focus on the Chesapeake Bay, Munson assumes the Regional Studies Program would. He added that if a Regional Studies Program is enstated here, it would be studies, not sciences alone. "It is important for academics to recognize that the disciplines do intertwine."

John Naundorf, NEWT's Owner, Responds to Recent Letters

Dear Washington College,

First of all we at NEWT'S would like to express our gratitude to you for your tremendous support. We hope that we will continue to see you out at NEWT'S.

Unfortunately, we have become aware of certain rumors that have been going around concerning our establishment. We would like to take this chance to publicly set the record straight concerning our policies and procedures, and to hopefully lay to rest any questions concerning the integrity of our business.

It has come to our attention that various elements in both the College community and the Chestertown community are under the impression that NEWT'S allows underage drinkers in our establishment. We at NEWT'S have always been and will continue to be in accordance with all local, state and federal laws concerning underage drinking. We consider it a very serious problem and have always, to the best of our ability, taken steps to eliminate it from our business. At NEWT'S we have required all employees attend various classes in detection of fake ID's, or have issued the appropriate material to those who couldn't attend the classes. We keep a current issue of the ID manual in the bar at all times, and have always made ourselves readily available to examination, either announced or unannounced, by the Liquor Control Inspector, Chief Stetson. We are very proud to report that there has never been an arrest for underage drinking in NEWT'S.

However, we are aware of the realities of the situation. Therefore we would like to take this chance to pass a message to the student population at Washington College: If you are underage, please do not attempt to gain entrance into our establishment with a fake ID. We at NEWT'S beg you not to risk your academic career or your legal record in order to party with your friends. We would like to remind you that possession of a fake ID is against the law and punishable by fines, probation and even denial of a driver's license. A second offense is punishable by incarceration. Please do not attempt to use a fake ID. You will be caught.

In addition to the risks you run, if you are caught in NEWT'S with a fake ID we risk forfeiture of our liquor license and the continued operation of NEWT'S. In effect, you not only risk yourself, but you risk the livelihood of the employees of NEWT'S. We urge you to consider the consequences of your actions.

We would therefore like to take this opportunity to ask for your input in helping us to find a solution to this problem. Please contact us at 778-9819 with any ideas or suggestions that you might have. We are committed to solving this problem, but we need your help.

Thanks again for your support,

ELM Exclusive Interview:
Dr. John Cumberland on Environmental Economics at WC

The second new course being offered this spring is Environmental Economics, being taught by Visiting Professor Dr. John Cumberland. Dr. Cumberland has recently resigned from the University of Maryland, College Park and is working with professionals from various disciplines at University of Maryland's environmental / estuarine studies laboratory on Solomons Island. Julie Greene, Senior Office Manager of the ELM, recently spoke with Dr. Cumberland concerning his involvement and interest in Environmental Studies at Washington College.

Julie Greene: What brought you to Washington College to teach Environmental Economics?

John Cumberland: Dr. [Davy] McCall and I were good friends as graduate students, in graduate school at Harvard, in 1947-50, and have remained professional colleagues since then. After my retirement from College Park, he asked me if I'd be willing to come over here and teach a course on Environmental Economics. I've always admired Washington College, and so I eagerly accepted his invitation.

Greene: What is your background in economics and where did you get your interest in environmental economics?

Cumberland: I began as a classical and neoclassical economist, by training in the Keynesian tradition of growth. Growth was regarded as an answer to problems of poverty..., but when I returned to this area after going to graduate school, returned to some areas I loved as a child around the Chesapeake Bay, I saw how much damaged had occurred as a result of the development and growth, the very things that I'd been taught. I felt a very serious conflict between conventional economics and what I saw as the consequences of this growth. So I and others tried to develop a new approach in which we would measure some of the unforeseen, unanticipated costs of development as needed for a sustaining environment.

Greene: I know Washington College is trying to start an environmental studies program, and your course is part of that. Dr. Peter Brown was here recently and encouraged students to explore College Park's environmental policy track. He expressed an interest in starting a program here at WC, where he would come over and start talking to freshman and sophomores about preparing for graduate studies concerning the environment. and he emphasized that he didn't exactly want students to focus on a concentration, but to spread out and take some serious science classes, some economics classes, and some philosophy classes. Having taught at College Park, and teaching currently at WC, how do you feel such a program would be accepted by the faculty and students?

Cumberland: I can't speak for the faculty and students here, except for the ones with whom I've worked with on this program. And those with whom I've worked are very enthusiastic about it and I think it can make a great contribution to the students and to teaching programs here at WC. The way people advance their academic discipline and can learn to apply interdisciplinary methods is by working on some high priority, real world problem. The management, protection, and restoration of the Chesapeake Bay is such a high priority problem and it's an ideal way of bringing people together from many different disciplines. Requiring them to learn something about the varying disciplines and applying them to a prime, common interest. I think the potential is very great and the location is ideal. All the basic programs are already in place at WC. There is a very high quality faculty, most of whom are personally concerned about the issue, so it seems to me to be an ideal way of meeting the needs of the students, carrying out other WC objectives such as remaining responsive to the community's interests.

Now that the Cold War is over, environmental problems all over the world seem to me to have risen to the top of the agenda, so that what is learned here at WC will have a much broader, global applicability. There is so much worth saving here in Chestertown and on the Chester River.

As I compare this area with the area where I live at Solomons - in Southern Maryland, you are in a remarkably good position because you've been spared most of the excesses of development. At Solomons there are very large condominium developments. Much of the character of Solomons as a fishing village with high environmental quality has been lost because of overdevelopment, unwise land use, extensive land use, in areas that are environmentally sensitive where density should have been kept alone. So far you've been spared that here. I believe that land use, planning and zoning are the key to protecting water as well as land resources. That, plus historic preservation should be a major part of an environmental Chesapeake Studies Program that is adopted here at WC.

Greene: You said that WC had a good foundation of courses already laid for environmental studies. How would you say WC is developing its program for environmental studies compared to other colleges in the region? Are most colleges adapting to this?

Cumberland: I know of a few students, young people, properly very concerned about environmental issues, students with interest to do some environmental studies programs at College Park and, of course, at a large state university, where there is room for many programs. But another small college, comparable to WC is Saint Mary's College, on the St. Mary's River in St. Mary's County. There they have an active environmental program, ecological program, that, I believe, is the most popular of the curricula available. It needn't be inordinately expensive, because, having already the basic courses in place, what is needed is mainly coordination, focus.

So, in these days when budgets are a problem everywhere, adopting some common focus like environmental studies-it synthesizes existing programs, you're now adding more into resource requirements. That is one of the best ways of improving academic quality and meeting the needs of the students.

Greene: Environmental studies can't just be economists, and it can't just be scientists, it has to be spread out; it has to be very interdisciplinary. In your experience working with these professionals, is there a lot of cooperation?

Cumberland: Yes, there has to be multidisciplinary, or as we like to call it, transdisciplinary research on environmental issues because economists have traditionally emphasized only one objective, that's economic efficiency and cost effectiveness, but we know that society isn't interested only in efficiency, that they're concerned that environmental programs also be equitable and fair, that they be based on sound, scientific footings, and that they be acceptable politically, and to all the interest groups that have a legitimate involvement. So, just as economics alone, or biology, or ecology alone, provide only a partial view, there has to be a coming together and a synthesis that will be more than the sum of the individual parts. And that can be done by working together on some common problem as I indicated, such as the almost universal concern about environmental quality and sustainability.

WC's Publishing Professors

Dr. Thomas J. Cousineau

As a distinguished Samuel Beckett scholar, Cousineau recognizes that there is resistance among colleagues to teach Beckett's trilogy of novels, Molloy, Malone Dies, and The Unnamable. With the publication of his book, Beckett's Trilogy: Representation and Performance, Cousineau hopes to make the trilogy more accessible to the general reader while providing important psychoanalytic and feminist readings of Beckett's work.

One aspect of the book will focus on the relationship between Beckett and James Joyce. Joyce's Ulysses is an epic novel which rewrites Odysseus' journey, and Beckett makes a similar attempt to rewrite ancient literature in the trilogy. This archaeological aspect of recreating ancient stories in different forms is explored by modern poets such as T.S. Eliot and Ezra Pound.

Beckett also represents the phases of human history in a manner which parallels Joyce in Finnegan's Wake. The trilogy progresses from periods characterized by matriarchal and patriarchal civilization in Molloy, to a more modern alienated individual in Malone Dies. It finally reaches a phase which is beyond individual identity in The Unnamable.

Beckett's language sounds much like gibberish in The Unnamable. "It is a language which doesn't deal with superficial representations," Cousineau says. "The best way to understand Beckett is to listen performers speak his language." He claims that the reader must interpret Beckett in the same way that a performer interprets a musical score.

Though Cousineau does very little of his writing during the school year, he finds that there is a reciprocal relation between teaching and research. He is able to experiment with his ideas in the classroom, and it is often in the classroom that he does his best writing. In addition to the positive influence his research has on instruction, he feels that publishing is one way to maintain contact with other scholars.

Cousineau hopes to finish the book within the next two years and says that a University Press has shown interest in his work on the trilogy. Next year, one of his essays on Beckett will be reprinted in the Journal of Beckett Studies.

Dr. Carol Wilson

Last fall, Wilson became a member of the WC faculty, and though she just recently completed her graduate work, she will have her doctoral thesis published as a book. Its focus is the kidnapping of free blacks into slavery before the Civil War in the United States.

When she first approached the project, Wilson was curious to discover why kidnapping happened. In her research, she found that while the number of kidnapping cases was overwhelming, there was little written on the subject. She says that her thesis is being published in response to a need for more literature on the topic.

Kidnapping on the eastern shore, including Maryland and Delaware, has an interesting history. "There was a gang led by a woman named Patty Cannon, and they would kidnap blacks and sell them to slave owners," she says. The gang had a house in Reliance, Delaware, which sat on the border of Maryland. The location made it easier for them to evade authorities in one state and enter the other state, where they were temporarily safe.

The gang would also offer poor or young blacks jobs under false pretenses. Once the blacks agreed to work for the gang, they would be sold as slaves. Since blacks had no rights under the law, there was no way to prove that they were free. Most could not afford an attorney, so they remained slaves.

Wilson is currently teaching courses in African American history from 1865 until present and South African history. She cannot imagine having a better job, and she feels that teaching and publishing complement each other. "I don't feel pressure to publish, but I think it is expected," she notes. "Teaching is more expected here." Although she comes from a larger environment that trained her to publish, she says that she enjoys her research and looks forward to summer breaks as an opportunity to work on projects.

Her book on the kidnapping of free blacks will be published by the University of Kentucky Press, and she hopes that it will be ready for publication by 1993.

Students Attend Mock UN

Committee recalled, "Insults flew back and forth between the Middle Eastern countries and Israeli sympathizers. There was a lot of cheering after each insult. Finally, some Israeli 'terrorists' kidnapped a Palestinian sympathizer".

Skip Gibson of the International Atomic Energy Agency claimed "much of the hostility and frustration arose from the dual use of nuclear reactors for weapons and energy". Industrial countries such as the United States, the former USSR and the United Kingdom seemed to have a monopoly on such power, while countries such as Afghanistan do not have the monetary resources to build even one reactor. This factor made reaching a resolution quite hard. Yet, as Professor Shad of the International Studies Department stated, "The students were allowed the chance to participate in an international exchange and reach a resolution about the issue at hand. In the real United Nations, a resolution is almost never reached. The higher the level of frustration experienced, the more realistic the experience."

The trip proved to be a success in both the student's and faculty's minds. As Dr. Premo, Chair of International Studies and Political Science Departments stated, "It provided the students a chance to participate in a diplomatic political process with students from some of the finest colleges in the United States". Perhaps Jessica Aspiazu states the experience best, "We had a great time. We learned a lot, ate at a different international restaurant each night and met people from around the country and the world. It was a lot of work and frustration, but it was definitely worth it".

Scott R. Koon, Presidential Candidate

My name's Scott Koon. Many of you probably don't know me by name. I'm 23 years old, a first semester sophomore and I've never held any position in the SGA. I'm running for SGA president because I believe it's time for a real change in the way students interact with the administration. The same problem which exists in Washington, DC exists here-only in microcosm. It's the same old story repeated countless times through the year-you or someone you know reports a problem to a dorm senator. And then you wait- and wait, and wait. Finally word gets back to you that your problem is unsolvable to your satisfaction. Then there's another problem, and the same thing happens again-namely, you get stonewalled. Finally you give up on the system altogether.

Need this be the case? Thankfully, no. The problem is not the system so much as the people running it. The SGA need not be made up of timeservers who rarely attend its meetings and seldom bother to post the SGA minutes. An SGA officer need not be a 21 year old senior who is too busy writing a thesis to give the job the attention it deserves. Another disadvantage of seniors is that they're lame ducks from the day that they're elected. A lame duck doesn't have to worry about re-election because they can't run for re-election anyway.

As an underclassman I'll be able to devote the time and effort to the job of representing every Washington College student. I have the drive necessary to get things done-last semester I made Dean's List while working 40 hours a week at Dixon Valve and Coupling Company. I'll also bring my long standing commitment to the Kent County community to the post and thereby seek to break down the barriers which exist between students and Chestertown residents. It is also critically important to again address the issues of date rape and other acts of violence against women. There are a number of programs at other colleges which would be far more effective than ignoring the issue and hoping the problem will disappear by itself. I would also like to see mandatory expulsion from WC instituted uniformly for every instance of plagiarism. The academic integrity of our school is far too important to risk.

Although heading sessions of the SGA and appearing at various functions are the two most visible duties of the office of SGA president, they are not its most important. An SGA president must be someone who is accessible to hear the concerns of the student body and who is resourceful and determined enough to bring about real solutions to real problems. As a candidate for SGA president the only promise I am making is that you will never hear me say "I'm sorry, but there's nothing I can do about it."

Jen Del Nero, Presidential Candidate

The student voice is more powerful than students assume. It has the power to demand the Academic Council be comprised of equal numbers of students and faculty representatives. It has the power to lobby and win the battle for a student activities director. In essence, the student voice has as much power as students grant it.

We need an SGA President who is aware of the strength of the student voice.

In the next few years, Washington College will be evaluated by Middle States for re-accredidation. We need an SGA President who will insist on student participation in that process.

We need an SGA President who recognizes leadership potential and who encourages involvement. The most effective leader delegates responsibility and uses students' strengths. In that respect, the SGA President must be an excellent communicator and able to motivate people to work with her.

These are all qualities that I possess. They are qualities I have exhibited in my three years' experience with WC and the SGA as a leader. Presently, I am SGA Secretary, chair of the student subcommittee in the Provost Dean search, and WC's representative to the Maryland Higher Education Commission.

Besides possessing essential leadership qualities, the SGA President must be able to identify overt and covert issues affecting students.

For example, students must keep track of projects like the Hodson Hall renovation, slated for completion in Spring '91. In Spring '92, only half the work is done. If student-oriented projects are not followed, they will slide off the College's priority list. The SGA and SGA President must be willing to fight for such student facilities.

Another concern is the College's Long Range Project Planning Committee, which will be chaired by the new Provost Dean and include three student voices. The SGA President must be committed to this group, instrumental in future College policies. The College lacks a clear vision for the next century, particularly as it contemplates increasing enrollment. With an increased enrollment there will be a more diverse population on campus. With an increased enrollment there will be more financial resources available to expand academic programs. Student input must be considered as the College confronts these changes.

These are just of few of the concerns that should occupy the minds of students, the SGA, and the SGA President. Other issues include deferred maintenance in dorms, campus accessibility, the Honor Code, all issues which presently lack a substantial vision.

As SGA President, I will work with the Executive Board, the SGA, students, faculty members, administrators, and Board members to offer solutions and create visions for the College and these issues.

Doug Smith, Vice-Pres. Candidate

Everybody sits around and complains about how things are, but nobody really tries to do anything about it. My name is Doug Smith, and if elected to the position of SGA Vice-President, I hope to do something about it. I am currently a junior, and have been a Dean's List student for the past two semesters. I also work as a volunteer tutor with students from Chestertown Middle and Garnett Elementary schools.

I have no prior experience working with the SGA, but, as the saying goes, a new broom sweeps clean. Student government should not be the same people scratching each other's backs for four years. As an outside candidate, if elected, I would try to bring a wider diversity to the SGA, and also attempt to bridge the gaps between partisan student groups.

My goal in running for Vice-President is to increase student participation in the academic process at Washington College. I would like to involve the students more in the actual selection of course offerings and the hiring of professors. The actual campus has been renovated, but to become a better school we must strive to continually upgrade and challenge our education. Why settle for the same old thing in a prettier package?

I would also like to see a more mature social awareness at Washington College. There should be better organized and more comprehensive mandatory educational seminars on date rape and on alcohol awareness for incoming freshmen. Special effort should also be taken to intersperse freshmen with upperclassmen on residence halls; the older students would then be able to set a direct example for new ones. An increase in co-educational halls should also be taken into account. Having lived on a co-ed hall, I can say from experience that it is more conducive to academics.

Thank you for your consideration, and I hope everyone will get out to vote on Wednesday, March 4th.

Whitney Myrus, Vice-Pres. Candidate

The SGA has a continuing need for leaders with Rational Passion and Demonstrated Leadership Ability. Leaders who are Rational are Logical, Calm and Wise. While a leader also needs to be Passionate, that is Caring, Enthusiastic and have a Sense of Humor while also having an unquenchable Vitality. Demonstrated Leadership ability would include areas of proven success in Representation, Participation, Flexibility while willing to Speak Out and take a Stand, Stability, Dependability and Persistence. The true leader is willing to work for the Good of the Group and not the Glory of the Individual.

In the past three years Whitney White Myrus has proven how he fills these criteria. Why else would he have been elected Class President the past two years in a row. Be asked to participate on the Board of Visitors & Governors Student Affairs Committee and the Buildings & Grounds Committee. Whitney has also participated as a student representative on the Committee on Academic Technology and just recently been asked to be the chairman on the subcommittee concerned with the new faculty evaluation form. As well Whit has been a continued active voice as a senator of the SGA for the past two years.

The participation and contact Whit has made with the Administration, Faculty and Staff of Washington College has made it possible for Whit to have a good rapport with these individuals. Whit's positive and active participation in the college community has also earned their respect. Which leads to the needed contact a student leader must have to be successful.

Whitney has a continued goal for complete student representation in all areas of Washington College life. Also a concern of what will happen today as well as tomorrow at Washington College. A continued strong student leader is need and Whitney has proven he fits the bill.

Whit's active and outstanding performance in the Naval Reserve has given him administrative skills and coping skills necessary to deal with uncertainty. Whit's coping skills, listening skills and ability to deal with difficult circumstances are what stood out above the rest, which earned him the position as a Resident Advisor.

The future of tomorrows SGA is the Rational Passion of the Demonstrated leader in Whitney White Myrus. On March 4 vote Whit for Vice President of the executive board.

GO WITH THE WHIT.

Christy Albright, Vice-Pres. Candidate

It was a typical humid day in late August when I first began my experience at Washington College as a freshman. While I have matured a great deal since that time, I still find myself seeing things with the thirst of a freshman trying to absorb each new experience. And although I have spent much of my time here dodging mud puddles and ducking out of bulldozers way I have remained optimistic about what was to come at the end of it all.

As a candidate running for the office of Vice President of our Student Government Association I feel that it is such qualities as enthusiasm in viewing new experiences and optimism in positive change that are most valuable for a person in this position. The Vice President is not the leader of the student body but someone who plays a more "behind the scenes" role. He or she is someone who need not list a lengthy set of qualifications but rather be an effective communicator with the motivation and ability to work closely with faculty and administration as well as with the other members of the executive board.

As someone who has worked with the Student Government Association for the past three years I can say that I have the interest and ability to fill an executive board position and, coupled with my optimism and enthusiasm, to be your next Vice President.

The Washington College Debate Society is holding its first debate on Thursday, March 5, 1992 at 8:00 p.m. in the Foyer of the Casey Academic Center. All students are encouraged to attend.

Topic: "This house will ban the Greek system."

Debaters: Will Brandenburg, Chris Kleberg, Roxanne Seubert, Ciaran O'Keefe

Lionel Dyson, Vice-Pres. Candidate

My name is Lionel A. Dyson, and I am a candidate for SGA Vice-President. The Vice-Presidency of the SGA is a position of enormous responsibility and significance to the Student Body of Washington College. Such responsibility must not be vested carelessly and should not be undertaken lightly. The man or woman who becomes SGA Vice-President will have the privilege of representing the views of the Student Body in numerous important capacities. This representation is especially important in that it necessitates a sense of diplomacy and tact vital to addressing pertinent issues that are often of a serious and delicate nature. The character of the Vice-President must be of the highest caliber and he or she must exercise the utmost discretion in conducting the duties of the office. Furthermore, the responsibilities of the Vice-President, while no less important, are generally of a lower profile than those of the president. They are often of a "behind-the-scenes" nature, demanding a sense of selflessness of the officer. For the true reward of the Vice-President of the Student Government Association is the knowledge that he or she has executed the demands of the office with the interests of the Student Body of Washington College foremost in his or her mind. I feel confident that I exemplify all of the characteristics demanded of the Vice-President. Moreover, I would readily accept the responsibilities of the office and perform them with the alacrity and efficiency with which I accept all other academic, social, and extra-curricular responsibilities.

Article 3, Section 1, Sub-heading 'b' of the Student Government Constitution of Washington College lists the responsibilities of the Vice-President . I have had this memorized for the past school year to fulfill my responsibilities as current SGA Executive Council Parliamentarian. I have also held the position of Freshman Class President (for which I coordinated the 1991 Birthday Ball). I was the Freshman Class Representative on the Ad-Hoc Committee for Student Affairs. I worked with Kevin Kelly and Brian Gimelson to create the Charles H. Trout Committee on Undergraduate Research, which I have been the chairperson of since its inception last year. I am also the current President of the Sophomore Class. In this capacity, I coordinated this year's Campus Blood Drive and, I instituted a Student Escort Service to assist campus security. The purpose of the above paragraph is not to appear vain, but rather to demonstrate that I take my responsibilities seriously. No one can know with any certainty what challenges lie ahead for the S.G.A., but everyone knows how important solid leadership is to a successful organization. I am eminently qualified to provide such leadership as Vice-President of the Student Government Association, and I hope that you, the Student Body, feel the same. Thank You.

John Phoebus, Candidate for Treasurer

Hello, my name is John Phoebus, and I hope to be your SGA Treasurer next year. Why should you elect me Treasurer? In one word, experience — I have the experience it will take to make next year one of the most active years ever for the student body at Washington College. But how much experience does one need to be Treasurer? More than you may think. Next year's SGA budget will be larger than ever and will require a Treasurer with experience in allocating and managing money within the SGA to make the best use of this increase. I have held an elected position in SGA since I have been at WC and, in these two years, I have served on the Organizations Committee, which handles the fund allocation to clubs on campus. As Treasurer of Hands Out, I have successfully managed the finances of a campus organization.

Pending acceptance of the proposed activities fee increase, the SGA will effectively double its budget for next year to approximately $82,500. Such a substantial increase places Washington College's SGA closer to par with those of comparable institutions who are able to sponsor more activities and clubs. A portion of this increase should go to the Office of Student Activities, which brought the C.I.A. and the Comedy Club to WC last semester. With a larger budget, they will be able to support events of greater social benefit to the college. Club funding will be substantially increased so that students' individual needs may be met through a variety of SGA sponsored organizations, such as the Dale Adams Heritage Society, Hands Out, and Rugby. Through my past SGA experience, I am equipped to ensure that the budget increase is most beneficial to the student body.

My experience stretches beyond just the SGA, however. As a Resident Assistant, I work closely with the Office of Student Affairs and various other campus offices. I feel that it is the responsibility of officers and all SGA representatives to act as a liaison between the students, faculty, and administration. My familiarity with the members of the Washington College administration will assist me in this task, enabling me to immediately begin the work of the Executive Council without the need to establish these connections.

In the past two years, the SGA has taken a more active position on campus, securing student representation on the Academic Council, encouraging the hiring of a Director of Student Activities, and taking strong positions on student issues. Currently, the SGA is involved in pressing the faculty to seek student input on the new controversial course evaluation forms. Active in the SGA since election in my freshman year, I have and will continue to be an effective representative of student views on these important issues.

When you vote this Wednesday, by choosing me, you can be assured you will have selected the best and most effective candidate for Treasurer.

Kristen Kujawski, Secretarial Candidate

Kristen Kujawski, a candidate for the position of Secretary, is studying abroad this semester, and could not be contacted in time for this supplement.

Tammie Michener & David George, Social Chair Candidates

Hi! I'm Tammie Michener, and along with David George, I will be running for S.G.A. Social Chair. I am a second semester junior, a member of Zeta Tau Alpha, and a member of the C.I.A. (Campus Involvement and Activities). In particular, I am the Comedy Club chairperson and I'm responsible for bringing comedy to the campus on Wednesday nights. David George is a second semester freshman, is on the Dean's List, and is the Daytime Activities chairperson of the C.I.A. Although he is only a freshman, Dave brings experience as he was the Student Body President of Calvert Hall High School last year. Through the C.I.A, activities such as caricaturists, fortune tellers, coffee house bands, comedians, trips to D.C. and New York, and before the end of the semester there will be even more surprises. So put away those suitcases, stay here on the weekends, and make some memories with us.

Amy McCleary, Secretarial Candidate

"You've Heard It Through the Grapevine"

No cheering, no shouting, no fanfare please,
While I'm here at the "mic,"
I'd like to introduce myself -
It's AMY MCCLEARY here!

The grapevine is a wonderful vehicle,
It brought the news of my candidacy -
Right to the ELM,
Straight from the courts and the fields!

For three years I've been your friend and teammate!
Every year I've held a distinct position,
Each having a specific mission -
From Dorm Senator of Queen Anne and Reid -
To this year being member of and following the All-Campus Judiciary creed!

I want to be the SGA's Secretary, which some of you may think is scary!
Give me the chance and I'll prove you wrong,
With the positions I've held and my positive attitude which is strong!

Whether you consider yourself to be tall, short, slim, or stout!
President Kevin "Sparky" Kelly says, "SGA is what it's all about!"

A plea to the student body,
Endorsed by me -
Please come to the election booth and vote for Amy!

Jen Del Nero, Christy, and me
Close as can be,
We can make a great team
Yeah, Jen, Christy, and me!

You ask me if I'm organized?
And I'll tell you straight on "YES!"
Now if you check with my roommate,
She'll say my side of the room is an awful mess!

We'll miss you "Sparky,"
You've been a great friend,
Come back once in a while
To check on our style!

I wish Skip and Kristen luck, too -
And hope next year will be a good one for you!
AND REMEMBER YOU HEARD IT THROUGH THE GRAPEVINE!

SGA Report

The Washington College Senate met on Tuesday, February 25 in the Casey Forum after a one-week hiatus.

March 27 Benefit for Maint. Worker:

SGA Says, "No Competing Events"

The Senate approved a recommendation to donate the revenues from the March 27th band in the CoffeeHouse to assist groundskeeper John Marcus. Marcus is the maintenance worker whose house burned to the ground in the early morning hours of Saturday, February 15th. The Senate and SGA Executive Board has asked that organizations do not schedule any other events for that night in order to ensure the best possible turnout for this important fundraiser.

Subcommittee to Revise Prof. Eval. Forms

Senator John Phoebus submitted copies of his proposal for the SGA to support a student movement to "abstain from the completion and submission" of the new evaluation forms. Phoebus believes that students should not fill out the new forms until they are amended in such a way as to preserve student anonymity and provide student input.

SGA Vice President John Kelly told the Senate that the Executive Board recommended that the SGA form a student subcommittee to work with the Appointments and Tenure Committee in revising the latest forms. Kelly felt that a more diplomatic means of achieving student input might be more effective. Senator Whitney Myrus moved that such a subcommittee be formed. The subcommittee will work with the Appointments and Tenure Committee or consider changes on its own if students are not allowed to contribute to a revision process. Senator Myrus was appointed to chair the subcommittee.

Student Activity Fee Incr. Pending

SGA President Kevin Kelly and Treasurer Brian Gimelson discussed the SGA proposal for a student activity fee increase with members of the Board of Visitors and Governors at their meeting on Saturday, February 22. The Board has yet to make its final decision on the budget.

Escort Service Vols. to Train

Senator John Phoebus announced that there will be a training session for escort service volunteers on Thursday at 7 p.m. SCC Chair Jen Hannum asked whether self-defense classes would be held. Senator Christy Albright reported that a self-defense workshop held last semester was poorly attended.

Additional Funding Requests

Allocations of $500 to the Young Democrats and $600 for the Comedy Club were approved by the Senate. A request of $900 from the Men's Lacrosse Club was tabled until next week's meeting.

Convocation: Women Honored, Tulip-Poplar Dedicated

Lorimer became the youngest and the first female president of Randolph-Macon Woman's College, a liberal arts school in Lynchburg, Virginia, which this year is celebrating its 100th anniversary. Lorimer, who was graduated as valedictorian from another women's college, Hollins, in 1974, earned her law degree at Yale. Randolph-Macon won her over, she says, because she is "a real believer in women's education." President Lorimer has said her institution's goal for its second century is to provide women with not only a superb liberal arts education but also the opportunity to envision what a woman can do for society and for her community.

The third recipient, Marian Wright Edelman, president and founder of the Children's Defense Fund, began her campaign for children in the mid-1960s when, as the first black woman admitted to the Mississippi bar, she directed the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund in Jackson. She has also played an important role in establishing the Head Start and Children's Defense Fund. The Children's Defense Fund, a national nonprofit child advocacy organization, encourages preventive investment in children, as an investment in the nation's future, through long-term programs such as Head Start and through policies that address prenatal care, immunization, and proper nutrition.

The Award for Excellence was presented to Martine van Hamel, recognized as one of America's most eloquent and leading ballerinas. A dancer with the American Ballet Theatre for many years, van Hamel recently formed her own small dance company, New Amsterdam Ballet (of which she is Artistic Director), which the New York Times praised for "the intelligence of its choreography, programming, and dancers." In 1986, she received the CUE magazine award for outstanding dancer of the year, and in 1983 the DANCE magazine award for dedication to, and enrichment of, the art of ballet. Her brief rendition of The Dying Swan (Music by Camille Saint Saens) at the conclusion of Convocation was perhaps the most beautiful and striking performance ever to grace the stage of Tawes Theatre.

Immediately following Convocation, the procession moved to the Campus Lawn in front of East Hall, approximately thirty yards away from the Washington statue, for the dedication of the college's new tree, the Tulip-Poplar. This tree, replacing the Elm which died last summer, stands 27 feet tall, but should reach heights of 160 to 180 feet. President Trout described the dedication as "a moment of great joy" for the college community. Neil W. Horstman, Resident Director of Mount Vernon, where the tree came from as a gift from the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association, added, "this tree renews a tie between our two institutions...a tie of spirit between George Washington and his commitment to education."

A&E

Back in the Saddle Again

By Rachael Fink
Staff Writer

Will Phipps, in conjunction with the manager of Crimson Stables, is offering students riding lessons or, for those already accomplished at riding, time on a horse. Phipps is encouraged by the positive response so far and hopes that more people will take time to go out and ride the horses.

At any time of the day, every day except Sunday, there are three trainers on the farm ready to assist the novice rider and the advanced as well. The SGA has provided money to cover half the cost of the lessons bringing each one to between $5 and $10. Both Western and English riding is offered and Phipps urges everyone to take advantage of this opportunity.

In the future Phipps hopes to organize a club and participate in local competitions. Leigh Castle, the manager of Crimson Stables, is planning to hold several clinics in the spring and hopes that these will increase the interest in riding. For more information, contact Will Phipps through student mail or call the stables at 778-7304 and, to quote Phipps himself, "Come on out!"

Student Profile:
Ann Veiga

This week we at A&E introduce a new column. The powers that be at W.C. believe, with good reason, that athletes are not the only people who deserve recognition for their efforts and achievement. So we're dedicating this space each week to those men and women who go beyond just passing classes.

Senior English major Ann Veiga is not a woman with a lot of free time on her hands. She is the president of two clubs, Terra Firma, the campus environmental organization; and the Washington College chapter of SANE/Freeze, a peace group. In addition to this, Ann co-edits a children's literary magazine, Shoestrings, with fellow senior Keri Nygaard. Ann is also an active member of the Writers' Union.

Ann lives in the Annapolis area, and before coming to Washington College last fall, she attended Anne Arundel Community College, where she was the Student Body President.

Ann plans to spend the fall semester abroad in Thailand next year while writing her thesis. After graduation, Ann plans to join the Peace Corps or a similar organization.

The Cast of Langford's Burn This

By Rachael Fink
Staff Writer

After the romance and beautiful words of Cyrano, the Drama Department has decided to take a reality break in the form of Langford Wilson's Burn This. It is a play about love, but not something to watch on Valentine's Day. It's love in the real world, with very real people loving, hating and losing. According to Stephanie Hess, the director, Burn This is about "discovering artistic freedom and passion. It's about mirrors and turning mirrors inside oneself. It's about giving up the comfortable and easy to accept a challenge, an extremely exciting challenge."

Hess chose Burn This because of her respect for Langford Wilson as a playwright. "His exploration of human relationships is interesting in all of his plays," Hess explains. The intense passion between Pale and Anna drew Hess to this specific Wilson play. "I was never intensely passionate about the script," Hess continued, but she thinks that this is beneficial in helping her to stay objective about the production.

Working with the actors has made her much more excited about the show. "They are wonderful actors. They connected with their characters quickly and respond well to my ideas." The cast includes Jason West as Pale, Melanie Green as Anna, Brett Lankford as Burton, and Tim Madison as Larry. Hess thinks that rehearsals have gone very well and that the actors are definitely excited about the production. "For most of them it is a challenge to play their parts."

Also working with Hess on the production are Lisa Woodcock, Stage Manager; Steven Brown, Lighting Designer; Carey Smith, Master Electrician; and Jason Imber, Assistant Stage Manager; as well as many others.

Seating for Burn This is unlimited [auditorium] and no reservations are needed. The show will run Thursday, Friday and Saturday of this week, at 8:00 in Tawes Theatre.

Dr. Steven Krauss: SAD Lecture

By Tanya Cunic
Staff Writer

Many people across the country are now suffering from what is known as the "February blahs." They can't explain why they feel run down, depressed, pessimistic and in general "not themselves" during the winter months, craving the arrival of sunnier seasons. What these people may be suffering from is is a common cycle of seasonal depression known as Seasonal Affective Disorder (SAD).

On February 24, in Hynson Lounge, Dr. Steven Krauss, a professor at Villanova University, addressed the symptoms and treatments for SAD in his lecture "Winter Depression and Light Therapy." This common, systematic depression is characterized by anedonia, an increased appetite with a particular craving for carbohydrates, an increase in sleep duration, and extremely slow cognitive processes. On the other end of the spectrum, the SAD patient often feels elated in the summer to the point of feeling hypomanic.

This type of depression cycle is not as uncommon as many people believe. In a study that Dr. Krauss conducted at the University of Minnesota, of the 463 college students surveyed approximately 85% reported that winter was their worst months and summer was their best. This does not mean however all of these college students are suffering from SAD; to be actually diagnosed there must be an exaggerated personal seasonal change. What it may indicate is that extreme changes in light across the seasons has the ability to affect moods. Although SAD seems to be more concentrated in the northern latitudes, approximately 5% of Maryland residents noticed an "extreme seasonal deviation in mood."

There is hope in relieving this seasonal mood swing. One of the methods used to cure SAD is light therapy. Light therapy consists of simulated natural light "minus the ultra-violet rays." This special light is contained in a light box in which the patient sits in front of for approximately 2-4 hours a day. This helps elevate the patients mood and usually within a few light therapy sessions, the patient's symptoms are lifted.

Although everyone doesn't suffer from winter depression or SAD, those who do can help lift their own symptoms without the time or expense of a light box. Dr. Krauss suggests taking a walk in the morning to receive some sort of exposure to the sun. This may be a natural and healthy way to eliminate depression symptoms.

WC Swimming Nears the Final Countdown!

Aquamen & Women Head to MAC's After Final Battle With Western MD

By Chris Vaughn
Co-Sports Editor

Once again, the aquamen were in striking range of Western Maryland but couldn't hold onto their lead of 16-9 after 3 events. They dropped this one 59-36.

WC got on the board early with the 400 medley relay team of Tim Whittier, Jason Campbell, Brian Basso, and Tyler McCarthy in this first event. Individually, WC again scored early with Dave Cola adding two important wins in the 200 and 500 free. He is also getting ready for his first MAC championship where he will swim 3 individuals and 4 relays.

Jason Campbell continued the early winning streak, earning a first in the 200 breast with a consistent time that also gives him a shot at making the scoring range at the MAC's as well. Tim Whittier joined him in placing within the MAC required scoring range, reclaiming his 200 back school record by shaving a full five seconds off the previous record. Also qualifying for the MAC's in the 100 and 200 fly was Brian Basso who lowered his 200 fly school record time even further.

But, Chris Freisheim had the swims of the evening taking an unheard of 26 seconds off his 1000 free mark from January 12th. "He has been doing a terrific job at practice and it really shows," says Coach Lessard. Chris also placed 2nd in the 200 free and joined Tyler McCarthy, Basso, & Cola to break 16 seconds off the school record in the 400 free but, was touched out by Western Maryland in the event.

Also scoring important points were Ty McCarthy in the 50 free and Dave Czekaj in the 200 free and 200 back. Also doing a great job in their last meet for the 1991-92 season were Mike Bowman, Mike Frey, Andy McKim, and Troy Petenbrink.

Coach Lessard went on to say, "The men have done a teriffic job and their record doesn't indicate how much they have improved. The scoring system didn't help us tonight either, relays getting 7 or 0 points and only the top three finishers in each event being awarded points. But those are the breaks."

The aquawomen, on the other hand, went the distance against Western Maryland, with the lead constantly changing hands, and came away with a big win by taking the final event, the 400 free relay with the team of Amy Draper, Nancy Whiteman, Magdalena Fuchs, and Mimi Devlin.

Senior Captain Kasey Carroll remained undefeated in 4 years of dual meets in her specialty, the 1000 free, and won the 200 fly. She was also impressive in the 200 breast, having only swam the event one other time, placing second and tying the meet.

Freshman Dede Swinden had a terrific meet by placing 2nd behind Carroll in the 1000. This was the first time she swam it and because of her time in the event she now has a chance of placing at the MAC's in the 1650 free. She also swam to an important 2nd in the 500 free and 3rd in the 200 IM.

Jen Green proved she is back in top form by breaking her own WC school record in the 200 back with a win as Karen Pendergast scored a close 3rd. Green placed 2nd in the 200 free as well.

Mimi Devlin continued to show her versatility by placing 2nd in the 200 IM and first in the 100 free, which was the first time she swam in that event. Nancy Whiteman furthered the Sho'women's effort and had a terrific swim in the 500 free, breaking 6:00 for the first time and placing 3rd and 2nd in the 200 free.

Adding additional points were Amy Draper, placing 2nd in the 200 fly and 3rd in the 50 free, and Magdalena Fuchs, coming in 3rd in the 100 free. Plus, Beverly Diaz had a personal best time in the 200 breast and senior Joan Colton swam a career best 200 fly for her last WC meet. And of course, the 400 medley team of Karen Pendergast, Beverly Diaz, Joan Colton, and Eleanor Shriver came in with a competitive second place.

Says Coach Kim Lessard, "It was a terrific team effort tonight. The women had to swim well and put it together to win, and they did! I was very proud of them. Also, we have our best entries ever in our relays for the MAC's so I'm very excited for the team."

Baseball and Lacrosse Kick Off!

Baseball Gets Set For Spring Training

Coach Athey looks forward to the '92 Season

By Charlie Linehan & Chris Vaughn
Sports Editors

With the warm weather rapidly approaching, the 1992 Washington College baseball team has been practicing hard, gearing up for their first home game against the 1991 Middle Atlantic Conference champions, Juniata College. After an impressive '91 season in hitting (the Sho'men were ranked seventh nationally in division III hitting with a .349 team average) the club once again hopes to bring the pitching performance up to par with a batting record which only promises to get better.

Although the loss of sterling hitters Hal McBee and Matt Giller might seem a detriment to the program, a number of able players with experience under their belts promise to fill the gap. Most notably, Rory "Let's Grif" Conway looks to amaze fans at the plate once again. Last season, Conway tied team leader Hal McBee with 34 hits. In addition, Conway lead the team in triples with four while compiling a .386 batting average with nine multiple-hit games. Adding to the power at the plate will be Seniors, Vince "Vinny" Sanudo and John "Beast" Morall. Last year, Sanudo shined as lead-off hitter, blasting a team high five homeruns while Morall, at clean-up, boasted three homeruns and 22 RBI which makes him the leading returning RBI man. Junior third baseman Mike "Whiz" Hanifee also deserves mention. Hanifee was Co-MIP last year as he clubbed his way to a .413 batting average with 33 hits. Finally, the hitting game will be further aided by pitchers Keith Whiteford (.349 batting average with 29 hits and 20 RBI last year) and Joe Boan (.360 batting average with 36 hits in '90).

As has been the case in the recent past, Washington must work to improve a pitching staff which allowed an average of 5.87 runs per game last season. Ace pitcher and All-MAC Keith Whiteford returns after a '91 season in which he boasted a 6-3 record with a team high 30 strikeouts. Assisting Whiteford, Joe Boan returns to the club after a 1990 season in which he led the team with 7 victories. Other pitchers who should figure prominently in the re-vamping of the staff include Gerald Scully, who finished the '90 season with a 1.59 ERA, Junior Jerry Hunt, and Sophomore Mitch O'Shea, both of whom gained a great deal of experience last season. The loss of Greg Rogers and Scott Cole certainly will not help the Sho'men pitching game, especially during the Spring trip to Florida where, given the number of games the team plays, depth is important. To cover for the loss of Rogers and Cole, Head Coach Ed Athey will look to Vinny Sanudo, Rory Conway, and Freshman Dan "Yahoo" Coker to provide some support in Florida.

Defensively, the team returns a veteran infield with the exception of Andy "AP" Parks who will replace Matt Giller at first base. At second base, Vinny Sanudo should combine with Rory Conway (at shortstop) and John Morall (at catcher) to continue to dazzle the crowds defensively up the middle. Hanifee will round off the diamond at third base, providing the final link to an infield whose support to the mound will certainly be a plus.

In the outfield, Joe Boan will fill in at Centerfield with support from Scully and Whiteford. In addition, Kyle "Gomer" Hutchison, Dan Coker, and Mike D' Andrea will provide valuable support to an outfield which will have to juggle its talent with the pitching staff.

Around the bases, the Sho'men will look to the proven speed of players like Sanudo, Morall, Hanifee, Whiteford, Conway, and Coker to improve the teams scoring opportunities. Last season, Conway led the team with 17 steals. Says Coach Athey, "If we have a designated runner, Coker will probably be it. Up front, in the first part of the line-up, we've got good speed—we can run the bases. We get Sanudo or Conway on and we can run."

The schedule for this year includes a number of MAC powerhouses, with Johns Hopkins filling in once again as the team to beat. Besides Washington, the main challengers to Hopkins will be Widener, Haverford, and Swarthmore. According to Coach Athey, "Any one of the four of us could rise up and challenge Hopkins. If we get the pitching, we should be in here. We're playing them here this year so it should work in our favor."

Assisting Coach Athey will be Al Streelman, John Scott, and Steve Sandebeck. Streelman had an excellent pitching career during his years at Washington College and has been an assistant coach for to the team for the past 14 years. John Scott is a Chestertown resident who has been an assistant coach for two years. "He's a jack-of-all-trades," says Coach Athey of Scott. "Morale-wise, he's great for the team." Steve Sandebeck is also a former WC player (not to mention a spectacular catcher) who helps out whenever he can with the catchers. In addition, Hal McBee will help out whenever possible.

Washington faces Juniata in the home-opener this Saturday at 3:00 pm and then leaves next Friday for the annual Spring training/ Bellyflop contest trip in Sanford, Florida, a trip which should provide some real competition to this promising young team. So grab some peanuts and a cooler and come join the Bleacher Creatures this Saturday in their support of America's pasttime.

WC LAX Goes Up Against Division One's Best

By Melissa Harmeyer
Staff Writer

Judging by the capacity crowd that showed up for WC's lacrosse team scrimmage against Duke on the upper practice field Sunday afternoon, it would appear the WC community is ready and waiting with anticipation for a strong return from the WC Lax program. Coming off a disappointing 3-8 season last spring, this talented squad hopes to demonstrate and live up to its expected potential. The team goes into this season as a good contender, hopefully surprising many teams in the MAC conference.

In the past two weeks, the Shoremen have come off scrimmages against Division one teams Villanova and Duke. Although they were outscored, they were not concentrating on the final tally as much as they were on their team play, which many players feel has gotten better. Junior captain Dave Lipinski stated, "We've improved greatly as a team since the scrimmage against Villanova last weekend and if we keep moving in that direction the team could prove to be a good contender." Other team captains include John Hernandez, Scott Overand, and Kevin Doyle.

It is a young team, carrying only two seniors, Kevin Doyle and John Kelly, which definitely gives them an advantage in the long run. Knowing that they will be graduating only two players at the end of this season, they can look forward to continued maturity and growth as a strong team. Attackman Greg Lawler and Christian Boone are freshmen that have shown talent and potential. Along with this, the lacrosse team has gained key transfer players such as Jason Paige from Syracuse, Harris Murphy from Villa Julie, and Chris Cody from Loyola that have contributed tremendously to the team's offensive game.

The Shoremen scrimmaged Mt. St. Marys this past Wednesday, which will be covered in next week's ELM, and go up against Georgetown on Saturday before they move to regular season play next Wednesday, March 4th, in an away game versus West Chester State.

Keep up the support WAC. This should prove to be an exciting season for the WC Lax program and a complete turnaroung from last year's performance!!!

Basketball Winds Down, Tennis Picks Up the Action

Basketball Ends Earlier Than Expected

By Melissa Harmeyer
Staff Writer

The men's basketball team wrapped up the regular season this past week and were knocked out of play-off contention with two disappointing losses to Widener and Johns Hopkins. Although the team will not be involved in post-season action, who can argue with their strong overall record of 14-10 and 6-3 in the MAC?! They demonstrated what heart and desire are all about while also giving the college community another year of exciting basketball.

The beginning of the end began last Thursday when WC road tripped to Schwartz Center in Chester, Pennsylvania to take on Widener University. Earlier in the season, the Pioneers lost here to the Shoremen and just as the home court proved to be an advantage at the Cain Dome the home court also proved to be an advantage for Widener at their version of the Cain Dome.

Initially, Washington took control. The first half was all WC, leading by as much as 10 points 9:40 into the game. However, their lead soon dwindled down to 3 points by halftime, going into the locker room up 35-32.

The two teams came out roaring in the second half and battled it out for the first 9 minutes until Widener was able to gain the lead and hold it for about six minutes. Yet WC hung right in there and with 3:24 remaining, sophomore forward, Geoff "The Glide" Rupert, stung a two pointer to even up the score. John Jones of The Pioneers answered by hitting a three pointer of his own but, Rupert again struck back, hitting two free throws to put WC within one.

With 1:26 left, Tim Liddy drove one up the right side to give WAC a one point lead. But the struggle continued as Widener Pioneer, Chris Carideo, kept the 3 pointers raining on WC by hitting one with 1:12 remaining. The boys of WC stepped back up to the challenge with Darren Vican tapping in Charles Cummings' miss to tie it up and force the game into a five minute overtime period. From there Widener quickly captured the lead only 1:30 into the O.T. and held it for the remainder to finish us off.

Center Darren Vican topped the charts with a total of 25 points and Forward senior Tim Liddy contributed 20 points.

There next match-up came against the Blue Jays of Johns Hopkins University last Saturday. While the other students were cutting the rug to the music of the Zim Zimmeral's Band at the Birthday Ball, the team was away at the Newton White Jr. Athletic Center challenging the #1 MAC team. If WC had pulled it off they would have created a three way tie for first with WC being one of those three. However, the game resulted in a hard fought loss with the final score being 85-76 in favor of JHU.

The BlueJays appeared to dominate the first half, holding the lead for the entire first half. Yet, the Shoremen never gave in and went up by one at the half. But to no avail, JHU captured the lead again two minutes into the 2nd half and WC was never able to recapture it again.

Darren Vican again had an outstanding outing with 20 points as did senior guard Allen Lester, who had a superb game, tallying 22 points.

It's too bad the season has ended but, we must commend the men's b-ball team this year for turning things around after such a hard season last year. And again, congratulations to Coach Finnegan for becoming most winningest coach at WAC with 282 wins in 22 seasons and seniors Tim Liddy and Allen Lester for a terrific season!!

That's right, It's The Bleature Creatures... IN YER FACE!! Well, it's been a fairly slow sports week here at the ELM – NOT! WC is right in the middle of transition into the Spring Season and Sports are hoppin' right now. But don't fret young jedis, Spiderman & The Vaughnster will be here to cover it all.

Now, for this week's Newt's POW— a 6'9 junior guard hailing from Milford, Delaware, and the basketball team's co-captain, Darren Vican. Vican finished the season on a tear, shooting 50-67 (75%) from the field and scoring 109 points (18.2 ppg) in his final six outings. Overall he lead the unit in total field goal percentage (51.49%) and had the second most tally contributions, 359. His height was also a big factor in his rebounds per game, 8.52, the best on the team! Good work Darren, but just remember, height doesn't count for anything on the caps court, buddy!

Tennis Netters Back on Course, Set to Serve

By Doug Hoffberger
Staff Writer

Coming off an impressive 20-4 season last year, including a fifth-place national finish, as well as MAC singles and doubles titles, the Washington College men's tennis team is back in the spotlight. Capturing its sixth consecutive Middle Atlantic Conference Crown last year, the Shoremen netters retain their reputation as one of the most consistent and dominating teams involved with the WAC athletic program.

Set with a rigorous schedule of 23 matches, 17 of which are away, the Shoremen will make it their main objective to go to Nationals once again. The loss of Scott Reid and Irakli Metreveli, who held the first and second seed respectively last year, will have some bearing on the Shoreman's overall performance this season. Frank Hartwig, a transfer from Towson State hailing from Delmenhorst, Germany, should hold the number one spot, while Alberto Diaz, who received the most improved player award last year, will be challenged by Trevor Hurd, an MAC singles finalist, for the second spot. Co-captain Andy Bohutinsky, Emilio Bogado who is from Mexico City, Mexico, and Carlos Nuno-Langre from Bahia Blanca, Argentina, will all have an equal opportunity to hold the fourth, fifth, and sixth positions.

Once practice blends into the regular season, co-captain Jeff Rexford, as well as the already seeded spots, will begin a system of challenging matches to vie for the top six singles positions as well as the top three doubles spots. The doubles positions should be the teams strength. This years team will be backed by Diaz and Hurd, who posted 31-9 and 34-9 singles marks respectively, as well as a very solid 10-1 doubles record. Senior Andy Bohutinsky (Kansas City, MO./ Park Hill HS) posted an 18-5 mark in singles last year and should be a solid contributor to the team's efforts this season. The two sophomores who were new to the team last year, Carlos Nuno and Emilio Bogado, were 21-10 and 20-7 respectively in singles, and made an immediate impact on the team. Look for them to do so again this spring.

Also gracing the courts this spring, are Tim "Bird" Reardon (Greenwich, CT), Jon Alexander (Rehobeth Beach, DE.), and Deepak Raja (Nashville, TN.) all who are looking to gain skill and experience by playing with this already established group of athletes.

For the team to return to Nationals this season they must play well against a number of Division 3 teams, many of which are ranked in the top twelve in the nation. Due to early season confusion, the Shoremen had to drop Division 1 teams Maryland and Virginia, but must still fair well against Penn State, the only Division 1 school still on the schedule.

Unsure as to who their coach would be until two weeks ago, the team is very excited to be back in full swing, under the coaching of Tom Finnegan, Tim Gray, and Todd Helbling. Gray, having many connections in the Tennis world, should help recruiting for next year but, for now the netters are focused on improving and having another successful season as one of WC's premier sports teams.

Jamie Carver ducks a Hobart defender. Jamie, a second year veteran, looks to be a big factor at the mid-field for WAC this year. With his speed and field sense he has the potential to not only assist a few scores but also to score a few himself. Says Coach Corcoran, "He defines playing with heart. He gives 120% everytime he steps onto the field." Jamie is one of the many young returning players on this year's team. With a year of experience behind him, he will hopefully provide guidance to the incoming players and help make this year's team a success.

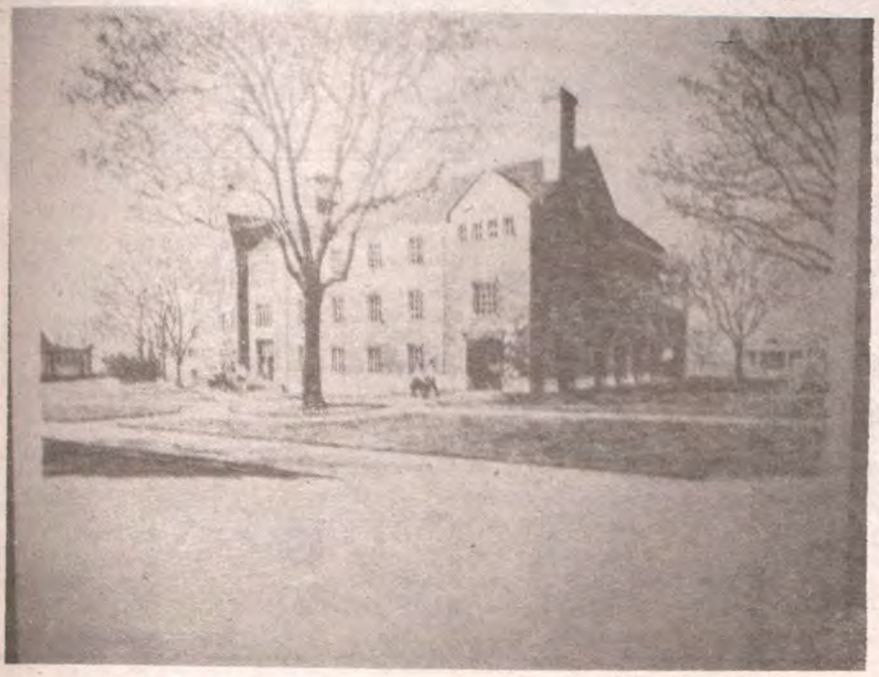
Million Dollar Donation Speeds Progress of New Academic Building



An artist's conception of one of the plans under consideration for the new Academic Building.

By Sabrina Kenny
Staff Writer

A gift of one million dollars was donated by Dorothy (Class of '38) and Kenneth Daly to launch the building of a new academic center and renovation of William Smith Hall. These two buildings will facilitate greater classroom space, faculty offices, and a computer room. Construction of the new building, which will be sited directly behind William Smith Hall and the newly paved mall space, is planned for late spring/early summer of 1993.

Last Saturday, February 29, Washington College held a full day architectural competition, reviewing possible firms and proposals for the new academic building and the renovation of William Smith Hall. After considering four design models presented by four different firms, the competition was narrowed to two prospective architectural groups. During this competition, the architects presented a process in which the project would be executed. Discussing design plans, how they would handle acoustics, who would be on the "team," and how they would interact with the college, the architects explained tentative floor plans and space utilization.

Depending upon the architectural firm chosen, the joint project of the academic building and William Smith Hall will collectively house roughly fifty-five faculty offices and sixteen to twenty classrooms. Working with a ratio of one classroom to every four offices, faculty offices in Ferguson Hall and the Spanish House would be relocated to the new areas. A new computer room and a one-hundred seat classroom would also be located in the new building, which, like William Smith Hall, will be approximately twenty-seven thousand

Tuition Increased By $914

By John Griep
News Editor

When President Charles Trout's immediate predecessor, Douglass Cater, first came into office in 1982, tuition charges were a little more than $7,000. Over the past decade this figure has nearly doubled; for academic year 1992 - 1993, tuition at Washington College will be over $13,000.

The Board of Visitors and Governors of Washington College approved the latest fee increase at their meeting on February 22, 1992. Overall, the combined comprehensive fee will increase by more than $1100 for next year to a total of $18,354. This consists of tuition increases of $914, from $12,312 to $13,226, room rent increases of $88, from $2200 to $2288, and board increases of $110, from $2730 to $2840 for the full meal plan.

President Trout conveyed this information to parents and independent students in a letter which was released on Friday, February 28. In this letter, Trout discussed several reasons for the fee increase. First, aid from the state of Maryland has already been cut by $380,000 and there is the possibility of further cuts as the Maryland General Assembly develops the state budget package. Second, the college is receiving "declining earnings from the interest on endowment investments, [which] has placed great financial pressures upon the College and has resulted in budget cuts for all departments." Both these reasons were attributed to "the impact of [the] economic recession."

On Tuesday, March 3, the ELM spoke with Gene Hessey, Senior Vice President of Management and Finance, concerning the recent fee increases and the budgetary process at Washington College.

When asked why tuition at Washington College has doubled in the past decade, Hessey stated that "the analogy that is often used . . . [is that] tuitions tend to equate to the cost of a new Chevrolet. As costs have escalated across the board, so have tuition costs . . . so have other costs. It's a function of the economy that with steady growth there's a constant expectation for increased salaries. Colleges and universities are labor-intensive, so labor does have a driving impact on the need for revenue. . . . I think there's been additional pressure on tuition as a consequence of governmental support shrinking, the major one being that federal support for higher education has shrunk over that period. . . . Growth in endowment earnings and growth in private gifts has kept pace with the growth in tuition rates. . . . On the expense side, the major problem has been the concurrent need to increase financial aid because the government support was largely in that area. . . ."

Hessey, and Trout, in his letter, pointed out that the financial aid budget will be adjusted in accordance with the increased cost of attending Washington College. "The budget plan provides additional institutional funding for financial aid to support the growth in need that any tuition increase projects. There is some prospect that federal guidelines on some of the financial aid programs will be increased. . . . Federal aid for loan programs [and] tuition grants . . . may be expanded."

Fee increases are part of an overall budget plan. "The reason the Board approved the Things That Need To Be Said

"tell me, tell me, tell me, elm!" - from James Joyce's Finnegans Wake

Howl

For Chuck Trout

I've seen the best minds of my generation destroyed by tuition hikes, starving hysterical threadbare, dragging themselves to the Financial Aid Office looking for a measly fix, stuffyheaded students burning for the ancient tuition of the starry '70's, who poverty and tatters and hollow-eyed and high sat up smoking in the supernatural bleakness of Caroline House uncarpeted halls, floating across the top of the Casey Building contemplating transfer ...

-Justin Cann

Washington College students will not pay the increase in tuition. Repeat, Washington College students will not pay the increase in tuition. This is not some revolutionary statement; sit-ins, burning ID cards, Lit House freaks chaining themselves to the Buntagon. None of that Sixties nonsense. This is purely an economic declaration. Students will not pay the tuition increase simply because they can not afford it. Dollar bill signs will blazon our protest banners, not peace symbols.

Let's give President Trout a break here. The man's not some evil tyrant out to rid WC of all intelligent life by raising total costs to that of the national debt. Universities all over the country are hurting from the economic recession, and therefore, tuitions must inadvertently be raised. I do not question the reasons behind Washington College's tuition hike. What I do question is the direction this institution is headed. Gene Hessey likens the tuition increase to a new Chevrolet. If that's the case, then academics, once the focal point of Washington College, is now a cranky back seat driver destined to be dumped off at the nearest rest stop.

Washington College is lucky to have the new Fitness Center. New academic building? Sure sounds good to me. Every time I go to visit my advisor in Ferguson, I half-expect him to be barefoot, a screaming baby under one arm, a hot iron in the other. Keep looking for the trailer hitch that delivered that abhorration from Hazzard County in the first place. These new buildings will be nice to have. Maybe they'll attract better students. But what the administration does not realize is that the academic environment of a college, above and beyond any building, is the number one attraction for new students. That's why I'm here. If any prospectives are lured into Chestertown by some shiny new buildings, then they're probably not the type of students we want anyway. Me, I'd take a class in the bathroom of Kent as long it was thought provoking and didn't bring back all those wonderful Kindergarten memories.

Maybe last year's incoming students were a disappointment because they were wined and dined by the Casey building. Did anyone ever stop to think that the CAC could have been the new academic building President Trout so desperately wants. Instead it's a colossal abomination lacking in both usefulness and taste. We're not allowed to say this of course. Just laugh, get your mail, and wish Student Affairs was still in Smith Hall. Faculty can't say anything about the piss-poor acoustics in the tiny classrooms or that marvellous Forum Room. Huh? What did he say? We just chalk it up as another one of those little curiosities at WC. Don't want to get any alumni mad, they might not be so willing to donate money for the future of Washington College. But here's some food for thought: whatever students survive the next several years of "unavoidable" tuition hikes will become the future alumni of WC.

Students sometimes get in the way. It would be much easier if they were just objects, blobs of numbed intellect that some rich alumni could whack into the ground with a gold-plated shovel, stating the foundation of their building will be built on student academics. Speech. Applause. Waste.

Students: Is that egg salad or hot turkey sandwich you're eating now suddenly worth more money? Has the cost of your Caroline dorm room suddenly increased because it is an antique? Can you add another part-time job to your already busy summer schedule to absorb the extra $1100 in total costs? But most importantly, are you satisfied with your education here? Because your voice, more so than any alumni, should be the most important at Washington College. Are you tired of paying for the future of this institution while the present state of affairs are bogged down in endless committee meetings. The students of Washington College should have their own master plan regarding their education. One based on logic and intelligence. One that the landscape "artists" of this college will not ruin with their helicopter-random placing of exotic shrubs and symbolic trees. One the administration will not know how to attack. Sure, they'll hold a meeting about it. But it'll take place in the CAC Forum Room, and no one will be able to hear each other.

The whole "Field of Dreams" attitude towards improvement at WC seems misdirected. If we continue to build up the campus, will better students come? Not if tuition continues to increase. President Trout's goals are honorable and necessary. But if Washington College refuses to address soaring costs NOW, and continues to build monuments to watery-eyed, affluent alumni, then this institution will forever remain mediocre. Mind you mediocre with potential, but nonetheless mediocre. Instead of comparing ourselves to our competitors with the size of our Fieldhouse or the square-footage in empty classrooms, why don't we start comparing academics. President Trout, if you improve it, students will come. They will come in droves. So many will arrive that the Hynson-Ringgold House will have to be turned into a dormitory! Don't underestimate the intellect of your student body. We are not easily impressed with brick facades and cushy chairs. The day-care kids will continue to misspell graffiti on the pretty new desks, while the smart ones wish they weren't already so far in debt that they couldn't transfer somewhere cheaper. Give us an affordable education and you will be amazed at the improved student body. So what if we lose the deadweight. You remember the ones we re-admit over and over on the hopes their old man might someday throw some bucks our way. Maybe that's what we need anyway, smart alumni, not rich ones.

Once I graduate (and finish paying off all my bills) I'm going to put my practical liberal arts education to good use and become fabulously wealthy too. And when the Alumni Office comes a knockin', I will also donate a big wad of change for the future improvement of Washington College. But I'm earmarking it all for the purchase of a bulldozer. A big one. And it's headed right for the Casey building.

Students, Faculty Respond to Homophobia

Dear Editor,

News of the attempt to gather the names of GALA members under false pretenses as reported in last week's ELM is only slightly more depressing than the parade of professional politicians running for president. It is that bad. College as a place and state of mind in which people, diverse in their beliefs, values, and aspirations, come together as equals, and reminiscent of the ancient Greek polis where speech, freely delivered, could lead to enlightenment and insight into the human condition, is a cherished belief of mine. Whatever the motives behind the deception, the result is a sort of spiritual impoverishment for our campus.

Clearly tolerance is not fashionable in the world at large at this time in history, and therefore it is required of us here at Washington College to uphold the fundamental principles of the liberal arts. Our college's namesake provides a useful insight into what is essential. Giving praise to officers in his command, George Washington reserved for a final epithet "liberal." The word for him meant "large" or "noble." Members of GALA must be accorded the respect due to them as equals on this campus if we are to carry out our noble enterprise: the pursuit of wisdom. To intimidate or to suppress others is inimical to liberality, we must all work together continually to guarantee largeness and room for difference. I sincerely hope that intolerance will yield to kindness and understanding in our community, and I believe that concerted effort by each member will make it happen.

Yours truly,
Richard Gillin
Professor of English

Dear Editor:

I was absolutely appalled at the incident in which two pledges, posed as reporters for the ELM, tried to obtain a list of GALA members. I cannot imagine what would have happened if their request was granted. The point is that it is harassment and it should not be tolerated in any way whatsoever. I would only hope that the people involved will be dealt with in a proper manner to keep such an incident from occurring again.

Dr. Taylor Announces Faculty Promotions and Discusses Future Academic Possibilities at WC

By Patrick Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

Eight members of the Washington College faculty were promoted from associate to full-time professor status, while another was upgraded from an assistant to associate position. These promotions, according to Dr. John Taylor, Acting Provost and Dean at the college, were finalized at the Board of Visitor's and Governor's meeting that occurred last Saturday, February 22. The eight recipients include Albert Briggs and Eugene Hamilton of the Math Department; Timothy Maloney, Chair of the Drama Department; Steven Cades of the Sociology Department; Michael Malone of the Economics Department; and Tom Finnegan, Karen Smith, and Penny Fall of the Physical Education Department. Judith Hymes, Librarian at Miller Library, was also promoted from assistant to associate status.

Dr. Taylor also stated a replacement for Dr. Robert Anderson, on sabbatical leave for the Fall of 1992 from his position in the Philosophy Department, has been found. He is Peter Wakefield, a Washington D.C. resident who received his Ph.D in Philosophy from Brown University. Dr. Wakefield has spent the last few years teaching at Holy Cross in Massachusetts, and has also taught at Hamlin University in Minnesota, and Babson College in Massachusetts. A replacement for Dr. George Shivers, on sabbatical leave for the academic year 1992-1993 from the Department of Modern Languages, has yet to be found. However, according to Dr. Taylor, Dr. Janet Kestenberg-Amighi, Visiting Associate Professor of Anthropology, will remain another year at WC, filling in for Dr. Jeanette Sherbondy, on leave for Fall 1992 from the Anthropology Department, and Dr. Patricia Horne, on sabbatical leave from her position as Chair of the Sociology Department for the Spring of 1993.

"Bigger before Better"

Dr. Taylor is also the Chairman of Washington College's Long Range and Strategic Planning Committee, and spoke with the ELM on March 3 regarding the committee's future plans to examine possibilities of an improved academic environment at WC.

"Washington College would like to improve the quality of its incoming students," Dr. Taylor said. "The question we are exploring is, will the college be better if it is bigger?" he stated, adding, "we feel these two points are interactive."

When asked what potential areas of improvement the committee will pursue, Dr. Taylor replied, "There are two possibilities. One, is quality better than numbers? meaning do we concentrate on improving the student body first, keeping the size similar to what it has been for the past few years? And two, if the school were to grow larger in size [in terms of student body and physical plant] will the college have more to offer, and therefore attract better students?"

Dr. Taylor has asked the heads of all departments on campus to cooperate in this important decision. "What we are asking them," he said, " is what would be the impact of increasing in size? What would the effect be on the budget, physical plant, faculty, and staff? We are interested in finding out all the possible implications of such a move."

Dr. Taylor stressed the point that this decision is merely in the "what if?" stage now. "The committee is interested right now in discovering the impact of such an action," he stated. "No decision has yet to be made."

Graduation Requirements Increased?

Dr. Taylor also discussed the possibility of intensifying Washington College's standards for graduation. Unlike other academic institutions, according to Taylor, WC does not look at a student's overall grade point average. Rather, performance within the course-load is favored. Graduating seniors must complete thirty-two courses, receiving no more than six D's, with a maximum of two D's within their major.

"With our current system," Dr. Taylor stated, "it is possible for a student to graduate with twenty-six C minuses and six D minuses. The grade-point average for that works out to be less than a 2.0." According to Taylor, the Academic Council, in accordance with the Committee of Admissions and Academic Standards, will delve further into this situation. "The question we are now asking ourselves," added Dr. Taylor, "is, are we satisfied? Are we satisfied with the college's requirements for graduation?"

The Washington College ELM will not be published on Friday, March 13th.

This is partly because next week is Spring Break and most of you sad chumps won't be here to read it, but mostly so that Pat, Adriane, Julie and Griep can get some work done on their theses. Have a Sunny Spring Break and think of us while you're baking in Jamaica!

Notes from Faculty Meeting

The Student Affairs Committee approved the increase for the student activity fee for next year only. Further increases called for in the SGA plan will be discussed by the Board at the appropriate time.

Due to financial restraints, the Sears-Roebuck Foundation has discontinued their program with Washington College to sponsor the award for teaching excellence and leadership given to a faculty member at Commencement. The Lindback Foundation has agreed to continue its award for distinguished teaching for this year.

Faculty with articles to be published, attending workshops or presenting papers include Professors Jeff Vahlbusch, Michael Kerchner, Karen Smith, Thomas Cousineau, Satinder Sidhu, Lida Baldwin, Dennis Berry, and Registrar Jack Hamilton. Helen Kerr of the Planning and Special Projects Office received an award for an article she co-authored.

New History Honor Society Members

The local chapter of Phi Alpha Theta, the national history honorary fraternity, has accepted the following students as new members: Kate Absher, Darryl Calloway, Kathleen Feeney, Sandra McLelland, Steve Boucher, Michelle Yon, Melissa Sirick, Suzanne Mazzullo, Sherry Menton, and David Searles.

Russian Pen Pals

By a wide margin, young educated people from the former Soviet Union say they most want to have a new friend from the United States.

In a questionnaire distributed during 1991 to students and young professionals throughout the former Soviet republics, fully 80 percent of the respondents said they would like to make a new friend from the United States. No other country came close to this degree of popularity.

The next-most-popular choices were England, with 64 percent, and Canada, with 48 percent.

The questionnaire was conducted jointly by the Russian magazine Student Meridian and by Pen Pal Planet, of Scranton, Pennsylvania.

For free information on making English-speaking friends from Russia and the other former Soviet republics, please write to Pen Pal Planet, P.O. Box 3657, Scranton, PA 18505.

More Reaction to Homophobia

Dear Editor:

Congratulations on finding precisely the right tone of derision by offering to our would-be investigative reporters a column entitled "Homophobic Meatheads on Campus." Your mirth-provoking scorn may indeed be the most appropriate response to their antics. Having perpetrated an apparent act of harassment on one of our students, perhaps they would now like to exonerate themselves by accepting your offer of a public forum. At least their verbal behavior in your pages will enjoy first-amendment protections — as their recent conduct presumably does not.

Sincerely yours,
Thomas Cousineau
Professor of English

assumptions made on charges is that it is incumbent upon [the college] to advise incoming students and their parents, as well as continuing students and their parents, at the earliest possible time. . . . The administration and the Board felt that at least that portion of the budget needed to be approved. . . . The implication of that is if state budget cuts are sustained, [Washington College] will have to find other sources of revenue to cover those losses or make further cuts in departmental and support budgets. . . . In terms of state aid, the budget plan is predicated on the best assumption that the Maryland Independent College and University Association, which represents the private colleges in Maryland with the legislature . . . . That's their best estimate."

Although the Board approved the fee increases at their February 22 meeting, "they did not approve the spending plan, . . . out of concern, not for the plan and its priorities, but out of concern about the uncertainty of the level of state support." State funds constitute approximately 8% of the college's total budget. Currently, it "appears that the college will have an operating deficit that will call upon [the administration] to utilize reserves for operations. . . . The Board's concern is that those reserves are limited and if [the college] spends too deeply into them this year, then we may not have ample reserves for operations next year."

Another concern of the Board is the level of student enrollment. However, "that is a little brighter picture than the state government situation." Based on the number of applications received to date, it appears that the applicant pool will reach a nearly record high. The budget plan submitted to the Board assumes a modest increase in enrollment and the Board felt they should adopt a wait-and-see approach to determine whether such an increase will occur. They didn't want to approve a budget plan based on a small increase in enrollment until they had a better idea whether such an increase would occur. By the April 25 meeting, the Board will have a better picture of the number of students who will be enrolling.

The budgetary process at Washington College begins with the submission of budgets by each college department, instructional as well as non-academic. Each request is reviewed and meetings are held with each department head to discuss the proposed budgets. The budgets are then consolidated into a first draft of a budget "to see how it plays out given the assumptions on enrollment, endowment income, private gifts, and fee income." This draft is then discussed with the Faculty Finance Committee. "Typically, at that juncture, the budget is very much out of balance . . . the requests far exceed the projected revenues." At that point, the process becomes one of establishing priorities. Priorities are established through discussion between the Faculty Finance Committee, the President, and the Executive Council and a consensus is reached on the absolute financial needs and the priorities for a given year. Revenue is then reassessed and a determination is made on charges.

square feet, with three floors, and a usable basement. The new building's facade, to be located beside Tawes Theater, will be brick. Because the building needs to fit well into the campus and not appear as an intrusion, the academic center will not be "ultra" traditional or jarringly futuristic. Final plans will be negotiated with the architectural firm chosen.

In renovating William Smith Hall, the goal of the project is to restore the building's original historic architecture, which existed before it was the victim of a fire of 1916. However, the new floor plans must also allow modern access to a safer building. Entrances for the handicapped, clearer stairways, and an elevator will be included in William Smith, along with expanded faculty offices, and air conditioning.

Currently, the project is comprised of organizing and obtaining funds and creating working drawings and schematics. A lead gift of one million dollars, which is one of the most substantial contributions Washington College has ever received, was donated to the project by Dorothy and Kenneth Daly. Mrs. Dorothy Daly, née Williams, obtained a Bachelor of Arts degree in 1938 from Washington College as a history major. Mr. Daly (Class of '38, University of Pennsylvania) was the former director of Nordson Corporation, a manufacturer of industrial products. Both are residents of Vera Beach, Florida, and have two children, Thomas and Carol. President Trout commented upon the generous gift of Mr. and Mrs. Daly, stating,"This benefaction is truly staggering. It will enable us to move forward with this vital project with all deliberate speed. All who care about Washington College are profoundly grateful." The state is also expending 2.3 million dollars and one million dollars more must be raised to complete the project.

The Board of Visitors and Governors will decide upon the final selection of an architectural firm at their meeting on April 25.

A Washington College Education: For the Wealthy Only?

President Trout sent a letter home to parents last Friday to break the bad news of increases in tuition, room, and board totalling $1,112. For those of you keeping count, this brings the grand total up to $18,354 per year to attend Washington College. However, according to President Trout's letter, we will not be getting more for our (parents') money. The increases are being instituted so that WC can maintain its standard of "high quality education" in the face of shrinking government support and poor endowment earnings. Now, suppose we swallow that high quality education stuff for the sake of argument and look at the steadily rising cost of attendance. The 'Dear Parents' letter is becoming a tradition of sorts here at Washington College. In fact, if a student had been attending the school since 1982, which is not an entirely unbelievable scenario at WC, his or her parents would have received such a letter annually to inform them that the cost of attendance was going to be increased anywhere from $800 to $1100 dollars for the following academic year.

We must, however give credit where credit is due: Trout's letter was wonderfully written, his command of the English language is to be commended. The current president's style largely supersedes that of former president Doug Cater who, though he had plenty of practice, could never pull the 'Dear Parents' letter off with such pizazz. Indeed, like the Romantic poets, who looked at our silly and cruel universe and saw beautiful things, President Trout has painted a rosy picture of a bleak situation. In the letter, we are informed that the cost of attending Washington College is still $4000 to $5000 less than the cost of attending the twenty-five most prestigious liberal arts colleges in the country. That's swell, but Washington College is much farther behind these colleges in prestige than it is in cost. Academically, we're ranked way below the top twenty-five, so let's not fool ourselves: any comparison between Washington and those schools is absurd and depressing.

Chris Mihavetz

President Trout also informs us that the 6.4% increase in fees is the lowest in over a decade. Well, that's encouraging... until we do the math. Even if the actual amount of increase in dollars remained constant, the percentage of increase would shrink as the base cost grew. We can appreciate the president's attempts to boost morale in these trying economic times, or we can feel patronized and misled- it's a personal thing, I suppose.

Let's allow sleeping administrators to lie for the moment, and look at how the increases are going to affect students. Certainly, Washington College has in its ranks a good number of students for whom the increase in cost will matter very little. Their parents' are wealthy and another thousand bucks isn't too much to ask for the education of their daughter or son.

On the other hand, there are also many financial aid recipients in attendance at WC, and let's face it, though the price of a Washington college education has steadily risen in the past decade, state and federal financial aid has, by no means, skyrocketed in the Reagan/Bush era. President Trout maintains that the financial aid budget will be adjusted to meet the increased needs of aid recipients. However, as most anyone who has ever played the financial aid game knows, that simple statement loses something in the translation, namely its basis in any sort of truth. My own financial history here at Washington tells me this is so. In the past three years, as the cost of attendance has risen and my family's actual ability to meet the cost remained constant, my parents and I have had to pay more. Any increase in financial aid, fought for with tooth and nail by my valiant and relentless Mom, has been mainly in the form of student loans. What I thought was going to be a graduation debt that could have financed a nice Japanese compact, say a Hyundai, is rapidly approaching Porschesque proportions. Though I have to admit, the choice to attend Washington College was, and still is, mine. Of course I chose to come here when the propaganda machine over in admissions bore down on my naive, fresh-out-of- high school sensibilities. How could I go anywhere else after being confronted with all of those shiny pamphlets, replete with pictures of sunsets on the Chester, and the promise from admissions that the financial aid department could make a Washington College education as inexpensive as a state university education? I was duped, I am a fool, and I sometimes regret that my parents chose to support their son's delusions.

This is not to say that my case is representative of all financial aid recipients, some have it better and some, undoubtedly, have it worse. I would be willing, however, to wager a carton of smokes that many financial aid students have at one point or another felt that they have been misled or even downright lied to. The increase in cost of attendance is only going to strengthen that feeling as students and their families in this situation are forced next year to struggle even harder to make it back to Washington College.

Perhaps the most uncomfortable situation to be in as Washington College becomes increasingly pricey, is that of those students who do not qualify for financial aid but who, at the same time, aren't so wealthy as to remain unaffected by the increases. Their family shoulders the entire burden and we all know the camel's back metaphor to be essentially sound- how many of these students will be able to absorb the increases next year?

In the end though, we have to be fair: if the school really has to raise prices, it has to raise prices even though it may sadly damage the student body. There can be no doubt that the recession and subsequent government cutbacks have hurt the school financially. What we should object to however, is this school's tendency to hook students in potentially compromising financial situations and then jerk the rug out from under their feet. Prospective students in such a situation should be warned frankly that they may not be able to afford Washington college in two or three years. It is, after all, cruel to allow students to attend the institution and establish themselves knowing full well that they may have to leave behind one, two, or even three years of their academic and social lives to attend a less expensive school. I don't think it's too much to ask that student welfare take precedence over the administration's concern with enrollment levels. We are all here at a small liberal arts institution to learn how to be a little bit more human, and we are often treated like cattle.

Also, we should object to President Trout's attempt to sugar-coat the truth: because of hard times and our society's tendency to respond to economic crises with the grace and intelligence of sharks in a feeding frenzy, a liberal arts education at a small institution, even one ranked far below the top twenty-five, will soon be available only to the very wealthy.

SGA Report

The Student Government Association of Washington College held their latest meeting on Tuesday, March 3. Washington College President Charles Trout was in attendance to discuss a number of important topics with the SGA.

Presentation by President Charles Trout

President Trout gave a presentation on a number of issues, including the increase in attendance costs, the architectural competition for the new academic building, and dormitory renovations.

Concerning the increase in charges, Trout stated, "It's the lowest increase in something like twenty-plus years. The overall charge increase, room, board, tuition, and fees, is 6.4%. Next to the 25 price leaders among national liberal arts colleges, Washington College is roughly $5,000 below that amount."

Trout also discussed concerns about the student evaluation forms. He pledged that he would be "eager, willing, and able to arrange a meeting between the [faculty] committee on Appointments and Tenure and the subcommittee of the SGA that's working on that problem." He further stated that academic departments at Washington College will be receiving external review by teams from other institutions. This external review program was instituted at the college this past summer, when the Economics Dept. became the first to be evaluated.

Prior to the SGA meeting, Trout was given a tour of Queen Anne's by RA Jen Del Nero. Trout said that these two dorms "need attention" and "Queen Anne's is next on the list. . . . Major, major dormitory work, including probably the construction of a new residential unit, will really have to wait for mid-decade." Concerning other aspects of the physical plant, Trout said the last phases of the Hodson Hall renovation project should be started shortly after the end of the academic year. Thomas Maher, a member of the Board of Visitors and Governors, will be in charge of raising funds for this construction project and hopes to collect $861,000.

Additional Funding

The Literary House Cafe received an additional $100 in funding. The Lit House Cafe plans on having music and refreshments for students and faculty on Friday afternoons from 3 - 7 p.m. starting after Spring Break.

$450 was allocated to the Lacrosse Club. The club will be in accordance with REC Sports regulations and will play on-campus.

$300 was allocated for The Movies. This is the band that will play the March 27 benefit in the CoffeeHouse. The SGA also approved $800 for Black Sheep to play at the annual Luau on April 25.

The Comedy Club will be presenting two comedians on March 18 and a caricaturist will be on campus on March 26 in the foyer of the Casey Academic Center.

Chestertown Arts League Annual Juried Show

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

The Chestertown Arts League 44th Annual Juried Exhibition is on display now in the Gallery of the Gibson Fine Arts Building. The exhibit fills both floors with an array of local art, ranging from cast metal sculpture to soft watercolors. The arrangement of the works themselves is, at the very least, confusing. The works seem to be hung or placed in no particular order. They bear no nameplate, only tiny numbers on the walls, which may or may not have the medium penciled onto them.

The judging, too, may frustrate the viewer. Some of the winners hardly break the seven-second rule, while others that received not even an Honorable Mention are enchanting. Specifically, the Elizabeth Dixon Purnell Award, or best-in-show, went to "Shady Lady," an innocuous (read: boring) watercolor by Anne Klinefelter. Sure, it's very nice, but so were some other pieces that were more visually interesting.

Kathryn Day, wife of our own creative writing professor, Robert Day, won a first place prize in the Acrylics category for her "Hangling with Matisse."

The photography section is the strongest all around; all six pieces are well designed both technically and visually. The watercolors in general tend to be "nice;" one that might have local interest is "Washington College" by Marian Simmons, a montage of portraits of the campus architecture.

The mixed media category is an interesting one. Thomas McHugh's "Six Silly Dragons" won a deserved first place. However, Peter Martin's "Creativity is an Attitude" is a rip-off of recent works by Barbara Krueger, a leader in the field. In sculpture, John Farr's "Winged Demon," which received second place; and Ken Herlichy's "Somo," which was sadly overlooked, were the outstanding works.

The rest of the show is definitely worth looking at. An amalgam of different techniques, styles, media, and levels of proficiency, this sampling of local art is interesting and varied.

The exhibit will be open Monday - Saturday, Noon - 4:00 p.m., through March 13, in the Gibson Performing Arts Center.

A tie occurred between Samantha Clements and the team of Tammie Michener and David George for the position of Social Chair. Due to this, there will be a runoff election on Wednesday, March 18, after students return from Spring Break.

Chris Berghaus asks that those who supported him in the previous election vote for Sam Clements. He added, "Do NOT write my name in, just check Sam's name."

Concerning the runoff, David George stated, "The student body will have the advantage of two people in office rather than just one if they vote for Tammie and myself. We will be able to accomplish more than just one person."

'60's Night Winners

Those zany folks in the Dining Hall were at it again last Wednesday night, February 26, when they held "60's Night." The fun-filled food fest gave us not only a cameo by Cletus, the emcee, but also a whole barrel full of winners. R.J. Eldridge won the Cap'n Crunch Contest by guessing the number 715. Mary Holmes won the three-heat Hula Hoop Contest, and all entrants (all those pledges included) took home a hula hoop. After name after name was drawn to take home such wonders of American Culture as T-shirts and squeeze bottles, Shawn Hamill, winning the "Yoplait Bicycle Raffle," took home the "Harley." It just goes to show that our award-winning WCDS can be as creative as any other department on campus.

Student Profile: Raph Koster

Raphael R. Koster is a man that most students should know, if not from class or one of his many extra-curricular pursuits, then certainly by sight. Raph was born on Long Island, and has spent time in Peru, Barbados, and Haiti. He currently calls Chestertown home.

A double English and Spanish major, Raph takes his studies seriously. He has been on Dean's List every semester. He came to Washington College with this year's junior class carrying a full year of Advanced Placement credit, and if he stayed the extra year (Raph will graduate in May), he could complete enough credits to have additional majors in Music and Art.

Raph is the editor of three — count 'em, three — campus publications. Open Minds is a forum-type pamphlet which covers a campus issue by interviewing administration, faculty, and students, and then letting the reader decide where he or she stands.

His two literary magazines, Otherworlds and Translations, represent the variety of Raph's interests. Otherworlds is a genre-oriented magazine that publishes fiction and poetry that are usually reserved for pulp magazines. Translations is a multi-lingual lit mag that prints poetry and fiction both in their native tongue and in English, translated by Washington College students and faculty.

Raph is a creative writer himself of both poetry and fiction. His Spanish thesis consists of translating a novel, Miguel Delibes' El Camino. His Creative Writing thesis for English is in fiction. He also writes a great deal of poetry, mainly formal, which he shares with the writing workshop O/6/4.

In addition to all this, Raph is a member of both Junior Fellows and ODK, as well as the Spanish Language Honor Society. He is the Student Director of the Audio Visual Department, and also does freelance work by running sound for various bands. Raph spent one year as a Peer Advisor, and he is currently the R.A. of the Creative Arts Hall. His clubs include the Writers' Union, the Visual Artists Union, and Amnesty International. He plays acoustic guitar and writes his own songs; anyone who has been to Open Mike Night at the Coffeehouse has heard a sample.

And lastly, Raph will be getting married in May to Kristen Johnson '89. After graduation and marriage, Raph plans to go to graduate school for an M.F.A. in poetry.

American Dreams: ACT's Latest Play

Studs Terkel's book of interviews, American Dreams, is brought to life on the stage in Actors Community Theatre's next production. Each character tells his or her own version of the American Dream via a series of monologues which illuminates the reality of America today, or more precisely, circa 1970-1980, when Terkel conducted his interviews. Telling their entertaining or poignant stories are Bill Blake, Mike Walters, Pat Dias, and Kate Schroeder, in front. In back are Kent Armiger, Tarin Towers, Jay Votel, Polly Kuulei Sommerfeld, Ron Clarkson, Bonnie Brown, Jim Landskroener, Earl French, and Catherine Byrd Bushby. Missing from the picture is Vincent Hynson.

The play is directed by Bonnie Hill and produced by Vince Raimond. American Dreams will be performed on March 12, 13, and 14 at 8:00 p.m., and on Sunday, March 15, at 2:00 p.m, in Norman James Theatre, William Smith Hall. Tickets are available at Creative Cookery and The Single Tree in advance, and at the door. For reservations or further information, call Vince Raimond at 778-1100 or 778-1834.

At the Hirshhorn Museum & Sculpture Garden, the D.C. sculptor Martin Puryear is displaying his recent works. The show includes wood pieces and organic compositions. Also, the Hirshhorn has prints and collages by Robert Motherwell and an installation by Chilean-born artist Alferdo Jaar. The nearby Corcoran has an excellent black and white photo exhibit by Sebastiao Salgado entitled "An Uncertain Grace". This photo documentary includes many moving images such as the young Brazilian children who wear angelic wings for their first communion, or the famine victims of Ethopia. The National Gallery is a great place to stop if you have a certain art history paper due for class. The National Gallery's new exhibit is "Walker Evans: Subway Photographs and Other Recent Acquisitions" and "John Singer Sargent's El Jaleo ". The trip will be all day. In the evening, we plan to go to a late night movie in Georgetown. You need not be a Visual Artist Union member to go. Just contact Tarin Towers through the Elm office or Rebecca Bryant via Quickmail.

Dr. Billy Taylor to Fill House at March 17 Concert Series

The 40th Anniversary season of the Washington College Concert Series brings jazz to Chestertown with a performance by the Billy Taylor Trio. The fourth of five concerts to be presented this year for local audiences in Tawes Theatre of the College's Gibson Performing Arts Center will take place Tuesday, March 17th, at 8:00 p.m.

Billy Taylor is a consummate musician, accomplished as a pianist, composer, recording artist, arranger, and conductor. He is also an actor, author, teacher, and lecturer, and radio and television personality. He, more than any other single jazz artist, is credited with bringing jazz to the forums of national radio and television.

Winner of two Peabody Awards, an Emmy, and several other honors and awards, Billy Taylor is the on-air arts correspondent for CBS-TV's program "Sunday Morning," and former host of the series "Jazz Counterpoint" on BRAVO-TV. He is president and founder of Jazzmobile, a unique outreach organization which brings jazz to thousands of people in free public performances.

Other members of his trio are Victor Gaskin on bass and Bobby Thomas on drums.

At one time the bassist for Duke Ellington, Gaskin has been performing with Billy Taylor for the past 12 years. He has been a member of the Chico Hamilton Quintet, the notable John Mayhall Blues Band, and has recently been a part-time replacement with the Count Basie Orchestra.

Thomas was the drummer in the band led by Billy Taylor during the three and a half years of the David Frost show on television. He also worked with Herbie Mann and the late guitarist Wes Montgomery, and has been the drummer with the trios of Junior Mance and Cy Coleman. In addition to working as part of the Illinois Jacquet Big Band, Thomas has been part of the groups accompanying such singers as Carmen McRae and Charles Aznavour. He also was the coordinator of "Chorus Line," the longest running Broadway musical in history.

This concert is funded in part by a grant from the Kent County Arts Council. Single Admission tickets for the concert are $15 and $5 for children. Washington College students are free as long as they contact the Office of Student Affairs TODAY for a free pass. The concert is expected to pull a full house, so act fast.

WC Swimming Holds its Own at MACs

Aquamen & Aquawomen Turn Heads At The MAC's

By Chris Vaughn
Co-Sports Editor

The men and women's swim team went out with a bang this past weekend and had a great ending to an exciting season. For the men, six freshman and one senior went up to Widener, turning many heads at the MACs by finishing 9th in their first representation at the meet. Said Coach Lessard, "I'm proud of the team. It's very tough to swim well three days in a row but, they did." WC surpassed teams like Western Maryland and Lebanon Valley, missing 8th place Juniata by only 15 points.

Dave Cola again proved he was a serious assault in the conference score by breaking his goal of 5:00 and placing 4th in the 500 free with a quick 4:57. Swimming smartly in the event, the 4:57 put him in the finals where again he held the mark for a 4th place finish. "He was there with the best of them and will be a serious contender for first next year," exclaimed Lessard. But, that wasn't all for Dave. He continued to smash his own WC records the next day with a time of 1:49.2 in the 200 free and a 7th place finish. His third event, the 100 free, was where he broke the 50.0 mark with a blistering 49.9 for a respectable 15th place. Joined by WC's Jason Campbell and Kasey Carroll, Dave was also the first WC man to place in 3 individual events.

Jason Campbell was the darkhorse of the meet entering with, at best, a potential top 16th place finish in the 100 breast. He stunned the crowd with a time of 1:03.3 and a 4th place finish in the morning preliminaries. Just to prove it wasn't a fluke, Jason repeated his performance that night. He continued to keep his pace up in the 200 back as well, breaking his WC school record with a time of 2:22, which was good enough for a 13th place finish. Again, however, the evening was Jason's as he dropped the 2:22 mark to 2:18 and achieved a 2nd place finish in the consolation round, matching the 7th best time overall. Lessard commented on Jason by saying, "The improvement in Jason has been incredible. Back in October he was swimming a 1:09 in the 100 breast and a 2:29 in the 200 back. He has some exciting years ahead of him."

Tim Whittier became the third WC aquaman to place in an individual event with a 13th in the 100 back, breaking his school record of 58.2. Chris Freisheim swam a personal best time and took four seconds off of his record in the 200 IM to place in the top 25 while also breaking 2.5 minutes off of his 1650 free time to again place in the top 25. Other stong performances came from Brian Basso, who finished in the top 25 in the 100 fly, Dave Czekaj, who swam a strong 100 & 200 back, and Tyler McCarthy, who had 5 personal best relay splits and broke his 200 back time by 2 seconds for a placement in the top 25.

Then there were the relay teams! The opening 200 free relay team of David Cola, Jason Campbell, Tim Whittier, and Tyler McCarthy shocked the second heat by swimming a fast 1:32 and placing 8th overall. Cola again led this one by breaking his fourth school record of the meet with a time of 22.80. The same four smashed their 400 medley relay record by an amazing 8 seconds to place a very tight 9th, two seconds out of fifth. Whittier, Campbell, and McCarthy kept it together and were joined by big old Brian Basso in the 200 medley relay to break their time by 2 seconds and place 9th.

Cola, Campbell, McCarthy, and Chris Freisheim then came together in the 400 & 500 free relay, placing 9th while also breaking an amazing 11 seconds off their record in the 800 relay. Finally, for the last event of the evening, the four went back to the block for a tremendous combination time of 3:24, a second better than what they had hoped for.

Like the men, the women faced their toughest competition of the season in the MAC championship. Says Coach Lessard, "The times were incredible this year. We had to fight for a life. But, it was still very exciting as we defeated E-Town and Susquehanna for the first time at the MAC's and came very close to Scranton."

Kasey Carroll once again led the entire team with three individual final finishes. She finished her college career with 12 top 6 place finishes. "There will probably never be enough Kasey Carroll at WC, it is going to be very strange without her. She has won the hearts of the entire conference with numerous coaches telling her how much they have enjoyed watching her swim over the past four years," stated Lessard. She took home the silver medal in the 400 IM behind Ursinus' Bridget Cauley on Saturday night. She then added a bronze in the 1650 free behind two Gettysburg finalists and quickly had to move over to the 200 fly 30 minutes later, where she earned 6th place, only 7 tenths off of 3rd place, and had her fastest time ever. Kasey went on to join Jen Green, Leslie Newcomb, and Mimi Devlin in the 400 medley relay for a season best time. In the event, Carroll turned in her fastest split swimming the 100 fly.

Jen Green, a great comeback story after being out of the water for two weeks in January, swam in the early morning for a 2:26 time in the 200 back to place 15th. She came back the same evening and lowered her time by almost two seconds to finish 13th. Just as a sign of the competition, Jen swam 2:28 for 13th in the same event last year. She also turned in a personal best time in the 100 back for an 18th place finish.

Mimi Devlin became only the 4th WC woman to ever score in the top 8, swimming the 400 IM. As well, she improved her 24th seed in the 200 fly to place 15th with a season best time. Amy Draper added a spark to the WC 100 fly by improving her 22nd seed to place 14th with a time of 1:06.6, breaking 2 seconds off her best time. Draper went on to join Green, Newcomb, and Magdalena Fuchs to break a four year old school record in the 200 medley relay. "They finally nailed it. I was very proud," said Lessard.

Along with Draper, Ramsey Bigham swam a season best time in the 50 free with Magdalena Fuchs also doing a great job in the 50 & 100 free, adding important points in four relays.

Dede Swinden added points in the 800 free relay and swam the 1650 free for the first time, placing in the top 25 while Karen Pendergast did a terrific job in the 100 back.

Looking back on the season, Coach Lessard pointed out, "It's been a tough season for the women, but they proved they are still there and will continue to improve. You can only ask for personal best times as a coach and they gave me that."

(P.S.- Thanks for all your help this season coach!! Good Luck next year!! Signed- The Vaughnster.)

Rugby goes 1-1 In Opening Tournament

By Brandon White
Staff Writer

Last weekend, the Rugby Club opened its season facing some of the best squads in the nation at the Severn River Invitational Tournament. The teams that participated in the tournament were Maryland, ranked in the top twenty in the nation, Navy, formally ranked third in the nation, St. Marys, and of course, the C'town boys of WC.

WC first encountered the tough squad of Navy. WC held them scoreless for the first eight minutes until Navy scored its first tri. Navy then proceeded to rattle off ten more points in the first half, leaving the halftime score at 14-0. In the second half, Navy proved why they are ranked third in the nation and took total control of the match, scoring eighteen more points and walking away victorious, 36-0. Said Shawn Hamill, president of the Rugby Club, "We had nothing to lose and everything to gain. Considering the skills of Navy and the young age of WC's team, the score was not the relevant factor. It was really a gauge of how much improvement the team had gained, and the results were very encouraging."

The consolation match featured WC versus St. Marys, an opponent WC had previously lost to in three consecutive matches. It looked again to be the same old story as St. Marys struck first, capitalizing on a freak break away and scoring the tri but missing the conversion. After regrouping, however, WC tallied 33 unanswered points which featured outstanding play by Anthony Black with 3 tris, Dave Snyder with 1 tri, The Rookie with 1 tri, and Shawn Hamill with 1 tri. Many other WC players had exceptional games, giving the WC boys a victory and a final score of 33-8.

WC rugby looks to be very promising this season, so keep your eyes open and don't miss any of the action!!!!

Win, Lose or Softball

The "W" Addiction: Is Losing a Cop-Out?

By Prof. Penny J. Fall
WC Coach

.02 seconds, less time than it takes to push down the #2 key, is the margin of victory that turned Bonnie Blair into a Gold Medalist in Olympic Speedskating versus having "to settle for the Silver."

"The thrill of victory and the agony of defeat" - the potency of the emotions envisioned by this saying are a significant segment of our individual and collective psyches. They can be applied to life, sport, participant, and spectator alike. The adrenaline rush invoked by competition, and the warm glow that lingers after the moment of triumph, whether experienced personally or vicariously, can be euphoric when on or having supported the winning side. Defeat, on the other hand, no matter how high our barriers of denial, still manages to leak out around the edges of the "after all it is just a game" rationalization. It dampens the self-image, and skews how we judge ourselves, the players and their effort, and/or our association with them.

This euphoria experienced by winning has become a "junkie high", and in the mind and subsequent actions of the "W" addict, whether athlete, coach, or spectator, the end begins to justify the means. For the species that supposedly sits atop the evolutionary ladder, this is scary stuff. Civility frequently comes down to who has the winning score. How it was achieved is all too often ignored or considered to be of little consequence. For example, in college athletics, particularly Division I, the pursuit of the "W" has been bastardized to such a degree that it leaves a "cotton candy" aftertaste; sweet for a moment, but unpleasantly gritty and slightly acidic after it dissolves and begins to wreak havoc on the molars. Tooth decay is an apt analogy for intercollegiate athletics where the NCAA's attempts at oral hygiene, with "brush and paste" are futile at best, when "root canal work" would be more appropriate.

This, however, is not a problem unique to intercollegiate sports, but casts its shadow across the athletic spectrum, from the peewee leagues to the pros. The screaming, out of control, "Little League parent;" the "slight of hand" transfer of a highly prized high school athlete to another district; the meals, the cars, or the doctored transcript of the potential college "student-athlete"... and on, and on, and on. The grossly inflated salaries paid at the top of the professional sport pyramid to even mediocre athletes, on the surface, appear to be worth striving for at any cost. However, except for an occasional Cal Ripken, Jr. or Dwight Evans, the body may be there, but the soul is lost.

As educators/coaches this is the heart of the matter. How do we get across to the student-athlete that it is the journey and not the destination that measures the true value of the results? My greatest challenge as a coach is not insuring the acquisition and refinement of skills and strategies, but it is attempting to ensure that the players attain and maintain a realistic perspective of the athletic experience and how, win or lose, it can enhance their lives.

Even more difficult is trying to buck the "did you win?" versus the "how did you play?" judgemental point of view held by the public. Our society is a cult of #1 addicts who consider terms such as "personal best," "giving your all," or "moral victory" to be cop-outs used by athletes and/or coaches to diminish the stigma associated with losing. If you lose, in the eyes of all but a few people, YOU ARE A LOSER. This is so sad, because by the very essence of the competitive situation someone will win and someone will lose.

This personalization of the loss, except with the most mature of athletes, negates the entire experience, deflates enthusiasm for subsequent efforts, and gives rise to a wide range of defense mechanisms to sustain one's self-esteem. The latter can deal a fatal blow to the team concept, where the attainment of cohesiveness and harmony are so crucial.

Do I have any answers as I've floated down this stream of consciousness? Not really, because one-upsmanship is so deeply ingrained in the human psyche. For example, what is racism but a desire to be perceived as personally or publicly better than someone else?

The need to excise the pervasive "W" malignancy within our society is so overwhelming and far beyond any one coach's capabilities that it is difficult even to comprehend, much less conquer...except, perhaps, for those individuals who choose or by chance bump up against our personal and professional parameters. Afterall, we can't win if we don't try!

WC Softball Overview

By Margaret Doyle
Staff Writer

The Washington Colllege Softball team is looking forward to another successful season. Considering the fact that there will only be one person in the same position that they were in last year, Junior Marie Mohler feels, "Softball here at the WAC is looking good. Some new freshman faces and transfers will provide a potent force at the plate as well as a solid defense. When the experience of the returning players is combined with the energy and skills of the new players...Washington College Softball will sizzle."

Coach Penny Fall feels that although the team is "very young and quite inexperienced in terms of what position people will be playing, if the team stays healthy, and they find the right combination, the team is looking for a real respectable season." Coach Fall feels that the team must "stay together as a group against difficult opposition early in the season and it is also important to focus on improvement rather than the win- loss record."

Returning for the Shorewomen is Junior centerfielder, Marie Mohler. She joins Senior Edna Diefender who will be the starting pitcher, Junior Jen Ruppert, who will be moving from rightfield to leftfield, and Junior Lori Hastings, who will be playing second. Two Junior transfers, Nikki Goenoega, playing shortstop or catcher, and Leeann Steuer, back-up pitcher, will be great assets to the team. Senior Theresa Sganga and Junior Julie Dill have joined the Softball Team for their first year. Freshman standouts Denise Coleman and Tamela Pickney will add both positive energy and great skills to the team.

The Offense is looking quite solid. Coach Sue Brown has been working hard with the hitters. Coach Fall stated that "this year there is great power in the line-up, with a couple of long-ball threats!"

Although very young, W. C. Softball is looking forward to a successful season. Coach Fall says, "It is like a Chinese fire drill. It is just a matter of putting players in the right positions."

WC Netters Deal Blow to Wesley, Women's LAX Fires Up

On March 4, 1992, the Washington College Men's tennis team set off at a torrid pace with a 9-0 sweep over Wesley College. The match at Wesley College, in Dover, Delaware, was the first of 17 away matches scheduled for '92 spring season.

Holding no pre-season ranking, the Shoreman are looking to re-establish ties with their past opponents, as well as with the NCAA Division 3 ranking officials. Coach Finnegan commented that the first season match against Wesley, "proved to be no prelude to the rest of the season, but does start the season off on a positive and decisive note." Coaches Finnegan, Gray, and Helbling, were very pleased that they were able to incorporate the whole men's roster into the match, and still come away with a decisive win.

Playing in his first match as a Shoreman netter and as the number-one seed, transfer Frank Hartwig won over Wesley's Van Confer 6-2;6-1. Trevor Hurd won 6-0, 6-2 as the Shoreman's second seed, and Alberto Diaz, at the number three position won by an embarassing 6-0,6-0 margin. The fourth seeded Emilio Bogato,as well as the fifth seed, Andy Bohutinsky, both only gave up one game in their straight set wins over Wesley's Eddie Muntz and Drew King. At the sixth spot, netter Carlos Nuno bageled opponent Scott Coyler 6-0,6-0 to round out WAC's complete sweep in singles.

In doubles, Trevor Hurd and Alberto Diaz won decisively, 6-0, 6-2. Freshman Deepak Raja, a newcomer to the MAC conference, played with experienced co-captain Jeff Rexford in a combined effort to defeat Wesley's Ritter and Muntz, 6-1, 6-2. Gaining their first experience in a doubles match, freshman Tim "Bird" Reardon and Jon Alexander played like sophmores and were victorious by a score of 6-1, 6-0. This early in the season it's hard to understand how skillful the WAC netters are, but Frank Hartwig is to Division 3 tennis as Shaquille 0'neal is to D-1 basketball, Trevor Hurd is comparable to Walt Williams, Alberto Diaz likeable to Harold Meiner, and so-on.

This spring vacation, the Men's and Women's tennis teams will travel to Hilton Head, South Carolina. The trip to Hilton Head will prove crucial to the season's outcome. The men's tennis team will come up against solid programs such as R.P.I., Mary Washington, Division 1 Penn. State, Clark, and Emory, which is considered their most important match due to their Division 3 top ten ranking. The spring trip is pivotal to the season considering that there was no fall program and, consequently, no pre-season ranking. The spring trip will formally get the Men's and Women's tennis season underway, as well as formalize the relations of the entire WAC tennis squad.

Hey, over here! No, over here! Ohhh, IN YER FACE!! That's right folks, it's the Bleacher Creatures here and Spiderman and the Vaughnster are winding down to Spring Break, getting ready for the sunny beaches of South Carolina (Suffer in Florida, fellas.) For all you Spring athletes spending the break on the luxurious sunny practice fields here at the WAC . . . Um . . .Um. . . maybe you could roadtrip it down to OC for a couple of hours or something. But in all seriousness, keep the morale high and the intensity up!!

And now, drum roll please,(as your heart rate quickens) the moment you've all been waiting for, this week's NEWT's Player of the Week—the big man with three tris in the Rugby match last weekend, that's right, the Master of Disaster, the guy with the funny accent—Anthony "The Clutch Man" Black. Yup, it's true, this past weekend, Anthony's three tris boosted the WAC Ruggers to their first win of the season, a 33-8 victory over the St. Mary's squad. Says Rugby Club President Shawn Hamill, "Anthony is a valuable player. He adds a great deal to the team. He not only is a good rugby player, but he is also a leader for the younger guys to look up to. It will be tough to find someone to fill his position next semester." Congratulations Anthony and keep up the good work. (At this point, we usually make some ingenious remark about the POW's Caps playing ability, Anthony. However, we know how you guys hate to be associated with that childish game, so we'll restrain ourselves this week.)

WC Women's Lacrosse Faces a Rebuilding Year

By Renee Guckert
Staff Writer

As the 1992 lacrosse season approached, the eyes of the Washington College community were turned towards the Cain Dome, waiting to see whether a women's team would emerge this year. A great number of players had either graduated or were unable to continue playing this year. However, this rumor was dispelled as a team of approximately sixteen women raced onto the streets of Chestertown to begin pre-season training in mid-January. Since January, this relatively inexperienced women's lacrosse team, consisting of only seven returning players, has capitalized on their drive and enthusiasm in order to build up the strength which has been characteristic of past women's programs here at WC.

After speaking with a number of the team's players, the consensus was definitely a positive one. Freshman Julie Klein revealed that "it's going to be a lot of hard work because from what I understand, the team has lost a lot of experienced athletes. But in the end, I really believe we'll be able to hold our own." Junior Brigid DeVries, one of the veteran players, explained that "it is definitely going to be a year for re-building, but the new players show a lot of promise. The team is really enthusiastic and is progressing rapidly." Senior Margaret Doyle shares Brigid's opinion of this year's squad and when asked for her predictions for the season, Margaret responded, "our team has a lot of guts and a lot of heart; I think we'll come out with a winning season if we just take it one game at a time."

Women's lacrosse faces its first big challenge this weekend at the IFWLA Lacrosse Tournament in Hollins, Virginia. With a total of eight games to be played by Washington—five on Saturday and three on Sunday—the Shorewomen will go up against a variety of opponents including teams from Japan, Ithaca, Buffalo, and Dickinson, an MAC rival. Kristy Hilgartner, the only other senior on Washington's squad, predicts that "Kenyon and Ithaca will be challenging games; what our team lacks in experience, however, it makes up for in commitment and dedication."

Following the Hollins Tournament, the Shorewomen travel to Widener on Wednesday, the eighteenth and will host Franklin and Marshall here at the WAC on Saturday, the twenty-first at 1:00 p.m. Come out, support the team, and watch women's lacrosse stomp F & M!

Students Attend Model Organization of African Unity

By Jennifer Reddish
Staff Writer

Washington College International Studies Club members demonstrated their diplomatic knowledge as the Zambia delegation in the Thirteenth Annual Model Organization of African Unity at Howard University in Washington D.C. The group, which included Lionel Dyson, Andy McKim, Maria Jerardi, Ann Veiga, Stephanie Sherwell and Jennifer Reddish worked with 300 other students from universities across the nation, including some African participants who attend American universities. From the beginning, the trip seemed promising, especially after a meeting with the Chargé d'Affaires from Zambia. As advisor Dr. Shad remarked, "He seemed to know everything occurring in the country. He surprised us with Zambia's present stance on trade with South Africa, which differed from the opinion one would have derived from past information."

The Organization of African Unity (OAU) concerns itself solely with regional problems and crises, unlike the United Nations which addresses global issues. Therefore, the issues discussed in the committees of the Model OAU centered around the problem facing Africa today, especially apartheid in South Africa. As Stephanie Sherwell stated, "The United Nations resolutions were broader, less specific and encompassed the different ideals of many countries, whereas a regional organization like the OAU had more common goals and were more likely to work together."

Like the United Nations, OAU meetings follow strict parliamentary procedure. To present a resolution, one must obtain five signatures of delegates from one's committee. The resolutions are then consolidated with other country's resolutions to present a clear, concise idea to the committee. The committee then discusses the resolution and it is voted upon. If it passes, it is sent to the Assembly Heads of State and Government, where it is again subjected to debate. Another vote is then taken, with the resolution requiring a two-thirds majority to pass.

Overall, the group enjoyed the OAU experience, finding the diplomatic challenges and visit to Washington D.C. exciting. As Ann Veiga said, "I thought it was interesting how involved each delegation became with their country. They discussed each issue with emotion that made it seem real." Libya was by far the most in character of any of the countries, constantly referring to their beloved general and badgering smaller, more peaceful countries. As Maria Jerardi said, "I just really enjoyed the trip because we got to see first hand how the OAU works."

Bookstore Break-in

By John Griep
News Editor

Around 2 a.m. on Sunday, March 8, a break-in occurred at the Washington College Bookstore. According to Washington College Security Director Jerry Roderick, "some unknown person(s) smashed out one of the large windows in the bookstore and were able to reach in from the outside and remove about $75 worth of clothing." The cost of repairing the damaged window is estimated at approximately $600.

The case is currently under investigation. Anyone with any information on the burglary is requested to contact the Washington College Security Department at 778-2800, x. 310.

Roderick also stated that there have been no new leads on the theft of equipment from Dunning, but the investigation is still continuing.

Gene Wubbels Named New Dean and Provost of WC

By Doug Smith
Staff Writer

President Trout announced on Monday, March 16th that the Search Committee has selected a new permanent Dean and Provost of the College, Gene G. Wubbels. Wubbels will replace acting Dean John Taylor, who held the position temporarily for the 1991-92 academic year after the resignation of former Dean Elizabeth Baer. The new Dean starts on June 1st, assuming his decanal role on July 1st.

Wubbels comes to Washington College from Grinnell College in Iowa, where he acted as the chairman of the Chemistry Department. At Grinnell, he served as a member of several committees, including the Budget Priorities and Planning Committee. Wubbels did a stint as Visiting Professor at the University of Leiden, in the Netherlands. Since 1990, Wubbels has acted as Program Director at the National Science Foundation's Undergraduate Science, Engineering, and Mathematics Education Division in Washington, D.C. Wubbels is also a prolific writer, authoring or co-authoring thirty-five articles and twenty-seven successful grant proposals for undergraduate research, amounting to well over $750, 000. In all probability, Wubbels will bring with him an NSF-RUI grant, providing for ten paid summer internships over the next two years.

In a memo released earlier this week, President Trout defended Wubbels' selection. "Gene Wubbels is highly regarded in his field and has played an important role in strengthening our nation's position in undergraduate scientific education and training. A man of capacious intellect, he is wholly committed to the liberal arts in the broadest sense."

Jen Del Nero, one of several WC students involved in the selection process, is also enthusiastic about Wubbels' appointment to the position. "I wholeheartedly support and commend the decision of the Search Committee," she said. "What Gene Wubbels has to offer and contribute to Washington College will certainly advance dimensions of the college that have yet to reach their potential." With the appointment of Wubbels to the Deanship, Washington College stands poised on the threshold of a glorious new era of liberal arts education.

The Value of a Priceless Education

During a conversation this past week regarding the recent raise in tuition at WC, a friend told me, "if they're going to raise costs to above $18,000 a year, then maybe students should be guaranteed employment of equal worth after graduation." Not a bad idea, but then again, it goes against what a liberal-arts education represents. I'm not saying I wouldn't appreciate a job next year, but Washington College is not APEX Tech. I want to leave this school with a quality education, not a free set of tools.

For the past two issues, this editorial space has centered around my concern over the increasing cost of attending Washington College. A little harsh at times - Lambda pledges and bulldozers (difference?) - but nonetheless, from the heart. It would be so easy for me to write this one in the same vein, demanding improved academics, lower costs, and a significant decrease in meatheads NOW. But we all know that that will not happen immediately. Harvard wasn't built in a day. Money is increasingly scarce. And meatheads, well there never seems to be a shortage of them around here. The common denominator here is time. Time will tell when and if these issues are resolved correctly. I'd like to spend some of yours using a slightly different approach than my norm. Rather than fingering the dynamite switch connected to the Casey building, I will attempt a slightly more responsible (Yikes!) approach, and wax philosophic about Washington College's projected future. I'm also doing this because this is Sophie Kerr weekend, a time where prospective high-school seniors visit our campus. Potential student leaders who hopefully are attracted to WC for the right reasons. Who knows, maybe there'll even be a future ELM editor in the batch.

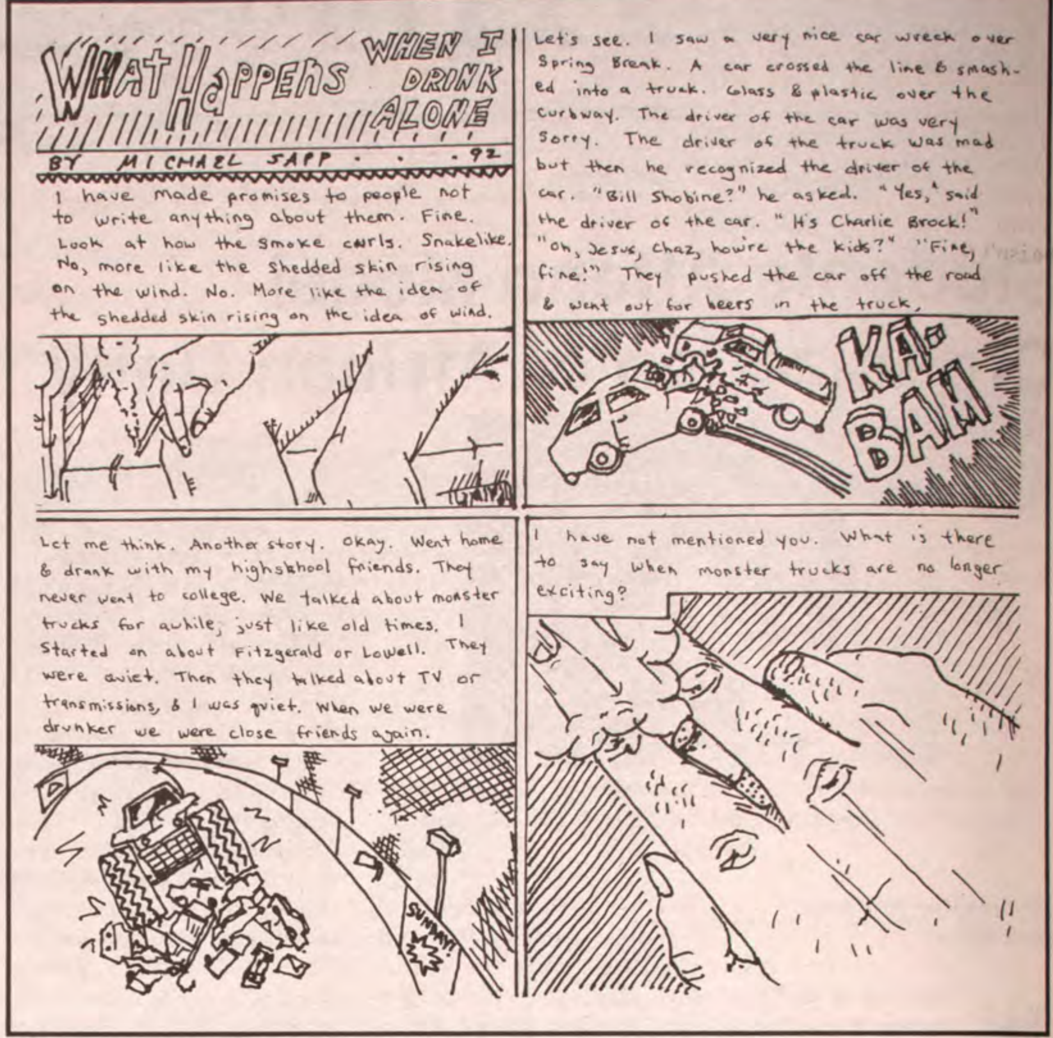
The past two years here have been marked by great transitions. President Cater (former big fish on campus) has been replaced by a kinder, gentler Trout. A replacement for Academic Dean Baer/Taylor has finally been found in Dean Gene Wubbels (but he won't fall down). Neiman's gone too. Sparky stood on his own two legs without incident,and now, Del Nero, our first female SGA President in some time. The Majestic Elm's history, falling victim to some Scandinavian disease, only to be replaced by a twig that we all hope will one day be big enough to show up on film. Even me. I'm only a replacement for Sherry who succeeded someone who...(you promised to be nice Pat)...well, would never be mistaken for Ben Bradlee. Hopefully this November, Bush will be replaced by someone whose commitment to education goes a little beyond a smile and a handshake.

I expect next year to be a pivotal one for Washington College. We will finally start to witness some improvements from these transitions. President Trout is no longer wet behind the ears. Wubbels' presence promises to change WC's reputation from a day-care center to somewhere parents can drop their kids off and know they'll return with more than a working knowledge of the most recent CAPS' rules. The Tulip-Poplar will grow rapidly, establishing itself as the new focal point of the Campus Green while symbolizing Trout's commitment to higher education, not higher costs. In turn, the ELM will come to represent the continued improvement of student journalism at WC, rather than succumbing to the same fate as its namesake.

As a graduating senior, I won't be here to see these great improvements. I'll read about them in the ELM and the Washington College Magazine, but the ones who will really reap the benefits of this future will hopefully be the students. Give them time, show them a strong commitment, and they will soon blossom. It takes a while. I look back now on my Freshman year, and how far I and many of my friends have come, and well, if we were playing by the rules set by my previous commentary, then this paper would be short one editor.

Even if instead of pacing the floors of a newsroom next year I'm mopping them (please God no!), I'll still be able to look back on my years at WC and smile. While many of my friends spent their time at more practical collegiate facilities, learning the usefulness of a slide-rule and calculator, I can say I spent mine luxuriously exploring the writings of Aristotle, Kierkegard, and Hume. The thundering prose of Hemingway, the quiet lines of a William Stafford poem. The music of Bartok, the mystery of Derrida.

So, fifty-nine days from now, when I'll tip my glass of champagne to my future under the "shade" of the recently-planted Tulip Poplar, I will also toast to the future of Washington College. Rather than bringing in the bulldozers, as a new alumni I will contribute whatever I can to ensure the Chris Mihavetzes, the Ann Veigas, the Bridgette Ferrises of future graduating classes will be afforded the same luxury I was so fortunate to have. The value of a true liberal arts education is priceless. Students should graduate with a mountain of knowledge, not a mountain of bills.



WHAT HAPPENS WHEN I DRINK ALONE
BY MICHAEL SAPP . . . 92
I have made promises to people not to write anything about them. Fine. Look at how the smoke curls. Snakelike. No, more like the shedded skin rising on the wind. No. More like the idea of the shedded skin rising on the idea of wind.
Let's see. I saw a very nice car wreck over Spring Break. A car crossed the line & smashed into a truck. Glass & plastic over the curbway. The driver of the car was very sorry. The driver of the truck was mad but then he recognized the driver of the car. "Bill Shobine?" he asked. "Yes," said the driver of the car. "It's Charlie Brock!" "Oh, Jesus, Chaz, how're the kids?" "Fine, fine!" They pushed the car off the road & went out for beers in the truck.
KA-BAM
Let me think. Another story. Okay. Went home & drank with my highschool friends. They never went to college. We talked about monster trucks for awhile, just like old times. I started on about Fitzgerald or Lowell. They were quiet. Then they talked about TV or transmissions, & I was quiet. When we were drunker we were close friends again.
SUNDAY!
I have not mentioned you. What is there to say when monster trucks are no longer exciting?

Greek System Debate Criticized

The debate "This House Would Ban the Greek System" was a disappointment to those of us looking for a thought-provoking discussion. About 60 pro-Greek constituents attended, about 4 against, and about 15 undecided; this is an indication that those who participate in the Greek system also strongly support it, and this is admirable. However, it seems that some large portion of the audience was ignorant of the concept of a hypothetical debate. When the argument was opened to the floor, the discourse turned from a rational presentation of well-formulated points into a sad commentary on the social hierarchy of our campus. I don't know which was worse —the fallacious verbal attacks on specific organizations coming from both sides of the floor or the misunderstanding by the audience of the valid contentions which were offered forth.

The purpose of this debate was to provoke thought. It was hypothetical (read: pretend). One pro-Greek constituent's query, "Why are you trying to take this away from us?" was ridiculous. No one was trying to take away anything from anyone. If someone presents a point of view which contradicts with one's own, one should consider that the person may have a valid rationale; one should not adopt the "fuck you, man, you don't understand us" mentality.

In the future, I would like to see the trend in campus social groups be towards mutual cooperation, not obliteration.

Sincerely,
J. Tarin Towers

Cater Responds to Criticism

Dear Editor:

The debate over bricks and mortar at Washington College, while constructive, should not ignore three premises that guided my term as president.

First, the tenth oldest college in America deserved a campus worthy of its heritage.

Second, to enhance the buildings and grounds would help reverse the sharp decline in enrollment that was threatening bankruptcy.

Third, capital gifts would attract increased giving to endowment as well as to operating budgets for educational programs.

All three premises have been amply confirmed by the experience of the past decade. Regrettably, building cannot be carried out without mud and other disruptions. But surely any close observer must note non-cosmetic but vital changes in every dimension of College life. It will be distressing if the decade of the 1980's should be recorded as simply brick and mortar time. This would diminish all those who set high expectations for the College as it entered its third century.

Sincerely,
Douglass Cater

Nolan on Hoagland on Thoreau: Environmental Concerns Hit Home

By Andrea Nolan
Staff Writer

John Updike said of him, "If he isn't the best essayist of my generation then I don't know who is." Who is this literary wonder? None other than Edward Hoagland, editor of the Penguin Series on the Environment. On Wednesday, March 18, Hoagland presented a lecture on Thoreau and Environmental Concerns, sponsored by the McLain Program in Environmental Studies.

Edward Hoagland is a renowned environmental novelist, having published such novels as Heart's Desire and Peacock's Tale. Hoagland had a great deal to say about Thoreau, the father of environmentalism. He also introduced some interesting ideas on the environmental movement and man's place in nature.

Mr. Hoagland said that "We are now engaged in a struggle to conserve what nature that is left." This is true and most people would admit that if steps aren't taken to preserve our environment they will soon become simple memories. However, there is a considerably smaller consensus of agreement when it comes to actually saving those very same wildlands. Why such a discrepancy? One major factor is that in today's urbanized world people believe they live apart from nature. When nature is viewed as separate from mankind it becomes simple scenery, which would be nice to save but is not vitally important.

Thoreau, and in turn Hoagland, tackle this dangerous opinion. Is nature truly separated from man by concrete and steel? Edward Hoagland answered a resounding no. He criticized his peers by saying that what the "so-called nature writers" don't realize is that human nature is a part of nature. This is a concept Thoreau thoroughly believed. He left the civilized world to live with nature, to learn from nature. However one doesn't need to go on a year-long journey in the woods to become close to nature. Thoreau never traveled to the frontier to see the new and strange wildlife and mountains. He remained on the eastern seaboard and studied the nature of his home and didn't feel that he missed anything. Human nature is truly a part of nature. Appreciate the simple land you walk on, the air you breath, the squirrels you see — appreciate yourself. Nature is inescapable.

Environmentalists and scientists give numerous reasons in support of preserving the earth's remaining wildlands, such as possible medical cures which may be disappearing with the daily destruction of plant and animal species throughout the world. Or they simply rule out the human factor altogether and want to save the wildlands and other animals for the sake of those very creatures. The reasons they give are all valid arguments but they are distant and removed from today's urbanized man. However, isn't the simple fact that since in being human we are a part of nature and that by destroying nature we are in fact killing at least a part of ourselves enough reason? For each acre of land that dies is a part of every human dying too. The disappearance of that acre of life must have some effect on the world around it.

Luther Standing Bear said "The old Lakota was wise. He knew that man's heart, away from nature, becomes hard; he knew that lack of respect for growing living things soon led to lack of respect for humans too." The Native Americans lived on this land for thousands of years and kept it new and virgin. Those who disturbed the land the least were respected the most. We have only lived here comparatively few years and have already managed to destroy much of the land. However the earth has great healing capabilities if we give her the chance. We do not have to follow in the same direction as the generation before us. Thoreau had no respect for his elders. He wrote in Walden that, "I have lived some thirty years on this planet, and I have yet to hear the first syllable of valuable or even earnest advice from my seniors."

It is up to us to change what is wrong. We cannot herald it as too great a task, for who else is there to conquer it? Thoreau wrote in Walden "If you have built castles in the air, your work need not be lost; that is where they should be. Now put foundations under them." According to Hoagland, we would do well to follow his advice.

Lit House Café Opens

By Adria Nesberg
Staff Writer

A new activity will hit the Washington College campus on Friday, March 20; it has the sound of jazz and the look of art. Beginning this week, from 3 until 7 p.m. on Friday afternoons, the O'Neill Literary House porch will turn into the "Lit House Café." The Lit House Café is a place where students and faculty can gather to interact in a relaxed atmosphere to enjoy art, music, and food.

Tina McCuen, a WC junior, originally came up with the idea for the café. The idea was for the café to act as a gathering place, a place where student artists and musicians can get a "good audience." Each week the type of music will be different, from jazz this week to classical the next. McCuen approached students in the Music and Art Departments seeking performers for the events. Finally, Tina sought a manager for the café, and found one in sophomore Will Phipps, who is "very excited about the idea of the café."

Prof. Bob Day, Lit House Director, strongly encourages and supports the café as an arena of student entertainment. If anyone wants to submit any artwork or perform at the Lit House Café, please contact either Prof. Day or Will Phipps. All students are encouraged to attend this Friday's grand opening to ensure its continued success for the remainder of the semester.

Women's Quest for Learning in the Gilded Age

Mari Jo Buhle, Prof. of History at Brown University will deliver the 1991-92 Guy F. Goodfellow Memorial Lecture at WC. The lecture, titled "'The Dawning Light of a New Era:' Women's Quest for Learning in the Gilded Age," will be given Tuesday, March 24 at 8 p.m. in the Norman James Theatre at Washington College. Admission is free and the public is encouraged to attend.

Buhle's lecture, which focuses on the birth of women's education in the U. S. in the late 19th century, is given in honor of Washington College's centenary of coeducation. A specialist in Feminism and Socialism in 19th and early 20th century America, Buhle is the author of two books, Women and American Socialism, 1870-1920, and Women and the American Left: A Guide to Sources, as well as numerous articles and essays on the Socialist party, women's suffrage, women in the labor movement and the history of American feminism.

Since 1972, Buhle has taught History and American Civilization at Brown University, which is also celebrating a centenary of coeducation this year. Buhle received her B.A. at the University of Illinois, her M.A. at the University of Connecticut and her Ph.D. at the University of Wisconsin.

Toxic Incineration on the Chesapeake Bay

A symposium on the regional impact of the United States Army's proposed chemical weapons incinerator at Aberdeen Proving Grounds in Harford County, Maryland, will be held in Tawes Theatre on Saturday, April 11, from 9:30 a.m. until 3 p.m.

The purpose of the symposium is to air the facts and rationale regarding the Army's proposed chemical weapons incinerator at the Proving Grounds, as well as to better inform the citizens of Kent, Cecil, Harford and Baltimore Counties, which surround the upper Chesapeake Bay region, of the Army's objectives, environmental concerns, moral issues, emergency preparedness and citizen concerns.

Representatives of the U.S. Army, the Maryland Dept. of the Environment, the Maryland Director of Emergency Preparedness, Environmental Specialists, and Maryland elected officials have been invited to participate in the symposium.

The symposium is sponsored by the Goldstein Program in Public Affairs and the McLain Program in Environmental Studies. It has been organized by concerned citizens of Kent County.

Workshop on Stream Monitoring

A special workshop on monitoring streams will be conducted by Maryland Save Our Streams on Saturday March 28. The workshop is aimed at training volunteers to evaluate the water quality of local streams and teach them how to improve it. The workshop will be from 9:30-3:30 and involves a slide show and visits to test local streams.

The workshop, co-sponsored by Hands Out, Terra Firma, and Kent Conservation will lead to involvement in the Adopt-A-Stream program where Washington College can regularly monitor the health of a nearby stream. Sign-up sheets will be in the cafeteria next week. For further information contact Andrew McKim at 778-7889.

Open Letter

An Open Letter to Students from Prof. Brien

Dear Students of Washington College:

This is one of few times that I ever have written an open letter to students. I do so here because — given the particular configuration of circumstances that converge at the College just now — it seems important for me to do so.

We are in the midst of a significant "historical juncture" here at Washington College. A new academic dean will be appointed soon; President Trout has been at work developing his projects, and has found his stride by now. Together with the help of the new academic dean, he will likely be concerned to strengthen the academic program in various ways in the near future. But just how those "various ways" will actually work out will be contingent in large measure on student good will, student concern, and on student input.

It is also very clear to me that just how they will work out will be affected in significant ways by the manner in which we as a community confront — or fail to confront — the problem of plagiarism and other forms of academic dishonesty. Please hear me out! This is not an easy letter for me to write, and I think it may not be an easy letter for some of you to read — but please hear me out!

A broad spectrum of statistical evidence makes it clear that plagiarism is not just a problem here at Washington College; it is a problem throughout our country. My understanding is that for some time now — decades I would say — an epidemic of plagiarism has been undermining our culture. And as I see things, this seething epidemic reached a new level during the Reagan presidential era — an era marked by a spreading corrosion in the integrity of the body politic, as well as in the general integrity of language itself. And it has continued to hover close to this level ever since.

But we cannot go on like this in our country without serious, culture-wide, negative long-term consequences. And in my view one of the most serious long-term effects of widespread plagiarism (and other academic improprieties) is the unintended sabotage of the kind of "critical intelligence" that must be developed if we are to survive in healthy ways as a culture — and perhaps if we are even to survive at all.

In the short space of this letter I cannot fully explain the kind of "critical intelligence" I have in mind here, let alone present the argument for its practical necessity. But let me focus on one dimension of it. To do so I need to make a distinction between a short-term mind set and a long-term one.

The short-term mind set is fixated on short-term gains and benefits, and is usually blind to the long-term negative fallout of pursuing merely short-term gains. In contrast, the long-term mind set is attentive to both the near and the long-term effects of our individual practice and our social action — balancing long-term well being and interests, with those of the short run.

As we confront the enormous environmental, social, political, and economic problems of our era — and the growing crisis of humanity associated therewith — it is very clear that we need a kind of "critical intelligence" that transcends the short-term mind set that is so widely entrenched. In its place we need to evolve a "critical intelligence" culturally that no longer fixates merely on short-term advantage. To be sure we need to understand the short run. But our culture also needs to evolve a "critical intelligence" that understands the dynamics of long-term developmental processes, and the complicated interplay of the dynamically interrelated forces at play therein. Such understanding must also embrace within itself the understanding of the more limited short-term dynamics as a phase in the overall process. And of course such "critical intelligence" must be rooted in disciplined knowledge.

Sadly, and for far too long, our culture has been stuck in the mold of the short-term mind set. And I fully believe it will eventually mean the ruin of our culture if we do not find a way to transcend the situation. Even now we can see some of the handwriting on the wall. For instance, I would argue that the economic dislocations we are recently witnessing in our country are due in good part to the continuing cultural fixation on the short-term, and on an agenda that is carried out under its aegis. And I believe that more and more dysfunctional effects of such fixation will emerge as we go toward the next century, unless we succeed in changing things.

Let me return now to the issue of plagiarism. I hold that widespread plagiarism, as well as other forms of academic dishonesty in our culture, contribute directly to the continuing cultural fixation on the short-term mind set, just as they flow back from it. Further, I hold that they dynamically function to short circuit the development of the kind of "critical intelligence" we so desperately need to evolve. Concerning our own campus, I have come to believe on the basis of my experience here, that academic dishonesty is a serious problem at Washington College. Just how pervasive it might be is unclear at the moment, prior to something like a scientific survey of the issue. But that is coming.

Clearly there is student complicity in plagiarism, as well as in other forms of academic dishonesty. In some cases this complicity is intentional; but my guess is that it is unintentional for the most part. And there are many modes of complicity. Let me focus on just one mode: the complicity of the facilitator, rather than the perpetrator, of plagiarism.

If you give a paper to another student to copy from, you share complicity in plagiarism. If you allow one of your papers to be placed in a file that other students will likely use as an unacknowledged source for their term papers, you share complicity in plagiarism. If you acquiesce in allowing such files to be maintained in your fraternity house or in your dorm, you share complicity in plagiarism. If you allow another student to read one of your past papers that happens to overlap the subject matter of that student's paper — and if you do so without asking that proper acknowledgement be given in that student's footnotes to your paper as one of the sources — you also share a kind of complicity in plagiarism. If you encourage your friend to stretch the rules of academic honesty, or actively approve of it, you share complicity in plagiarism. And there are many other types of such complicity.

Those of you who share intentional or unintentional complicity in plagiarism (and other forms of academic dishonesty) may think you are serving the best interests of yourself, your friend, or your

Tuition Increase Adversely Affects WC Students

By Chris Mihavetz
& John Griep
with Pat Attenasio

For many Washington College students, last week's announcement of an increase in total costs for the 1992-1993 academic year not only threatens to put a severe dent in their pocketbooks, but also threatens their very future at this institution. In a letter to parents and independent students dated February 28, WC President Charles Trout cited three recent cutbacks in state funding and poor endowment earnings as the reason for the $1112 increase. He also stated it was his hope that they would continue to support the college's "mission of high quality education" despite the country's economic recession.

Economic hardships are also affecting students across the state. The Maryland Higher Education Commission reports applications for student financial aid are running forty-four percent ahead of last year. The Commission, which administers state financial aid programs, estimates that the number of applications could increase by as much as 16,000 students if the trend continues. To date, 26,704 applications have been processed, compared with 18,499 at the same time last year. Total applications submitted by March 1st last year exceeded 38,000, and this year's figure could reach 54,000 if the rate of increase holds.

Shaila R. Aery, the Secretary of Higher Education, attributed the increase to the recession and tuition increases. "Students are being hit with higher tuition at the same time that many families are seeing their incomes decrease," Aery said, adding, "And, with unemployment up, there are fewer jobs available to students who are working their way through college."

On Tuesday, March 17, the ELM spoke with Bridgette Ferris and Ann Veiga, two Washington College students whose contributions have been significant over their years here, but nonetheless will be affected by the increase in total costs to the point where their future status at WC remains uncertain.

Bridgette Ferris

Bridgette is a second semester junior concentrating in English, German, and Women's Studies. She is a member of the German Club, the Writer's Union, and also helped found the Anthropological Society at Washington College.

Bridgette says, "I am twenty years old and my parents are not helping me with college at all. My mother works very hard to put my brother and sister through a special school for dyslexics and cannot afford anymore on what she makes. My father does not support me at all. My grandparents also cannot afford to help me, so for the past two years, I have been paying everything on my own. That includes everything from tuition to laundry detergent.

The yearly increases have already affected me. I live from semester to semester not knowing if I will be able to return. I am very concerned about this new increase. Right now, even before the increase, I am taking out a one thousand dollar loan because I can not pay for my books and have no spending money at all. When the increase comes in September, I do not know how I'm going to pay for it and that will be my senior year - I am terrified.

I work at Delmarva Power as a copy-writer for the employee magazine in the summertime. I have nothing in the bank though, all of my money goes to tuition and books. Lately, I have been modeling for the Art department to make spending money. I'm glad that I am doing all of this on my own though. It has instilled a sense of independence and motivation. I am responsible only for myself and to myself which is an incredible feeling.

I love this college and I chose it because it was such a small school. I do not want to be forced to leave. I have made many close friends and would hate to not be able to return for my senior year. I mean, this is really when it should all be taking off for me.

After graduation, I will have at least $15,000 dollars in loans to pay off. Although I feel an education is the best kind of investment you can make, I also feel like I'm indenturing myself.

I am now applying to the University of Delaware to make sure that I have a place to go next year if I do not get the financial aid to return to Washington College. Even so, it is highly likely that a lot of my credits will not transfer and I would be wasting quite a bit of my time and money. I feel that to have all that I've accomplished here taken away just like that, after I have worked so hard for it on my own, would be very frustrating. I would like to graduate from this school, and I am very close to it, but it's like it's going to have to be by the skin of my teeth. I never really know.

What is really upsetting is that I found out last year when I applied for financial aid that academic scholarships are available only to incoming students. I mean, for people like myself, who were mediocre students in high school but bloomed academically in college, there are no academic scholarships available here. That is very frustrating."

Ann Veiga

Ann, a senior majoring in Humanities, will return to WC in the Spring of 1993 to finish her studies after spending a semester abroad. She is the president of both Terra Firma and Sane/Freeze and also serves as co-editor of Shoe Strings, a children's literary magazine.

Ann feels that the administration is not really concerned about the financial difficulties of Washington College students. For example, she is expected to save at least $1200 each summer to contribute towards her education. However, since she is an independent student, Ann says, "during the summer I just do my best to survive and am unable to save a great deal of money. Most of my summer earnings are spent on food and rent." This requires her to take out additional loans to meet her expected summer earnings.

The college also figures that students will only spend $300 annually on personal expenses, such as soap, detergent, etc. According to Ann, when she discussed this issue with an administrator, the person jokingly asked her, "What do you do, buy $80 wool sweaters?" However, Ann says, "I haven't been able to buy any new clothes in several years because all my money must go for basic necessities."

Currently, Ann has to take out loans each year to help pay for her college education. Ann said that the effect of the tuition increase on her would not occur right away, but would be long-term because she would probably have to take out larger loans. Ann concluded by saying that the tuition increase is "just one more thing I'll have to worry about."

[An in-depth ELM report on Washington College's budget for the 1992-93 academic year, with an emphasis on financial aid concerns, will appear in the March 27 issue. Gene Hessey, Senior Vice President of Management and Finance was ill this week and unavailable for comment.]

Bridgette Ferris

"For the past two years, I have been paying everything on my own. That includes everything from tuition to laundry detergent. When the increase comes in September, I don't know how I'm going to pay for it and that will be my senior year-I'm terrified. I'd like to graduate from this school, and I'm very close to it, but it's like going to be by the skin of my teeth. I never really know."

fellow sorority member. And it may seem as if you are serving the interests of a particular friend to be a facilitator of his academic dishonesty — when he is exhausted from athletic practice, say, and does not have the energy of body or mind to cope with a paper or exam coming due. But whatever short-term advantage is secured thereby, it is secured at the cost of negating and undermining the long-term interests of your friend, as well as both the short- and long-term interests of our College, and of our culture.

In making it easy for a friend to slide into academic dishonesty, you are dynamically interfering with the kind of disciplined practice in academic work that is essential if your friend is to develop the sort of "critical intelligence" that is necessary for his or her long-term well being. One is not born with such "critical intelligence." It is a skill that can only be attained by practice. It requires work and energy.

And if you interfere with the essential practice of your friend, you thereby interfere with the personal evolution of your friend — you negate your friend. And, of course, if you allow yourself to slide into academic dishonesty, you negate yourself — for the self as seen from the long-term mind set can only be understood as a developing process. And in both cases you negate the community.

We have got to come together collectively — students, faculty, and staff — and do whatever is necessary to rejuvenate our academic environment. To determine how to proceed, we must get a clear and accurate picture of the real situation on campus from the student body via the questionaire about academic honesty that the Student Academic Board will soon project. I ask you as one vitally concerned; I plead with you as a teacher; I beg you as one human being to another! Please respond as honestly and as fully as you can to the questionaire that the SAB will distribute. Please come clean on this! Please give us an accurate picture of the reality at our College. If I am wrong about the scope of academic dishonesty on campus, I will back off and fade away.

But if I am right about all this — then come forth and give us the documented evidence that will convince our faculty of the scope of the problem here at Washington College. And come forth to persuade the faculty to accept, to support, and to implement the kind of changes that are practically necessary to remedy things. I believe that the most effective choices we can make to bring things into a clearing are the following interrelated moves:

1) Change the academic curriculum to allow a broad number of different programs of study that could be undertaken by students prior to, or subsidiary to, their major program — programs of study that will be interdisciplinary, that will cultivate "critical intelligence," and that will be focused in a such a way that students will be drawn into the material, since its relevance to their lives will be apparent to them, and since the individual courses will be designed to be interesting and exciting. These programs should be interdisciplinary in all the different ways. I am speaking about such programs as an "environmental program," a "gender studies program," a "peace studies program" — and other programs that are interdisciplinary in nature. Perhaps each program should require some sort of an interdisciplinary course on "critical reasoning." And every effort should be made by the faculty to make individual courses in these programs the most interesting courses possible. Individual class sizes should be small to allow for full scale discussion by students. Though interesting, relevant, and even fun — these programs should be very solid academically. Moreover, these programs are the same ones that should be developed so that Washington College can attract a somewhat higher proportion of academically stronger students interested in these issues of great social moment. Put the academically stronger students who have already developed some sort of disciplined critical intelligence together in small sections with the academically weaker students; do this in the context of reading and discussion that is experienced as relevant and interesting by all the students — and the academically weaker students will get much stronger academically. And this will carry through to all their other work. In conjunction with the institution of these programs we should raise the minimum GPA for graduation.

2) Develop a number of overlapping ways to make sure that all of our students really understand what academically honest work is — and what it is not. This could include: a) Required student workshops on the nature of academic honesty, as part of the Forms course or as part of the first year writing obligation. (This could be partly addressed by paying honor students to help with the workshops, and by hiring other personnel if necessary.) b) Develop individual departmental policies that emphasize academic honesty, and that provide explicit guidelines for academic honesty appropriate to the particular discipline of that department. c) Regular reaffirmation of the importance of academic honesty by faculty members in individual classes.

3) Change outgoing PR so that there is more emphasis on academics. Specifically, more stress on the requirement that academics is to have priority, and is to be given at least equal time outside of class with socializing, and with athletics. Perhaps we should be upfront in our PR and tell students to wait a year before coming here if they are not ready to make the commitment to the priority of academics, and perhaps a condition of acceptance to the college should be commitment to the priority of academics. The time allowed for total athletic practice (formal and informal), or for any other extra-curricular activity, should be decreased where this is interfereing with academic performance.

4) We should reformulate the honor code, develop it, clarify it, and revise it. And we should replace the present panel that judges plagiarism cases with an all-student panel.

As I bring this long letter to a close, let me ask again for your help. There are so many good things about our College, and there are so many good things about our curriculum. But we have some problems that need to be honestly recognized. Let us do what is practically necessary to restore the integrity of our institution; and let us do what is necessary to lift it to a new level of academic well being. Let us do what is necessary to awaken the "critical intelligence" of those in whom it is still asleep. Among other things there is so much academic potential that is languishing away among our less developed students. And how many of the more developed students are really working at full potential? Let us come together on this. Let us enhance the vitality of our academic environment! All of you students who have read this letter that comes from the heart, and from the guts, should understand by now that what I propose is truly for your welfare. Let us come together! Let us move on this! For your own well being academically, personally, and socially, let us all come together on this. For the value of your education. For the sake of your life. For the sake of your friends here. For the sake of the children you will bear. Let us come together! It is time to wake up! Let us come together!

Sincerely,
Kevin M. Brien

The Quality of Academics at Washington College: "You Get Out of Your Education What You Put Into It"

Julie Greene

With the Middle States Association re-accreditation approaching, revisions are being made to the school's mission statement, as well as an analysis of the school's long range plans. With these modifications, the foundation and quality of education at Washington College have been popular topics for discussion amongst its students, faculty, and administration.

Several issues pertinent to this topic have been discussed in public forums lately. This includes the topic of plagiarism on campus brought to light this semester by a letter to the faculty by Professor Brien and published in the ELM. The issue was then addressed at the Birthday Convocation by Student Government Association President Kevin Kelly. Some members of the college community may have been embarrassed by the discussion of such a hefty topic on such a pleasantly eventful day; however, the cause of embarrassment may be misguided. We should be ashamed it had to be brought up at all, not that Kelly had the guts to mention these indiscretions in front of the school's guests and the Board of Visitors and Governors. He had the right and the responsibility to see that this issue is brought to the attention of the college community.

Kelly also mentioned the growing number of "pass-throughs" at WC. This too must stop if the institution wants to maintain its dignity so its alumni can continue to be proud of their academic heritage. Part of the reason there are so many students passing through is because they find it easy to avoid the work, and one method for doing this is plagiarism.

One solution could be what some faculty already do — keep the tests, both questions and answers, so students can request to see them if need be, but they are not floating around for anyone to borrow. An alternative solution which many faculty exercise is to create new exams each semester.

But most importantly, the problem of plagiarism should be treated at the source. An Honor Code Council has been formed, with student representation, to address this issue. No matter what revisions are made it is the student who makes the final decision. Hopefully students will receive positive reinforcement from peers and the faculty to practice academic honesty.

Let me pause here and state that by no means am I asserting that Washington College has become a "walk-through" academic institution. Nor is it the only institution of higher learning which has to deal with such concerns. But it is the WC education with which we are primarily concerned. It is a growing concern amongst many students that the margin of excellence they pursue here is not receiving its proper respect due to a decline in academic standards at WC.

If this decline in academic standards continues, as well as the view that the education provided by the WC experience is not up to its past standards, alumni are not going to be as willing to support WC. The support alumni provide is great and includes not only financial contributions, but spreading a good word of their alma mater to prospective students. If that support is to be maintained in the future WC must continue to be an alma mater worthy of a good word.

The decline in academic standards is due in large part to the high costs of a WC education. With the overall cost of a WC education increasing by $1112 for the 1992-93 academic year, many high school graduates will continue to hesitate in their decision to attend WC. It is too early to tell whether or not promises for continued financial aid to compensate students for the increase can be taken seriously.

On a positive note, it is encouraging to see the plans for a new academic building going well. It is important both to the current college community as well as incoming students to show support for academic facilities as well as athletic facilities.

Another issue of importance to students and faculty is the priority faculty place on publishing in relation to that of teaching. The February 28th issue of the ELM featured several briefs on faculty who have been, or are about to be, published. They all expressed their belief that WC has not placed a "publish or perish" mentality on the faculty, yet several students feel that they have taken a back seat to these pursuits.

Hopefully, the administration and faculty will continue to recognize that WC has a history of emphasizing the priority of teaching over publishing, and that professors should not be turned away or declined promotion or tenure on the basis of whether or not they publish.

This is not meant to lower the accomplishments of these professors, for this is an institution known for its writing. Their ability and enjoyment of writing can have a positive influence on students and the college. They set a fine example for many aspiring writers on campus. My point is that those faculty whose love for teaching is the main priority should not be penalized or discouraged for not publishing on a constant basis.

This is a liberal arts institution at which the majority of a student's education is accounted for outside of the classroom. We are told that for every hour in class, we should study at least three hours on our own. Students are encouraged to attend lectures, debates, and to become active in athletics, clubs and the student government. A large number of us are also working to support our education monetarily.

So this message is to and for the students more than anyone else in the community. You get out of your education what you put into it. Don't take short cuts and wonder later on in life why you feel unsatisfied with your education.

To quote James Markland, Editor of Career Futures magazine: "In the end, a genuine education — particularly higher education — is not given to you by institutions or systems; it is taken by individuals. In a very real sense we are all self-educated. Yes, technical improvements can always be made to aid the process (and hopefully they will be), but meaningful change must come from the bottom up, from individuals who have salvaged the true spirit of curiosity when most are comfortable with an easy incoherence."

So as the administration tries to decide whether or not Washington College's growth should precede or coincide with its betterment, and the mission statement is revised to take into consideration such factors as diversity, the students at WC must take into consideration their educational agenda. Do you want to become a statistic, a "pass-through", or do you want to become someone who not only obtained an honest, high-quality education, but someone who made a positive impact on the college community?

Neo-Fascists in Germany: Sickness or Symptom?

S. Ross Koon

When I lived in Berlin in the mid-eighties I was very aware of the city's skinhead population. One of my friends estimated that at that time there were approximately 10,000 skins in Berlin. Although that number is not large for a city with 3 million inhabitants, the skins seemed omnipresent. I could not but help to be aware of the violence they perpetrated against people of color-particularly against Berlin's large Turkish population. Among my circle of friends we would always speak disdainfully of the skinheads and ridicule them whenever there was a large group of us and only one or two or three of them. One of my best friends was half German and half Congoese, and he often accompanied us on our trips to the Kudamm. Whenever he was with us and a large group of skinheads would stomp onto the subway car we were riding in we would just look out the window and shut our mouths, waiting for the attack that never came but always could. During moments like those I felt that I knew what it must have felt like to be riding under the same streets only fifty short years before that time.

Berlin has changed greatly since I was last there in 1986, and not necessarily for the better in all respects. Crime has increased, the streets are less clean and the absorption of the GDR into the FRG has been a huge drain on taxpayers' funds. But solutions to these problems seem to be only a matter of time and energy, whereas the problem of racism and fascism seems intractable. The incidence of attacks and arson have increased dramatically. The attacks against asylum seekers and refugees from the third world is most alarming-particularly since these people have only fled their homelands from a desire to be safe from attack only to find that they are similarly persecuted in their safe haven.

What are the root causes of these odious crimes? Racist youth gangs are not unique to Germany, yet what is it that causes German skinheads to be so exceptionally zealous in their persecution of others. A simplistic explanation would be that the Germans are somehow innately predisposed to a fascist mentality. This is total nonsense. The actual situation is far more complex; skinheads arose in Germany from the same social phenomena which have caused the emergence of youth gangs in the rest of the western world, and the only reason for the depth of the German skinheads' devotion to their racist ideology is the failure of German society to properly teach young Germans the lessons of German history.

I believe that the root cause of neo-Nazism is that young Germans have continually been made to feel guilt for the atrocities of their elders. The Holocaust is a vast mountain of pus on the face of German history, yet it must also be viewed as an aberration. The problem with the Germans' treatment of the Holocaust is that it is not treated as a historical aberration, but rather a cancer on the body of the German people which must continually be re-expurgated. It seems that the prevailing attitude is that if there exists enough collective guilt then Nazism will not reoccur. Perhaps this method of dealing with Nazism was effective and necessary during denazification but to continue it has been counterproductive. To cause a person to feel guilt for the atrocities of their forefathers can cause two extreme results: either that person will become vehemently opposed to fascism, or that person will rebel against the message being forced down that person's throat and become inexorably drawn towards that which has been forbidden by law and censure. The best path would be to never forget the despicable Nazi era while simultaneously emphasizing that Germans have much to be proud of.

The December 1991 issue of Der Spiegel quoted Sheila Mysorekar, a non-white German journalist as saying that "For whites, black means alien, foreigner, not German. (Therefore in Germany there) supposedly exists no racism, only hatred against foreigners." This comment rings very true to me. Most Americans view ours as an immigrant society and therefore find this bit of Teutonic illogic difficult to swallow-unless one looks at how new immigrants are treated in this country. What is needed in Germany is a more liberal immigration policy. Granted this would be difficult at the present time, but a more liberal immigration policy could be phased in gradually, and resident foreign nationals could be given the option of citizenship. This is anathema to most Germans, even liberals-yet it must be done. Germany as a nation must realize that German culture is perfectly capable of incorporating immigrants from other races and nations without losing the uniqueness of German culture. The process of developing a more tolerant Germany will be a slow one, but it can start in small ways. The process of obtaining and renewing visas is now overly Byzantine and time-consuming. Schools with large numbers of foreign students can make a more conscious effort to "Germanize" them. The rewards of implementing such a program are great-it is precisely because of its large immigrant population that Berlin is so cosmopolitan. Doner kebabs, pizza, baklava, gyros and Slavic specialties are all readily available. Citizenship for non-Germans is a win-win proposal. Perhaps it would also gradually cause racism to decrease, and thereby cause the rest of the world to think of the Germans not as the Nazis of days gone by, but rather as the leaders of Europe-and eventually-the World.

DO SOMETHING GOOD. FEEL SOMETHING REAL.

Taylor: The Emperor's New Jazz?

By Franklin Quincy Adams & John Sebastian Blakelock
Music Staff

We didn't like Billy Taylor in Tawes Theatre.
We didn't like him there.
We wouldn't like him anywhere.
We didn't like him in a tux and tie,
So at intermission, we bid Billy good-bye.

Tuesday night at Tawes Theatre, Billy Taylor's Trio performed competently to a large and enthusiastic crowd. These respected artists demonstrated their ability to wear tuxedoes and play well-rehearsed jazz at the same time. Varying his set between covers and originals, Taylor proved that his own works can hold their own in comparison to the covered repertoire.

Unfortunately, from our seats on the far left of the front row, the drummer was so loud that the bassist was almost completely lost, and Billy was merely a shimmering of scales and nice chords in the background, except for when he took to the mike to tell his funny little stories about Tucson. But to the drummer's credit, he did appear to be the liveliest of the three muscians. By switching from the sticks to the brushes and by alternating a number of interesting rhythms, the drummer displayed the widest range musically and spatially. Likewise, his grunts during his solos appeared to be the only true display of intensity during the concert.

The problem with the concert was not necessarily the music, but rather it was the atmosphere of the evening. Tawes Theatre was simply too sterile an environment to promote an audience/performer relationship that jazz has and does thrive on in more casual scenes. At intermission we felt as though the Billy Taylor Trio had given us all they were going to give. But being fair to Billy Taylor, we probably would have left any jazz trio at Tawes Theatre simply because the intimacy of the concert was lost.

NOW Rally for Rights
WC Students to Join March in DC

The National Organization for Women (NOW) will be marching on Washington, D.C. for women's rights on — specifically, the right to reproductive freedom. The Supreme Court is hearing three cases this year which have the potential to overturn Roe vs. Wade, the decision which made abortion legal (and safer). The impetus for the March is to show support for the Freedom of Choice Act and the Reproductive Health Equity Act. In the 1989 abortion rights rally, more than 600,000 women and men assembled; there is a possiblity of this number doubling on April 5, the date for this year's March.

The Margaret Horsley Society (MHS) of Washington College is working with the Kent County League of Women's Voters so that the College and the Community can send a delegation to Washington for the March. Two charter buses have been procured so that those women and men who are interested in marching can travel as a group; individuals interested in attending are urged to attend by riding on these buses and marching under the delegation's banner so that unity and pride in numbers will be evident.

The buses have a 90-seat capacity; the fee for passangers is normally $10.00, but the MHS and the Student Affairs Office will be covering most of the fee; tickets will now be $3.00 to interested students. The buses will be leaving from behind Tawes Theatre at 7:00 a.m. to arrive in D.C., park, and ride the subway to the Ellipse in time for the March at 10:00 a.m.

Participants are encouraged to wear white (in honor of suffrage), to dress appropriately for weather, to bring subway fare and food, and to arrive by 6:45 a.m. on April 5. Contact MHS President Deb Boyer for more information.

Save Our Streams

A special workshop on monitoring streams will be conducted by Maryland Save Our Streams on Saturday, March 28. The workshop is aimed at training volunteers to evaluate the water quality of local streams and how to improve it. The workshop will be from 9:30 - 3:30 and involves a slide show and visits to test local streams.

The workshop, co-sponsored by Hands Out, Terra Firma, and Kent Conservation will lead to involvement in the Adopt-A-Stream program where Washington College can regularly monitor the health of a nearby stream. Sign-up sheets will be in the cafeteria next week. For further information contact Andrew McKim at 778-7889.

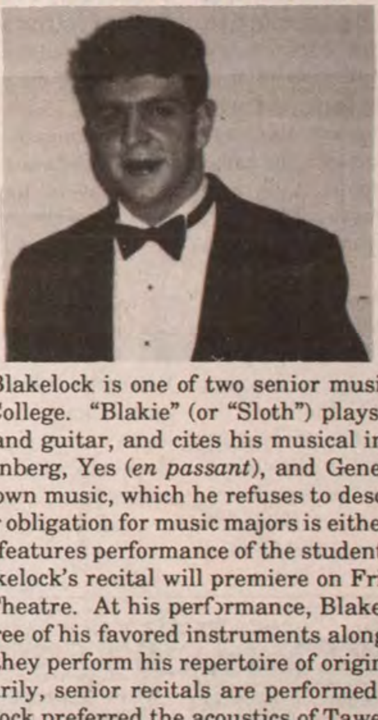
Student Profile: John Blakelock



John W. Blakelock is one of two senior music majors at Washington College. "Blakie" (or "Sloth") plays the euphonium, piano, and guitar, and cites his musical influences as Brahms, Schönberg, Yes (en passant), and Genesis. Blakie composes his own music, which he refuses to describe.

The senior obligation for music majors is either a thesis or recital, which features performance of the student's own compositions. Blakelock's recital will premiere on Friday, March 27 in Tawes Theatre. At his performance, Blakelock will be playing all three of his favored instruments along with other musicians as they perform his repertoire of original compositions. Ordinarily, senior recitals are performed in Norman James; Blakelock preferred the acoustics of Tawes.

Blakelock enjoys the music department here at WC. Although it is rather small, this serves to give him the personal attention and freedom of exploration which he enjoys. The one negative aspect of the musical atmosphere is the lack of a large concert band, which Blakelock participated in in his high school.

Blakie is the assistant musical director for the Drama Department production of Pippin which goes up in April; he will also be playing euphonium in the orchestra. He plays the same instrument in the Washington College Jazz Band.

In addition to musical talents, Blakelock has been on the Dean's List every semester since his arrival at W.C. He writes poetry and enjoys reading the works of Faulkner, Hemingway, Steinbeck, and Gerard Manley Hopkins. On the sports side, Blakie is a San Diego Chargers Fan. He also loves baseball, kicking the ceiling and enjoys playing home run derby. And last, but not least, Blakie loves his Tetris and his Little Debbie™ Snack Cakes.

Another Happy Day in Memory of Samuel Beckett

WC Becomes Center of Beckett Studies

The upcoming presentation of works by Samuel Beckett, to be given by the British actress Billie Whitelaw, is the latest in a series of performances and lectures on Irish novelist and playwright Samuel Beckett that have made Washington College a center for Beckett studies.

Beginning in December 1989, with a performance of Krapp's Last Tape by French actor Pierre Chabert, directed by Samuel Beckett, special events have included lectures by two of the foremost Beckett scholars; "Beckett Directing Beckett," by James Knowlson, Professor of French and Curator of the Beckett Archives at the University of Reading in England, and "Beckett and Women," by Linda Ben-Zvi, Professor of English at Colorado State University and author of Women in Beckett. In addition, the Washington College Drama Department will present a production of Waiting For Godot, Beckett's most famous work, in April of this year. This production marks the 25th anniversary of a 1967 production of this play at the college, and will feature Professor Bennett Lamond as Vladimir, the same role he played in 1967, and Professor Timothy Maloney, who formerly played Pozzo, as Estragon.

The two lectures, as well as the performances by Chabert and Whitelaw, have been arranged by Thomas Cousineau, WC English Professor and author of Waiting for Godot: Form in Movement. Cousineau has authored several articles about Beckett's plays and novels, and he is at work on a study of Beckett's trilogy of novels, Molloy, Malone Dies, and The Unnameable. This book, Beckett's Trilogy: Representation and Performance, is designed to make Beckett's self-declared but little read masterpiece more accessible to the general reader, according to Cousineau, who has studied Beckett in the United States and in Paris, the Irish writer's expatriate home for many years.

Cousineau considers the Billie Whitelaw performance a key event for this college. "We are extremely fortunate to have an actress of Whitelaw's caliber give this performance, as well as conduct acting workshops to better inform students of Beckett's working methods and intentions." This catalogue of events in memory of Beckett, who died in 1989, comes to a close this year.

Actress Billy Whitelaw

Acclaimed Actress Reads from Works of Friend and Playwright

By Amanda Burt
Staff Writer

Billie Whitelaw, renowned British actress, will bring her experience with playwright and novelist Samuel Beckett to WC tonight as she reads from several of his pieces including "Not I," "Eh Joe" (both of which were written for her), "Happy Days," and "Rockabye." While Beckett was alive, Whitelaw had the unusual opportunity of working with him more than any other performer. During their twenty-eight year relationship, he directed her in five of his theater plays, two of his television plays, and two of his radio plays; in fact, she has worked with Beckett on all but three of his plays.

"It was an extraordinary experience to work with someone like Beckett for the length of time that I did," Whitelaw says. "He had integrity." Though Beckett would sometimes be unable to attend the final performance of his play, Whitelaw notes that she never worked without him since he was present at rehearsals. She recalls one experience where she rehearsed with Beckett over the phone when he could not physically be present.

Because Beckett was a perfectionist and became increasingly concerned with the visual image, Whitelaw admits that it was not easy to perform his plays. She says that they are physically demanding and often require the body to remain in unnatural positions for long lengths of time. "Footfalls" requires the spine to spiral around itself so that the body eventually becomes smaller and smaller.

Tonight, Whitelaw will show a film recording of her performance of "Not I," a twelve minute production featuring nothing more than a speaking mouth. "What is on screen is as near as I've come to actually realizing what Beckett was trying to achieve with his artistic imagination," she says. Though Beckett wanted "Not I" to be performed in five minutes at the speed of thought, she notes that the play at this speed would be nothing more than an incoherent mumble.

Whitelaw's acting background aside from Beckett is extensive. As a member of the Royal Shakespeare Theater, she often performed twelve hour plays, a drastic change from Beckett's twelve minute plays. In addition, she was one of the founding members of London's National Theater when Lawrence Olivier was the Artistic Director and leading actor. During her time there, she worked with such distinguished performers such as Maggie Smith, Michael Redgrave, Albert Smith, and Robert Stevens.

While these works will not be staged as dramatic productions, Whitelaw will "perform" readings from the plays after discussing the settings of the plays and her work with Beckett on interpretation and performance. Whitelaw's grief at Beckett's death in 1989 has led her to stop performing his plays; recently, however, she has begun to present these staged readings. "I will probably be happiest doing them for students and talking about how we arrived at them," she said recently, "because that is what Beckett wanted me to do." During the past eight weeks, Whitelaw has visited other colleges on the East Coast, where she has spent time reading from Beckett's works, talking to students and taking the "mystique" out of his work. She spent five weeks at Smith College and shorter amounts of time at Dartmouth and Wellesley. She plans to return to England in mid-April.

While Whitelaw is better known in England, where she has appeared in more than 200 plays, films and television dramas and where she was made a Commander of the British Empire at the last Queen's Birthday Honors, she has been seen in the Albert Finney movies Charlie Bubbles and Gumshoe and in the recent films The Dressmaker and The Krays. Following her performance, Whitelaw will receive the Washington College Award for Excellence for her contributions to the world theatre.

Whitelaw's readings will be performed in Tawes Theater at 8 p.m., and admission is free.

Alternative Art Symposium

New Regions, a traveling symposium focusing on the development of art in rural areas, is coming to Washington College on Saturday. Maryland Art Place (MAP), a center for the arts in Baltimore, is taking this traveling forum to five different rural sites in Maryland, in the hopes of establishing a statewide rural network to share information, resources, and ideas.

The forum's first session runs from 11:00 a.m. - 1:00 p.m. will include a general introductory discussion with visual aids, followed by a close-up look at a local arts project, Artists Among Us: George's Creek Works. There will be a break for lunch, and the later session, beginning at 2:00, will be a hands-on look at school-based alternative arts projects, Drawing in the Natural World. The mediator is Don Cook, a Western Maryland artist who has developed a number of alternative rural arts projects, including the ones presented in this symposium.

New Regions is free and open to the public and runs from 11:00 a.m. - 3:30 p.m. in the CAC Forum, Saturday, March 21. The three individual sessions allow for people with time conflicts to choose their area of interest. The project is co-sponsored by the Visual Artists' Union of Washington College.

Baseball Return Home After Tough Southern Road Trip

By Jason Ronstadt
Staff Writer

When a sizable group of Washington College students headed south to Florida for this years spring break, Coach Ed Athey's Shoremen baseball team followed in thier wake. But perusing the beach in search of sun and fun was hardly the first thing on the minds of the team. For Athey's bunch knew that waiting for them were the three toughest teams they would face all season long. Said coach Athey, "Anderson, Cortland, and Mansfield are all strong Division two and NAIA clubs whose coaches expected our team would be an easy victory." But by the end of the trip the Shoremen not only proved they were worthy competition in Florida, they also succeeded in convincing coach Athey of thier chances for an M.A.C. championship.

Unfortunately the teams success was not immediate. They opened the tournament with a resounding 22-2 defeat at the hands of Anderson College. Said Athey, "Our pitchers where having serious control problems and it was the only game all week that we didn't play sound baseball."

Such a loss might have caused many teams to lose hope. But the Shoremen rallied on the next game day, defeating Cortland 5-2. Junior Joe Boan lead the team with two home runs and three R.B.I., and Sophomore Keith Whiteford pitched a complete game. This was a big confidence builder for the Shoremen as Cortland went 27-11 last year and had a stint in the N.C.A.A. tournament.

The next game proved to be somewhat of a moral victory as the Shoremen's Sophomore Mitch O'Shea pitched a masterful game against Mansfield. Dan Coker, the Freshman from Calvert Hall High, once again proved his worth as a utility man. Says Coach Athey, "Danny is a key this year, his ability to step in and play short stop when Rory (Conway) is pitching makes us stronger in the infield." The final score ended in a 5-2 defeat, but once again the team had held thier ground in the presence of a formidable opponent.

The team closed out the week losing two hard-fought games to Anderson and Cortland. Against Anderson, Freshman Mike D'Andrea pitched well in relief of Rory Conway, and Senior John Morrall rocketed a home run in the third inning that may still be flying somewhere over the Gulf of Mexico. Washington lost 5-4 but won the respect they had lost at the beginning of the week.

Against Cortland, Sophomore Andrew Parks hammered a solo shot, but it wasn't enough as the Shoremen left six runners on base within a span of two innings. That was the difference as Washington fell 6-1 in thier final game of the week. Said Coach Athey about the final game, "We had them (Cortland) where we wanted them and we had plenty of guys get on base. Only thing was when we hit the ball, we hit it right at someone...That's Baseball for-yah."

Women Netters Begin Season

By Gary Brown
Sports Information Director

Washington returns its top six players in quest of a second straight Middle Atlantic Conference title in 1992 and a berth in the NCAA Division III Tournament. Paced by three-time All-American senior Tracy Peel, Washington looks to continue a string of dominance that reached a high point in last year's 9-0 win over Muhlenberg for the first MAC Championship in any women's sport in Washington College history.

Peel competed in her third straight NCAA Singles Championships last season, losing in the semifinal round after finishing second overall in 1989. She will team with sophomore phenom Pam Hendrickson to once again form an imposing doubles tandem that posted a 15-0 record during the regular season and swept their way to the MAC doubles crown with a 6-2, 6-2 win over Elizabethtown's Jodi Weidman and Amy Hite. Hendrickson, voted Washington's Most Valuable Player, advanced to the quarterfinals in the MAC Singles Tournament before losing to eventual conference champion Julie Shapiro of Swarthmore.

Washington also returns seniors Rachael Rice and Miriam Dittmann, and junior Jennifer Sloan, who combined for 25 regular season singles wins. Dittmann and Rice teamed to win 12 doubles matches as well. Sloan paired with freshman Kristy Karns to win 11 times in doubles. Karns was voted the team's Most Improved Player at the end of the campaign. The Shorewomen expect additional depth from newcomers Diana Clausen and Michelle (Lee) Russo in their hope's of continuing last year's success.

The 15-2 campaign in 1991 was Washington's third straight winning season. The Shorewomen finished tied for 11th in the Volvo Collegiate rankings, and narrowly missed gaining an NCAA Tournament berth.

Two weeks ago this past Tuesday, the Shorewomen kicked off the '92 season with an impressive 9-0 victory over Wesley College, away. Top-seeded players Pam Hendrickson, Miriam Dittmann, and Jen Sloan easily defeated their opponents in singles competition, 6-0, 6-1; 6-0, 6-1; and 6-0, 6-0 respectively. In doubles competition, Washington's performance was equally impressive as the Shorewomen dropped their opponents in straight sets. Said Head Coach Tom Finnegan, "We had a pretty solid performance on Tuesday. We were pretty happy and we were glad that all eight women who made the trip got a chance to play."

This past week, the women's team travelled to Hilton Head where they fell just short of a .500 record on the road, returning with a final mark of 2-3, bringing their overall record to 3-3.

On Tuesday, March 17, the women travelled to Widener where they trounced the home team 9-0. Their next home match is against Towson State on March 31st. Come support the Shorewomen as they battle their way towards another successful season! (Apologies to the women's team from the Bleacher Creatures for the sparse coverage early on---we had a writer mix-up. Things will be back on course next week.)

Lifetime Fitness Center To Open this Weekend

By Charlie Linehan
& Chris Vaughn
Co-Sports Editors

As WC students returned from the balmy beaches of points South this past Monday, they were greeted with the announcement that the long-awaited opening of the Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center was about to become a reality. After eight months of construction, the newest addition to a campus whose physical appearance has improved ten-fold over the last four years, is finally complete.

Unfortunately, the building will open in the midst of the storm of controversy over Washington College's tendency in recent years to concentrate on the aesthetic and athletic rather than on the educational aspects of the institution. With a large faction of the student body already upset with an athletic program which seems to overshadow Washington College academics, LFC advocates can hardly hope to avoid criticism in the first few months of the building's existence.

Without doubt, the academic problems at Washington College have reached an unacceptable level and it would hardly be worthwhile to rail on the new fitness center as just another notch in the belts of the athletes and aestheticians—the point has already been made and it's a little late to spend the money on other things. Besides, while the LFC may not be an absolutely necessary addition to the campus, it certainly does not rank up there (maybe 'down there' is a more appropriate phrase) with the CAC as just another expensive pile of bricks. In fact, the new fitness center is an impressive (and useful) facility which adds a Division I air to our small campus and which promises to serve as a link between the Chestertown and Washington College communities.

A few notable aspects of the new building include two squash courts and two racquetball courts with seating for spectators, a lacrosse locker room with an attached mud room and (how's this for state-of-the-art?) a hole in the top of every locker for storing lacrosse sticks (the soccer locker room, with special indentations in the top of every locker for storing soccer balls, will be unveiled at a separate ceremony later this week), a projector room with a movie screen ideal for viewing game films, a wellness room (??We're still looking for the definition on that one), a dance/aerobics studio with a 'Gerstein' floor (i.e. wood over a cushion surface to prevent shin splints, etc.), and finally, an enormous Holiday Spa-like weight room with state-of-the-art universal and free weights, a stereo system, and chin-up bars that look slanted but aren't.

And now for the main attraction, a gigantic multi-purpose athletic room with a Versaturf floor. A track runs around the outside of the room and the center can function as multiple basketball courts, multiple tennis courts, or any number of playing fields. Finally, the basketball hoops can be raised or lowered from a key panel which also controls the batting cage which can be lowered from the ceiling at the far end of the room.

The academic point has been made a million times and in the aftermath of the LFC opening it will probably be made a million more. However, the emphasis should probably be on the fact that athletic funding seems to be being used appropriately, in the creation of a facility which will certainly prove an asset to the College, while academic funding could be put to better use than the creation of colossal mailrooms and computer rooms which we can't even use.

LAX Wins First Three

The men's lacrosse team remained busy over Spring Break with games against West Chester, Lynchburg and Western Maryland. Many did not know what to expect of the team this year but, three games into the regular season, the Shoremen are demonstrating that they can come out of the underdog situation and put a couple victories under their belt. Wednesday, March 4th, the Shoremen traveled to West Chester, a team they lost to by one point last year, and came out strong, pulling off a 22-6 victory. Jason Paige netted 7 goals, while Chris Cote had 5 goals and five assists. The Shoremen scored sixteen straight goals from 12:25 left in the first quarter to 14:15 left in the fourth quarter to go from one goal down to fifteen goals ahead. West Chester remained scoreless for 43:10 due to great defensive work and Andy Manos' five saves in the goal.

Saturday, March 7th, Lynchburg College traveled to Kibler Field and departed with their heads hung low, having lost14-12. Washington took control of 16 of the 22 faceoffs giving them an offensive advantage with stellar performances by Jason Paige, Freshman Greg Lawler, and Greg Mouracade. Tony Forti was key, saving 11 of 32 attempted shots on goal.

The Shoremen were scheduled to take on Johns Hopkins, Wednesday, March 14th but, due to the weather, the game was postponed. The Shoremen continued their winning streak with a 19-5 victory over the Green Terrors of Western Maryland. Many offensive players contributed to this win, including Jason Paige with five goals, Greg Lawler and Chris Sanchez with three each, and Harris Murphy and Kevin Knox who each netted two. Chris Cote, Bill Brimhall, Dave Lipinski, and Jamie Carver contributed one goal a piece. Washington netted 19 of 28 shots while the Green Terrors only netted 5 of their 12 attempted shots.

The men's lacrosse team challenged Navy this past Wednesday at Kibler Field and continue their schedule this Saturday with a home game against Colorado College at 1:00 PM. The Shoremen are off to a great beginning. Let's hope they can keep up the heart-stopping pace on the road to a victorious season!

Netters Net 6 and 2 Record At Hilton Head

By Doug Hoffberger
Staff Writer

Over Spring Break, the WAC men's Varsity Tennis Team travelled to Hilton Head, South Carolina improving their record to 6-2. The WAC netters had a busy schedule, having three practices and six matches seven out of the eight days they were in Hilton Head.

The netters arrived on March 7, unpacked and settled in. On March 8 they had their first match versus R.P.I. In the first of six matches, the Shoremen picked up where they left off against Wesley, winning all nine of their match-ups. Frank Hartwig, Alberto Diaz, Trevor "Walt Williams" Hurd, Emilio Bogato, Carlos Nuno,and Andy Bohutinsky, all were sucessful in their singles efforts. Later that same day, the Shoremen played their second match versus Washington, without an injury plagued Frank Hartwig to lead the pack in singles. The results of this match were the same as their first, making the Shoremen's first three matches of the season clean sweeps, 9-0. Freshman and Shoreman newcomer Jon Alexander also showed promise in his three set singles exhibition win. In doubles, Diaz and Hurd, Frank Hartwig and Emilio Bogato, and Andy Bohutinsky and Carlos Nuno, all had successful outings, boosting the teams doubles record to 9-0. Playing in their second match as a team, co-captain Jeff Rexford and Deepak Raja were victorious in their exhibition doubles match.

The first test of the season was to come three days after arriving at the Hilton Head resort. On March 10, the netters squared off against Jan Bortner's D1 Penn State Panthers, and without Hartwig in the line-up, the matches were sure to be nailbiters. Trevor "The Wizard" Hurd turned up the only win against Penn State, but Carlos Nuno took his opponent to three sets in singles, and took his opponents to three sets with teammate Andy Bohutinsky in doubles. The rest of the Penn state matches were hard fought, but the Shoremen failed to come up with the big points. Tim "Bird" Reardon and Deepak Raja also played an exhibition doubles match to gain some experience. Tim Gray stated that had Hartwig not been injured the outcome would have been closer if not a victory for the netters. The latter half of March 10 proved again that the Shoremen are contending for a national ranking, as they toppled Clark University by a score of 6-0, with the remaining three matches cancelled because of rain. March 11, was the only day of rest for the netters, and it fell right before their most important match of the season versus Emory University. On March 12, 1992, Frank Hartwig re-entered the line-up at the number one position beating the seventh seed in the nation, Todd Kennedy. Alberto Diaz rolled over the nation's twenty-first seed 7-5, 6-1. Trevor "The Terps are the Best" Hurd also had no struggle with the Twenty-sixth seed, Colin White, beating him 6-3, 6-2. After the first three match scores were in the books it was Washington College three, Emory goose-egg, but this would prove not to be the day for the Shoremen. After being up 5-1 in the first set, Emilio Bogato was defeated 7-6, 7-5. Carlos Nuno had three match points but couldn't hold on, losing 6-2, 2-6, 7-6. Andy Bohutinsky had a long three set match with Emory's Brett Cohen, coming up short in the end 7-6, 2-6, 6-3. Hartwig and Bogato had the only win in doubles for the Shoremen, But Diaz and Hurd tied their opponents up in a long three setter.

With the Emory match behind the Shoremen they went into their last day of matches on March 14, versus Averett College. The match took place at Averett, and the netters walked away victorious, 7-2.

"I feel the team got better as the week progressed, and the team as a whole was very satisfied with the results," stated Diaz. Trevor " Vince Broadnax is good " Hurd as well as Frank Hartwig did not lose a singles match during this Spring Break. The Shoremen, now 6-2, will defend their home court against Loyola on Wednesday, March 19, and will travel to Goucher College on Saturday, March 21 to better their record and their chances of becoming nationally ranked.

Women's Lacrosse Begins '92 Season

By Renee Guckert
Staff Writer

Washington's women's lacrosse team travelled to Virginia the weekend of March 7-8 to face-off against some of the country's top squads including Ithaca, Kenyon, Bridgewater, and Ohio Wesleyan. While official statistics were not kept, it was evident to Coach Diane Guinan that WC's team held their own in this difficult preseason tournament. "We came together at a higher level than might have been expected at this time in our training," revealed Guinan. "We have a lot of new blood after losing eight starters, and I think that the group cohesiveness is really paying off." When asked about predictions for the upcoming season, Guinan acknowledged a relatively tough schedule for the Shorewomen. "The team is working hard, and I'm excited because the players are really supporting each other which I believe is a key ingredient for a successful season."

Behind the scenes of Washington's women's squad is Coach Guinan's right-hand woman, assistant lacrosse (and field hockey) coach, Lacy Frazer. Lacy, an Annapolis resident and currently a Washington D.C. club player, enters the WC lacrosse scene with an immense repertoire of athletic experience and accomplishment. Once a two time All-American lacrosse goalie at Connecticut College, Lacy ultimately graduated from University of Maryland in 1989 as an All-American attack player. She then went on to Anne Arundel Community College as head coach of the women's lacrosse team in 1991 and led the relatively inexperienced squad to an undefeated season—the first undefeated team in the school's history. Lacy's spunk, her winning nature, and her experience as both a coach and a team player are sure to make her an invaluable asset to Washington College athletics.

The women faced Widener away for their first true match of the season on Wednesday which will be in next week's issue. And don't miss tomorrow's first home game when the Shorewomen take on Franklin and Marshall at 1:00 p.m. Come out and cheer the team to victory!

Davenport to Join World Championship Team

Washington College Rowing Coach Mike Davenport has been selected as a boatman for the World Championship Team which will compete in Montreal, August 1-25, 1992. He will join managers Beth Laskey, Elise Lindborg and Bill Zack of the United States Rowing Association on the U.S. staff. As a boatman, Davenport will be responsible for the care, rigging, and maintenance of U.S. boats while at the games.

It is the fourth time that Davenport has been involved with a World Championship team. He was an assistant coach with the U. S. National Team in 1989, and he served as a manager for Team USA in the 1990 World Championships in Tasmania, Australia. Last summer, the second-year Shoremen skipper was a manager for the U.S. Team in the Pan American Games in Havana, Cuba.

World Rowing Championships are held each year, but because this is an Olympic year, the 1992 World Championships will consist of junior (18 and under) and lightweight crews. The Olympic Games do not sponsor events in those categories.

NEWT'S CHESTERTOWN BAR
Trust Me
(410) 778-9819

Welcome Back to the WAC ladies and gentlemen!! Do you know what time it is? It's PARTY TIME!! IN YER FACE!! You got it, Spiderman and the Vaughnster have returned to balmy Chestertown only to discover a new recipient of THE POST-PARTY FAUX PAS AWARD. This time our own lovely Rachael Rice followed in the footsteps of the previous winners and emptied the contents of an entire keg into her bathtub in order to remove the keg. That's right, an entire keg down the drain! What's up with that??

But that's not important now! The real news is this week's NEWT's POW. . . Sophomore Tennis Studette, Pam Hendrickson from Kutztown, PA. She has gone undefeated in the early part of this tennis season and looks to be a real powerhouse once again. While down in Hilton Head over Spring Break, she posted an amazing 9-0 singles/doubles record. Overall, she currently has an 11-0 mark for the season. Nice job Pam!!

Lester Earns All-MAC Honors

Washington College senior guard Allen Lester (Brookhaven, PA/Christian Academy) has been named to the All-Middle Atlantic Conference Southeast League squad.

Lester was one of five players to be named to the elite unit. He joins Widener's Brian Duffy and Chris Carideo, Jay Gangemi of Johns Hopkins and Scott Gibbons of Swarthmore on the all-star team. Hopkins coach Bill Nelson was acclaimed the league's Coach of the Year.

Lester led the 14-11 Shoremen in scoring with 15.4 points per game, and dished out a team-high 4.4 assists per contest. The 5'10" point guard was Washington's most consistent three-point threat, and his 74% accuracy from the charity stripe was tops among Shoremen starters. He scored the winning bucket with just eight seconds remaining to lift Washington over Roanoke in the championship game of Washington's Wild Goose Classic, and he led the squad in scoring 11 times. Lester scored in double figures in 24 of his 25 games, including a career-high 31-point effort against Roanoke.

Of course, this is quite an honor but, it doesn't quite compare to the accolade he achieved and acclaim he recieved as The Elm's first Newt's Player of the Week! Now that was recognition!

Last year's first team All-MAC center Darren Vican (Milford, DE/Milford) received honorable mention acclaim this season after placing third in the conference in rebounding and averaging 14.4 points per game.

Attackman Jason Paige adroitly pivots around a Lynchburg defender. Jason, a transfer from Syracuse University, plays an integral part in WC's offensive system this year. He leads the charts with 16 goals and 3 assists for a combined effort of 19 points. Look for him to continue leading the already powerful attack Coach Corcoran has managed to build for this year's effort.

KKK To Rally in Galena

By Chris Mihavetz
Staff Writer

Over the past two weeks, some Washington College students have been surprised to find Ku Klux Klan literature left on the windshields of their cars. The cards found on the the windshields bear the name of the national organization, "Invisible Empire, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan", and the name of a local chapter in Cecil County. The cards also include the addresses of the Klan's state office in North East, Maryland and the International office in North Carolina.

According to Maureen McIntire, Dean of Student Affairs, several groups of students informed her that they had found the cards on their windshields after the past two Saturday nights. Dean McIntire also said that some students reported finding a Klan newspaper publication in addition to the cards. Official college policy states that outside organizations may not distribute literature or even post notices without permission from either the President's office, the Dean's office, Student Affairs, or Public Affairs. Dean McIntire said that "most groups are really good about that, even with small things, but they [the Ku Klux Klan] definitely did not check because I cannot imagine anyone here giving them permission."

Recently, the Ku Klux Klan has received a lot of local attention over their proposed march in Elkton. Originally scheduled for April 4, the anniversary of the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., the KKK changed the date of the Elkton march to April 11 following serious protest. The Elkton Town Council still turned the proposal down on the grounds that such a march might endanger public safety.

According to the March 25 issue of The Kent County News, the KKK will be handing out literature in Galena on Saturday, April 4, the original date of the proposed march in Elkton.

" 'We're going to be in the main intersection in Galena,' a man identifying himself as KKK leader Chester J. Doles said in a phone call to the newspaper Monday. He said twenty members may participate." The Rev. C. Edwin Hunter, president of the Kent County chapter of the NAACP, told Kent County News that "Their (KKK) pre-existing scare tactics against individuals will not be tolerated. Individuals should have the right to pursue happiness and joy in their own areas. And the branch will oppose anything that will prevent people from pursuing those rights as guaranteed by the Constitution." Kent County News also reported that County Sheriff William T. Bright said his department would be ready in the event of a gathering of Klan members, but that the gathering was legal. "I don't know of any state law prohibiting it , unless they interfere with traffic."

The "Invisible Empire" was unavailable for further comment on either the campus literature distribution or the gathering in Galena.

WC Erects Front Gate

By Sabrina Kenny
"Bricks &Mortar" Reporter

Two massive forty-foot brick walls are currently being erected near the intersection of Washington Avenue and Greenwood Avenue to serve as a formal entryway to the campus. This "front gate" will re-centralize the entrance of the college to lead to the Casey Academic Center, which houses the Admissions Office. Serving as an aesthetic point of recognition, the gate will designate a symbolic main entrance to Washington College.

The new gate is the next major step in the "Master Plan" for Washington College, which was begun under the Cater administration. Conceived from the inception of the Master Plan, the gate will stand as a key marker, outlining the north entrance near the Cullen dorms. This entrance was donated by Betty Casey, who has been very supportive of Washington College's Master Plan. The gate will be comprised of the two forty-foot brick walls, a stone panel with "bronze-looking" letters, and a broken pediment. At night, the stone panel will be illuminated, and, later, landscaping will be added to create an eye-pleasing entrance. Currently, excavation for the walls' foundations has been completed, and, weather permitting, layers of brick will soon be able to be seen. This project was designed by Warren Peterson, the same architect who created the Casey Academic Center.

Art on the Cater Walk

By John Goebel
Photography Editor

The Czechoslovakian road-signs which were posted on the Cater Walk over the weekend were made by Deb Kulich, a senior art student. They were a part of her senior thesis show that is opening on April 24 at Tawes Theater. Two other seniors, Andrea Buchart and John Goebel, and the rest of the department are going to show paintings, sculpture, pottery, drawings and photos that were done this year.

The show started early for Deb because she is working on themes involving installations (installations are non-traditional art spaces that use the space as part of the art work). The theory that she explores are ideas of partial information and disjuncted signifiers. The foreign country road-signs on campus not only lost their language-based sense here, but also their visual sense. If the viewer wants to make sense of the signified condition and make more than a passive experience of Deb's piece, then they come to realizations about the singularities of understanding (how shared is our understanding, even at the most base levels such as with road-signs), and the nature of objects and signifiers in visual and verbal language.

One of the more interesting aspects of the installation was their vandalism; some people tore a few of them down. It seems as though other student's work and world signs seem to frustrate people. Others were confused or amused by her work. Deb's signs were successful in illustrating the manner with which we deal with the world of information.

Editorial

Milkshakes & Cigarettes

This week's flag (the newspaper's nameplate on the front page) was printed by Mike Kaylor, Director of the Literary House Press, to resemble the great penny-press papers of the nineteenth century. Such publications as James Gordon Bennett's New York Herald, William Hearst's New York Journal, and Joseph Pulitzer's New York World. To exist in a saturated market (by 1910, some twenty-five of these dailies existed in NYC alone) these editors needed to separate their papers from all the rest. Great time, energy, and invention were invested to ensure these papers possessed a distinct personality, which inadvertently reflected that of their editors. A decisive element in this distinction soon became the editorial page. News was news, and was often only distinguished from its competitors by its by-line, not its content. But editorials, these newspapermen discerned, could establish their paper's 'unique' personality, while in turn, expressing their own through scathing opinion and criticism.

No holds were barred in these early columns. Sensationalism, muck-raking, and personal attacks proved popular with readers. Impressed that their words could meld public opinion, these editors directed their editorial efforts in stronger, more affecting arenas than mere character. Hearst's editorials almost single-handedly initiated the Spanish-American War. Pulitzer convinced the public to elect Grover Cleveland in 1884, and then called for his resignation two years later. Bennett's editorials were so arrogant and demeaning towards other editors, that these men would wait outside the Herald office for him, wanting to brawl.

I write my own ELM editorials on Wednesday nights, usually around four a.m., after the majority of the paper has been completed. Many of you have encouraged me to utilize this space more appropriate to pertinent issues on campus. Use the form as it was intended; use your editorial power correctly since many people read your column. I'd like to think I've warmed up to this challenge. In the past few weeks, I've done my best to fan the coals of war here at WC. Gotten so confident that if Hurtt Derringer of the Kent County News rolled into Reid Hall fists clenched and ready, I just might step to him.

But then again I have a problem with the cut-throat standards set by my great penny-press predecessors. In many ways the ELM mirrors elements of my own personality. In fact it reflects the collected character of all its editors. I watch as our creation takes shape every week. It demands our attention, all our time, energy, creativity. And then in the wee hours of Wednesday morning I attempt to recreate this process in the only section of the paper that is truly my own. Anger, intellect, and humor are my chief tools of expression. My friends and even the occasional Oliver Stone movie reference makes an appearance in my column. That I can't help, and have no intent to change. That's my personality.

A friend recently asked me if the sole reason for my wanting this job was for the power. You're on a power trip aren't you Pat? she asked me. I only wish. I liken my relationship to this paper as a marriage, one in which I have limited control. My wife demands my strictest attention. She does not allow me to drink at Newt's on Wednesday nights, nor does she feel my sleep takes precedence over her well-being. In six weeks she will leave me for another editor and there's not a thing I can do about it. Power, you say? If this is power, than I'm staying single.

I take a secret pleasure in annoying her through my editorials. Loosely disguised under 'opinion and commentary', I get to say whatever I want for at least a few paragraphs. I can disregard facts, political correctness, even accuracy to achieve any desired effect. If done correctly, I can influence public opinion. Hearst once said of his editorial policy, "The public will believe what I tell them to believe."

But I'm not Hearst. After returning from the printer on Thursday nights, I imagine how much difference my editorials will have at WC. I dream of controlling public opinion, of putting words in people's mouths. My words. Next day I wake up and fully expect the world to be different. I walk around campus absorbed in my power waiting to hear my words coming out of all your mouths.

I thought about writing this week's editorial on the KKK march in Galena. But those bastards do not deserve any more press than they already steal. Then I considered focusing on women's rights or even the Greek system. I can just imagine the informative/objective commentary I'd come up with regarding those topics. Try as I did, nothing that revolutionary came to mind this week. Believe me, I was worried. Nothing earth-shattering this week. But I think that's OK.

Instead of burning some bridges this past week, I fixed one. Had a sit-down, a pow-wow, a mending of ways with an old friend that was long over-due. This treaty took place in the Coffeehouse over milkshakes and cigarettes. The earth did not move, my words did not come out of this person's mouth, but yet, the ever-important, "Pat, sometimes you're so full of shit."

Friends, public opinion is alive and well at Washington College. Not from a tyrannic editor but from the individuals who read this column. I'll be back in true form next week, but for now I'm enjoying this warm feeling. What do they call it? Compassion, yeah, that's it. My personality (and in turn my editorials) have two sides. One being that Casey building editorial, the other this week's column. I don't think I have to mention which one's full of shit.

Do yourself a favor, call an old friend. Sit down over milkshakes and cigarettes and conversation. I won't put any words in your mouth, but here are some I've found to be very effective: "I'm sorry."

Letter to the Editor

It Doesn't Look Greek To Me!

Dear Editor,

It was once said by a great man, "Ignorance breeds rumors without substance," it is with this quote in mind that I feel I must address several rumors which are truly lacking of truth.

Several weeks ago, the ELM published a letter to the editor that was supposed to be written about truth, but its point was more of satire and sarcasm. This letter discussed how a person who is a member of the organization formerly called Phi Sigma Kappa, was caught using a fake I.D. at Newt's. Using a fake I.D. is commonplace in today's society, but the letter dealt very little with the actual problem of telling the truth. For instance, this person said that he wanted to go out drinking with his fraternity brothers. This in itself is an untruth. He does not belong to a fraternity, but instead belongs to a social drinking club that consists of members from this college.

A fraternity is a social organization, and arguably, there are eight social organizations on this campus. But only Six of these organizations are Greek letter fraternities and sororities. Six out of Eight, equals 75 %, this is true. Why do you think it is 75% of these organizations have a national affiliation ? I mean anyone could start a social organization: $50 a year dues, could pay for a keg for every person, and then still have money, to buy t-shirts for every member, or other symbols of membership... The reason why the majority of social organizations on this campus have maintained a national affiliation, is because their organizations mean more to them than a drinking club !

Fraternities and sororities do have a good time. We have a very good time. Sure there are lots of rules, but more importantly there are also lots of goals. A person that attends college should not only do so to help themselves and their families, but also to add something back to the community. A good fraternity or sorority, exemplifies this. Greek letter organizations usually have national philanthropies to which every chapter must contribute. As well community service plays a large part of many Greek organizations.

All six of the Greek organizations on campus have rules to maintain standards. Standards, because the organizations that their members are joining are not only affiliated with this campus, but also with a much larger national organizations. The benefits of a national organization are quite numerous. Not only do you have a common bond with people from your chapters at Washington College, but you have a common bond with people in organizations around the United States, and you have similar bonds with people that belong to other organizations. To see these bastardized forms of so-

Equal Rights for Women in the Military?

By Amanda Burt
Staff Writer

The Washington College chapter of Phi Sigma Tau, the Philosophy Honors Society, and the WC Philosophy Club will present "A Symposium on Women in the Military: Equal Rights?" beginning at 1 p.m on Saturday, March 28 in the Sophie Kerr Room as part of the program celebrating the centennial anniversary of the matriculation of women at Washington College. The third annual symposium features faculty and student participants from Washington College and the United States Military Academy at West Point.

"What is unique about this symposium," says Dr. David Newell, Professor and Chair of WC's department of Philosophy and Religion, "is that students are primary. Students respond to students." He notes that a typical symposium might involve a guest speaker who becomes engaged in discussion primarily with members of the faculty rather than students.

Student participation will indeed highlight tomorrow's symposium, as students from Newell's "The Ethics of War and Peace" seminar will read from papers that were written for his course. Although Newell's seminar began after the decision was made to make "Women in the Military" the subject of the symposium, his course material is oriented toward tomorrow's topic. When his students submitted a mix of papers that addressed the various related issues of women in combat, Newell found that many of the papers were written from a personal perspective. The three students who agreed to revise their papers for the symposium will read in a portion of the symposium called "Three Voices," a title which reflects the personal nature of the individual topics.

Before Newell's students speak, Lieutenant Colonel Paul Christopher, Ph.D. and Associate Professor of Philosophy at West Point, will give his opening talk titled "Women in Combat: What's at Stake?" at 1:00 p.m. Then at 1:30, Eric Forste will moderate the "Three Voices" portion of the symposium. Katrina Beernink will first address the issue of whether or not women should be drafted, then Kristina Clary will confront the suitability of women for combat with her case study showing that women can survive intensive abuse in a POW situation. Finally, Cathy Lease will discuss the different conflicts between pacifism and feminism.

After a brief break at 2:15, the debate, titled "Women Should be Allowed in Combat," will begin with Jennifer Gilday moderating. Pamela Feeney and Kristin Wallenberg will argue for women's rights to engage in combat, while Timothy Stoltzfus and Keith Erickson will oppose them.

Throughout the entire symposium, the cadets, who will remain in the audience, will interact with the speakers. Dr. Kevin Brien, Associate Professor in the Department of Philosophy and Religion at WC, looks forward to active participation from the cadets. "They are always very focused," he notes, adding that "this year there will also be more female cadets here."

The topic of the first symposium two years ago addressed "Just War Theory," while last year's subject centered on environmental issues. Brien comments that it was an unusual experience to listen to an officer from West Point criticize certain military procedures which are detrimental to the environment. Both Brien and Newell hope to make a tradition of the symposiums at WC, as West Point expresses a strong interest in continued participation.

Washington College Students Invade Jamaica

By Adria Nesberg
Staff Writer

Student Activities Director Teri Turmel and fifteen Washington College students spent their Spring Break relaxing on the beaches of Jamaica. The trip was arranged by the WC Office of Student Activities and coordinated by Turmel. The group spent their seven days in the tropical paradise on a variety of activities, including sunbathing, snorkeling, and attending reggae concerts. One student even showed a native child how to build a sand castle. The S.T.S. sponsored a number of trips, including a sunset cruise. Washington College did not have the only contingent of students in Jamaica. Other institutions which sponsored trips to Jamaica for Spring Break were Boston College, Georgetown University, the United States Naval Academy, the University of Richmond, and the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

The ELM spoke with a number of the vacationers and all were enthusiastic about their Spring Break trip. For junior Carolyn Athey, "the trip was beneficial, a break from the pace in Maryland . . . relaxing and educational. I came back appreciating the U.S. a little more." Athey particularly enjoyed the trip to Negril, where Teri Turmel and a number of the students dove from a 45 foot cliff. She also recalled the numerous craft markets, the smelly pool, and says it was "neat to see a different culture."

Sophomore Margaret Walker said, "I enjoyed myself and learned about another culture." "It was fun to go with people I didn't know from the school." For culture, Debbie Spence and a friend rented a moped and traveled the countryside, but as she said, "it's hard to fit everything in a week."

Junior Carrie Dougherty stated that "it was a relaxing time. I enjoyed the food at a pork-pit and the reggae bands playing American music in a reggae format." She also mentioned that "the people were interesting." Junior Jane Kennedy enjoyed the trip because Jamaica was a "great vacation spot."

Melana and Sarah wanted to remind those who went to Negril of the "magic bus ride back." It's their fondest memory. Finally, Sophomore Bill Bloom talked about the sight-seeing excursions and the two-and-a-half hour bus ride during which the students enjoyed the sights of the Jamaican countryside. He said the Jamaicans he met "were friendly people willing to help you out." Turmel summed it up by saying, "It was a very worthwhile trip, I'm glad I did it. It was a great experience."

SGA Report

The Senate and Executive Board of Washington College met in the Casey Academic Center Forum on Tuesday, March 24 for their first meeting since the return from Spring Break. The next meeting will be held on Tuesday, March 31 at 9 p.m. in the CAC Forum. Anyone is welcome to attend.

Academic Council Proposes Minimum GPA for Graduation

The Student Academic Council is considering a proposal which would require seniors to achieve a minimum GPA of 2.0 in order to graduate. Currently, approximately 5% of the students who graduate from Washington College each year have a GPA which is under 2.0.

SGA Dress Code Proposed

Senator Doug Peterson submitted a proposed amendment to the SGA Constitution which would mandate a dress code for the SGA. Male members of the SGA would be required to wear a shirt and tie or turtleneck with a sports coat. Female members of the SGA would be required to wear a blouse with a skirt or appropriate dress slacks. SGA members who violated the dress code or "whose dress does not convey the image desired for itself by the SGA" would be marked absent for that meeting. (SGA procedures call for impeachment after three unexcused absences.) The SGA President would have the final say on the appropriateness of dress. This proposed amendment will be discussed at the next meeting of the Senate on Tuesday, March 31 at 9 p.m. in the Casey Forum.

Taylor to Discuss Evaluation Forms

Whitney Myrus, chair of the Senate committee examining the new evaluation forms, reported that his committee will meet with Dean Taylor to discuss the forms.

Funding

$221 was allocated to provide for the housing of two comedians and a band with the stipulation that future contracts will be clarified to state that the SGA will not be responsible for housing.
The Spanish Honor Society received $200.
A $200 deposit for a hot-air balloon was approved. More details on the balloon rides next week.
$450 was approved to pay for the comedian for the April 1st Comedy Club.

Campus Lighting

Senator John Phoebus discussed the campus lighting issue. Some lights in the Reid parking lot will be replaced and set at different angles to light up the back of the lot. President Trout and Clint Baer will be making a walking tour of the campus one evening to determine which areas are poorly lit and need attention. Students with specific concerns may wish to join the tour.

"You Are Not Greek"

cial organizations on campus is not only sad, but it hurts the Greek system, and also the college. I am offering the truth to these organizations, both to new members and old, as well as innocent observers. YOU ARE NOT GREEK. It is easy to try and reap the benefits of other peoples hard work. With WC's improving of the honor code, it has been getting less and less easy. Isn't it kind of funny to watch many people working so hard to become a part of nothing ? I do have some sympathy for the members of the organization formerly called Lambda Pi Delta, because I feel as if their situation was forced upon them somewhat.

Specifically it is saddening to see an organization whose goals are things such as stealing from dormitories, or drinking as much as you can in a locked room to make a collection of defecations, urine and yak, so you can pour it on a college building. I bet the job market is waiting for your resumes. In sanitation.

On a specific note, at the Debate Society topic of "Should This House Abolish The Greek System" it was improperly stated that my fraternal organization KAPPA ALPHA ORDER was a racist one. THIS IS A FALSE ACCUSATION. I am not a racist, nor do I respect people that are, but find it interesting that people are willing to listen to claims instead of researching the truth. Rumors without substance.

It is true that KA is a Southern fraternity. Half of America is the South, and just because you are Southern, does not make you a racist. Our fraternity is based upon the ideas of a Southern Gentleman in conjunction with the ideas of chivalry. The Southern Gentleman that was our spiritual founder was Robert E. Lee, and he was quite a man of substance. To classify KA as racist for following his teachings is ludicrous. Lee represented the South during the Civil War, but he himself was not a slave owner. After the Civil War was over, Lee was voted unanimously by the board of trustees of Washington College (Lexington, Virginia, now called Washington and Lee) to be their president. On the sheer word of Lee's addition to W & L, enrollment tripled. His two rules at Washington College were that every person has to strive to achieve "Excellence", and that "every man should act as a gentleman". Lee even developed a definition of a gentleman, which you may see prominently displayed on shirts belonging to members of my fraternity. That is the truth. If you have any questions relating to the contrary any member of our organization would be happy to answer them.

I can respect a person's choice to remain independent, the Greek system is not for everyone. However, there are six Greek social organizations on campus which are striving for more than just cheap beer, drugs, and defecating on everyone including themselves. That is the truth.

Why write this to the ELM? I think people should really think of the organization they are supporting when they buy t-shirts, and or pay to get into a party. If you disagree with the organization, then don't support it.

Respectfully yours,
-Brian Gimelson,

ELM Explores WC Budget

Hessey explained the items in Washington College's budget to the ELM when we spoke with him on Wednesday.

On the revenue side, Washington College receives most of its money for operating costs from student tuition and fees. Government appropriations refers to all grants from the state of Maryland. Government grants refers to federal grants, such as Pell, SEOG, and Work Study. Other auxiliary revenues refers to income derived from the Bookstore, Snack Bar, Summer Conferences, and nominal athletic gate receipts. Miscellaneous income is short-term investment of operating cash.

On the expenditure side, instruction refers to faculty salaries and departmental costs. Academic support consists of the Dean's Office, Miller Library, Audio-Visual Department, International House, Science Dorm, Math Workshops, and pre-med and pre-law advising programs. Student services consists of Student Affairs, Health Service, Career Development, Admissions, Financial Aid, and the Registrar's Office. General administration refers to the President's Office, Business Office, certain costs associated with the Hynson-Ringgold House, and discretionary funds of the President. General institutional expenditures consist of the expenses of the Board of Visitors and Governors, Central Services, Public Relations, campus phone costs, institutional printing, and insurance for the college. Plant refers to the expenses of the Maintenance Department, excluding Hodson Hall and the dormitories. Student aid refers to expenses for financial aid. (In 1991, the college portion of this figure was $2.4 million.) Mandatory transfers consist of principal interest on debt. Room, board and auxiliary expenses detail the costs of the auxiliary operations (see above) and residence hall operations. Non-mandatory transfers includes capital expenditures which were unfunded by gifts.

Hessey reported that the current budget pinch at Washington College is the result of several factors. The major cause of WC's budgetary woes was the loss of over $380,000 in state funding. Other causes were the recession which may result in the college not meeting its gift targets for next year, a decline in the interest rate which resulted in the loss of endowment income, and the fact that the college did not meet its enrollment goals for this academic year. The college instituted a 10% across-the-board budget reduction at the beginning of this academic year to counter these declines. However, continued budgetary problems required the administration to request an increase in tuition and fees for the 1992-1993 academic year. As the budget shows, tuition,fees, room and board are the primary sources of revenue for the college. With a decline in government appropriations, endowment income, and an anticipated decline in private gifts, total student costs had to be increased to make up the difference.

Hessey also explained that the figure for current fund balance is slightly misleading because over $800,000 of the $1.3 million was given for restricted purposes. For example, a gift restricted for a scholarship which was presented to the college in April could not be spent that academic year because financial aid for that year would already be allocated. The gift would then be held in the restricted fund balance and would likely be spent the next year.

Between 50 and 60% of the students at Washington College receive some sort of need-based financial aid, grants, loans, or work-study. Ellen Taylor Levin, the Director of the Financial Aid Department, reported that student financial aid awards for the 1991-1992 academic year consisted of 73% grants, 24% loans, and 3% work-study. Of the money awarded for financial aid, 62% came from Washington College, 29% from federal appropriations, 8% from state funds, and 1% from other sources, including private gifts.

In Search of Chestertown's Perfect Milkshake

Adam Brown, on a quest for the perfect milkshake, tried every shake in the area, including joints across the Chester River but not counting phony fast food shakes such as Burger King. Out of the shakes he tried, eight deserved rating, and this man has tasted enough milkshakes that you can take his word on the best and the worst. If the word connoisseur can apply to milkshakes, Brown gets that title, and here's his picks.

8. Barker's My accomplice and I asked for samples after seeing the big notice on the door: "We now have Milkshakes." The man behind the counter denied it. We were halfway out the door when he told us to stop, said he would get us shakes. We waited. He ordered an assistant to make them, she vanished behind a door somewhere. It's a bad thing when they don't want you to see what they're doing. I had the unfortunate feeling they hadn't ever made milkshakes before. We waited a long time and my accomplice started pulling a nervy. He said we should leave, he didn't like the looks of it. After about two years, the shakes were ready. Don't ever get a shake at Barker's. No flavor, except an aftertaste of spicy onion that grows stronger the nearer you get to the bottom. Painful to finish.

7. Downey's Slimy and the women don't know what kind of ice cream they use. Tastes like the fake stuff. No texture.

6. Bowling Alley Lacks thickness and texture, but the flavor's alright. Nice atmosphere and they've got lots of other good food: burgers,. onion rings, fried mushrooms. They've got bowling, too.

5. Snack Bar/Coffee House Oftentimes too light on the syrup and winds up tasting bland. I've had shakes there that tasted like straight up milk. Depends on who's mixing them.

4. The Suds 'n' Soda Shake Strong on the chocolate, good flavor and consistency. Lacks the zing of greatness, though.

3. Ellen's Coffee Shop A very good shake. Chocolate and creamy and leaves you feeling like you just had a meal. May be better than a three, but the waitresses are rude and you have to sit down.

2. Handy Way Quick Shop It's on 514, by the Detention Center. They never have chocolate. Had it once for three days, then it was gone. I get the Chocolate Peanut Butter, and it's good. A big shake, you can drink half and save the rest for later (put it in your fridge, stupid). They use Home Chum brand ice cream, import it from Pennsylvania, and they're the only shop in this area that carries it. A solid shake, delivers that fleeting taste of otherness like all great shakes do.

1. Stam's Hand's down, the winner. Don't try to lead or follow, just get out of the way. Don't ask these ladies what kind of ice cream they use or how much syrup they put in. Don't ask any stupid questions, just stand back and let them work. They know they've got the best shake in town. Stam's destroys the competition with glee and zero remorse. Every cup is consistently perfect in all respects. It's the absolute, metaphors can't contain it. A deadly milkshake they make. The übermensch of milkshakes. Call it the ubershake.

All our parents have struggled to give us the things in life that are most important -- such as life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. So tell me, who has the right to try and take away these privileges that we so often take for granted? Well, as we learn from living there are always going to be those who feel that they are somehow superior and far exceedingly better than all others. You read in history classes, of past people, such as the Nazis, that massacred thousands of people. You read about people who want to take away the right to abortion. And of course the Ku Klux Klan and their lynchings of African-Americans and other minorities. The one thing that history teaches is how these people choose to kill and mock other people, but our question is why ?

On April 4,1992, the anniversary of the assassination of Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, the Ku Klux Klan will be rallying in Galena, not thirty minutes away from the Washington College campus. The fear and unbelief that this event has stirred up has been somewhat covered up, but the members of the Dale Adams Heritage Exchange would like to enlighten some people who would have otherwise gone living ignorant to the continuing struggles that minorities still have to face.

When our parents were being beaten physically and mentally, they did it so that we would not have to. So how can you tell a minority student on this campus, "Do not worry about it!" When in actuality that is all we feel that we can do.

Zylia N. L. Knowlin is the Corresponding Secretary of the Dale Adams Heritage Exchange.

WC's Past Meets Present

Julie Greene

Last Friday some good friends of mine diverted me from my first workout at the new fitness center to go on a road trip. I suggested Rock Hall, since in my four year stay here I had never been there. I just went to Betterton for the first time last November!

Getting back to our road trip — after driving through Rock Hall and Tolchester we happened to arrive at St. Paul's Episcopal Church, "the oldest Episcopal Church in Maryland having continuous services."

The grounds of this church were beautiful, not artificial, polite beautiful, but a natural, peaceful beauty. No one was on the grounds so we took a respectful stroll through the churchyard. At first we were amazed at the years etched on the worn headstones; they dated back to the 1600's. The next thing we noticed were the burial grounds of many families dating through several generations. It gave me the impression of a strong presence of family loyalty.

Wandering toward the millpond one of my friends noticed a burial plaque with the inscription "Clifton M. Miller." Yes, this was the same Clifton M. Miller for which our library is honorably named.

It seemed strange, to be on the outskirts of Chestertown and run into such a peaceful place, and proceed to discover a familiar name; as if running into a distant relative.

With the wind starting to bite a bit, we entered the Church to discover a large plaque on the wall listing the founding members of the church. Again, we saw a familiar name, four times. Several Hynsons were listed on the plaque, as well as a Hodson and a Ringgold.

After weeks, months, of working on my thesis, studying for classes, and commenting publicly on my concerns for the future of Washington College, I had unintentionally met its past head on. I felt a sense of warmth and comfort. My concerns for the institution's future seemed microscopic against the history of what I have referred to for the past four years as my home.

We all know George Washington contributed fifty guineas for the establishment of Washington College, but that history doesn't have the same personal connection as someone like Clifton Miller or Richard Hynson. For those students who are a second or third generation of a family attending WC, their parents or grandparents might have known a Hynson or a Miller.

That's the wonderful thing about Washington College. It's small and located in a community with tight family ties. Even today, there is evidence of WC's family history. Go to a home lacrosse game and you see local families, alumni, players' families, students, and lots of cute little kids running around with lacrosse sticks, trying to emulate their heroes on Kibler Field.

No matter what physical additions are made to Washington College, there is still the history, the history of Clifton M. Miller, Clarence Hodson, Lelia Hynson, and Richard Ringgold, as well as many other past presidents, faculty, and alumni of Washington College. Hopefully, the future students will look back at the present students, faculty, and administration with an equal respect for the history of Washington College.

Student Profile: Deborah Boyer

Deborah A. Boyer is a senior and a second-year RA in Talbot. She majors in English, concentrating in Contemporary American Literature. She carries a 3.3 GPA, and enjoys courses with Professor Day.

Boyer's interests are diverse and keep her busy enough without having to worry about graduation. She is the president of the Margaret Horsley Society, which has proved to be an active force on campus this year. The April 5 Women's Rights/NOW March in DC is MHS' focus of attention at the moment; Boyer's the woman to contact for details.

Last fall, she starred in Seascape with Sharks and Dancer, and even though it was her first time on stage, she and co-star Steve Brown brought the house down. She is a member of the Gay and Lesbian Task Force, participates in Writers' Union activities, and manages the student catering division of the WCDS.

Past activities include Varsity Field Hockey and Swimming during her Freshman and Sophomore years; she is also a past manager of the Casey Swim Center.

After graduation, Boyer would like to teach. She is applying for Graduate Assistant Programs, so that she can both work and continue her education. She prefers people-oriented jobs, but "I'll take anything."

Godot Shows Up at Washington College

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

Next weekend, Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot will open as not only an addition to Washington College's focus on Beckett Studies, but to celebrate the 25th Anniversary of the play's production by the Washington College Drama Department. Assistant Drama Professor Dale Daigle is directing one of his favorite plays, starring two of the same actors that appeared twenty-five years ago.

English Department Head Bennett Lamond plays Vladimir, the same role he portrayed in 1967, and Timothy Maloney, head of the Drama Department, formerly played Pozzo but will appear as Estragon, the other lead, next weekend. Pozzo will be Jason West this time around, and Jason Imber plays Lucky.

The 1967 production was in Norman James Theatre, and Daigle says that that's a big difference. "The play is written specifically for a proscenium stage . . . it works better with a big, open space."

"I've always loved Beckett," says Daigle. "His scripts are so precise. There really is not a superfluous detail in this script, for certain — every single element, from stage directions down to punctuation, matters — that's just not true of any other playwright I can think of. I've directed this play twice before, and I still discover new things at each rehearsal."

The students involved in this production are just as enthusiastic. Senior Drama Major Jason Imber feels "Lucky" to be in Godot. "Of all the shows I've worked in at WC, I've learned more working with Timothy Maloney and Bennett Lamond than I have in any other play before."

Rick Davis has designed the lights and Jason Rubin has designed the set. The rest of the cast and crew includes six-year-old Ian Dias as the Boy; Stage Manager Steph Hess; Assistant Director Carey Smith; Assistant Stage Manager Richard McKee; Costumer Shan Driscoll; Melanie Green and Abrah Wilberding on Props; and Technical Director Jason Imber.

Whitelaw: Beckett's Legacy Lives On Actress Receives Award for Excellence

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

After a profluence of publicity explaining what an enjoyable experience, not to mention honor, it would be to watch Whitelaw perform the works of Beckett, it was terrible to see so few students and faculty attending her performance. Whitelaw is the closest living thing we have to Beckett, and her twenty-eight year working relationship with the man who invented Postmodernism was an extraordinary one.

Whitelaw conducted an acting workshop with a good dozen or so members of Actors Community Theatre; although it was open to any actor with interest, the impression among the student body was that it was an invitational master workshop, and the scripts were not distributed before that evening. Consequently, only five WC students were in attendance, and another good dozen or so missed this unique opportunity.

Whitelaw talked about the processes Beckett went through in writing and directing his plays, and those that she went through in acting and working with him. Students acted scenes from Not I with the actor's direction. While she claims that she is no scholar, because she never attended college, her work with the playwright allowed her to be considered the foremost interpreter of Beckett's plays. he wrote two plays for her and favored her performing his plays over many other talented actors.

Unfortunately, Whitelaw fell ill while she was here, and had to cancel her appearance with the Theatre Technology II Class as well as the second night of the workshop. More publicly, her performance in Tawes Theatre last Friday was well attended by the Chestertown Community and the Sophie Kerr high school Weekenders.

The movie of Not I, while intended for television, was equally amazing on the large screen in Tawes. Mouth was so overwhelming and intense that her reluctance to perform the piece is not surprising. The "mouth-in-your-face" was powerful, having the appeal/disgust factor that makes you have to watch even when you can no longer stand to.

The rest of Whitelaw's voice-strained performance was comprised of scenes from Happy Days, Eh Joe, and Rockabye. She has a commanding presence whether she is reading from the text or relating her stories of the man himself. Audience members who were unfamiliar with the work of Beckett were probably paying closer attention to the text than her performance of it, but there are much weaker vehicles by which to discover Beckett. She said she felt undeserving of the Award for Excellence, but her performance convinced me, and hopefully those who were actually in attendance as well.

Review: Recent Works by Simone Osthoff

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

Osthoff is a Brazilian artist who moved to the States in 1988. For the last fourteen years she has worked as a printmaker. The large-scale mixed media drawings she has chosen for this exhibit represent a transition from the printmaking process to a more hands-on approach, and it is important to keep this in mind.

Even without knowing her previous medium, one senses when looking at these works a definite stage of transition, a feeling of experimentation and playfulness. The formal qualities in these works are definitely geometrically based, and some, such as Porta-Aviao (#6), appear to be blueprints for imaginary 3D objects. The linear elements are striking, particularly in those works which are comprised of two or more giant (at least 5' high) pieces of paper, which have been hung so that the gaps in between have been left showing. This produces the same effect that the overall exhibit does, one of a struggle for continuity, which is ironically more aided than hindered by the gaps in paper.

These works are more than formal exercises, however. There is, in the very technique of mixing such media as dry pigment, oil stick, ink, and pencil, a very airy childlike quality which pervades even in the most tonally black works. One cannot help but feel theat Osthoff had a great deal of fun in their execution.

This show would serve as ann argument that the process really is more important than the product in art, for while the works themselves are attractive, the more conservative and traditionally-grounded viewer may tend to dismiss them as "messy" or "unfinished."

The viewer most open to these works would be a fellow artist; this does not mean a fellow exhibitor, but rather anyone who ever played with art as a child. This exhibit, while extremely thoughtful, is at the same time very spontaneous. When a child draws an object, it may not be recognizable to his parents as a tree or as his brother; in the same way, the objects which appear in Osthoff's mind and on her paper show a freedom from what art is supposed to be. The difference between drawings on Mom's refrigerator and Recent Works is that Osthoff both accepts and rejects the elements and principles of visual design, and this sense of struggle will come through to anyone who takes the time to view these works as a process in and of themselves, rather than something that art is supposed to be.

Choice works: Qua, Qua (#8); Guangbara (#9); Paralelepipedo (#10); Porta (#2). This exhibit is sponsored by the Art Exhibitions Committee and will be on display in Gibson Fine Arts Center Wed. - Sat., Noon - 4:00 p.m., through April 19.

Rocky Start for Women's Lacrosse: Drop First Three Matches

By Renée Guckert
Staff Writer

Women's Lacrosse opened their '92 season with three tough losses to Widener, Franklin and Marshall, and University of California, Santa Barbara Club. It may be a disappointment to two of the top players on the squad but, they still manage to shine. These two would be Senior Margaret "Marge" Doyle who leads the attack with a total of nine goals and one assist, followed by Junior Amy "Sunshine" McCleary with five goals and one assist.

After just recently leaving the position of goalie, Senior Kristy Hilgartner has moved to center and is proving to be an incredible asset outside of the crease. Kristy, accompanied by Sophomore Cristin Albert, led the Shorewomen's defense in ground ball control against the UCSB team last Tuesday. In addition, Junior Eleanor Shriver helped to sweep up UCSB's attack around the hopper at a number of crucial moments while freshman goalie Nancy Millhouser recorded seven saves. Junior Brigid DeVries literally flew by her opponents in Tuesday's game as she turned on the wheels to aid, not only the team's defense, but attack as well.

Following Saturday's loss to F & M, Sophomore Kirsten Lucas commented that, most of all, the Shorewomen needed to "improve on transitions, cutting, and setting up around the cage." While the score may not have shown it, Washington's game improved considerably from F & M to UCSB with faster plays, better transitions, and incredible defensive support.

The Shorewomen certainly have their work cut out for them as the 1992 season gets under way but, in addition to coaches Guinan and Frazer, the team is fortunate enough to be guided by one of its very own alumni—two time All-American lacrosse player Erin O'Neal, who graduated from WC last spring. Erin lettered in both field hockey and lacrosse each of her four years at Washington. In addition, she received numerous honors including All-MAC lacrosse in 1991 and the Eliason Award which recognizes the top senior athlete at Washington College each year. Erin was an inspirational team player, and she has undoubtedly carried that leadership with her into her assistant coach position.

Don't forget to come out and support the Shorewomen as they battle Ursinus, Saturday at 1:00 p.m. !

Crew Glides Past Skidmore

By Laura Green
Staff Writer

On Friday, March 20 the Washington College Crew teams scrimmaged the Skidmore crews. Although the individual WC boats came out ahead in almost each of the four minute pieces, they were unaware of how complete the next morning's victory would prove to be.....

Saturday morning dawned cold and overcast, the foreboding grey skies and churning waters did not speak well for the impending races. The Skidmore Crew team had arrived the day before in a deluxe charter bus, flushed from the sun and well rested from a week in North Carolina. The Washington Crew team lay quietly in wait, mentally preparing themselves amongst the shadows of the Boat House.

The Novice Women were up first. They made their way down the icy graveled road and out onto the dock carrying their vessel. The novice men followed, close on the women's heels, down to the crashing river where the two teams warmed up on their way down to the starting line. When the officials gave the signal for the start of the Women's Novice Eight, WC took off like a shot. The women tore up the race course and finished eight boat lengths ahead of the disoriented Skidmore crew. The Novice Men arrived at the starting line and proceeded to cut through the chop of the water with brute strength. The WC Novice Men's Eight cleanly took their competitors and earned the second first place standing of the day.

The Varsity Women then rowed an eight-women boat with the addition of three novice rowers. Pulling up to the start in a snow shower, the women held their ground and faced the Skidmore Varsity Eight for the telling moment. As the two boats began

WC Netters Play First Games in LFC

Men Rock On

By Doug Hoffberger
Staff Writer

On Saturday, March 21, at home, the WAC netters "inaugarated" the Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center, by trouncing their Goucher College opponents 9-0 on the new Versaturf surface. The win over Goucher college improves the Shoremen record to a bulky 7-2.

Early season play proves Washinton College worthy of making another trip to the national tournament, so long as all the players remain healthy throughout the '92 season. As the spring season progresses into the fourth week of match play, two of the Shoremen's valued assets are out with injuries. Transfer Frank Hartwig has been plagued with tendinitis of the forearm throughout the early season, but with his medical excercises and some light hitting, Frank is determined to be tearing up the WAC circuit as early as Monday, March 30, versus Haverford. Number three seed, Trevor Hurd, adopted a minor case of tendinitis of the wrist, but should be available for Saturday's match versus Drew.

Versus Goucher College at the number one spot, Alberto Diaz rolled over his opponent 6-0, 6-1, improving his singles mark on the year to 8-1. Emilio Bogado and Carlos Nuno improved their overall singles record to 7-2 with strait set victories over their Goucher opponents. Captains, Andy Bohutinsky and Jeff Rexford, upped their singles marks to 7-2 and 3-1 respectively, with wins in Saturday's match. In his debut singles match, Nashvillite Deepak Raja beat Goucher's Andreas Vinoslav (which means swedish wino) by a score of 6-1, 7-5. In doubles, Alberto Diaz and Emilio Bogado, Carlos Nuno and Andy Bohutinsky, and Jeff Rexford and Deepak Raja all were victorious, bringing the WAC netter's overall Doubles mark to 21-6.

Next week, the Shoremen will play their most important matches as far as the MAC ranking officials and the netters are concerned. They will play MAC rivals Ursinus and Haverford, as well as Drew and Vassar two teams that are new to the Shoreman schedule. (Doug- It's spelled upped, not UPT- Spent, definitely spent!)

The women's tennis team was handed a devastating blow by 24th ranked Swarthmore this past Tuesday. After a hard-fought 5-hour duel, the Shorewomen came up short, 4-5. The match started at 3:15 on the outdoor courts and was completed in the new Lifetime Fitness Center due to darkness.

Miriam Dittmann, a senior from Severna Park, notched the first team victory at the #3 singles spot with a quick 6-3, 6-4 sweep of Becca Kalaski. Diana Claussen, making her Freshman debut at #4, did not fare so well, dropping a straight-set loss to Ayanda Ntetna, 2-6, 2-6. The remaining four singles matches went down to the wire, with the Shorewomen posting victories at #1 and #2. Tracy Peel bounced back from a first set deficit to trounce Julie Shapiro 1-6, 6-1, 6-3. Pam Hendrickson, filling the second slot, continued her 8-match win streak with a come-from-behind victory; she fought off Kim Crosey 3-6, 6-4, 6-4. Both Kristy Karns and Rachael Rice were unable to come through at #5 and #6, respectively. Karns dropped a close 4-6, 6-7 (8-10) decision, while Rice could not force a third set, losing 3-6, 5-7.

Miriam Dittmann displays strong forehand

The match proceeded to doubles with the teams tied at 3 points a piece. After a few games, all three matches moved indoors, with each team taking additional warm-up time. Rice and Dittmann played a difficult match at #2, but were unable to hang on, losing to Kalaski and Ntetna. Karns and Jennifer Sloan were stopped 2-6, 3-6 by Katz and Lieu. Peel and Hendrickson posted the lone Shorewomen doubles victory with a pasting of Shapiro and Crosey, 6-0, 6-3.

The outcome of this match throws into question Shorenetter hopes for a repeat MAC conference title. Swarthmore is not in the Southwest section, but the two teams could meet in the Southern finals. In addition, the team may have difficulty retaining their 1991 national ranking of 13th. However, much could change with this past Thursday's Trenton State match (to be covered next week) as the Shorewomen, currently boasting a 4-4 record, met their top-ten foe.

The women trek to Gettysburg tomorrow to face their MAC nemesis, the Bullets, and hope to regain what they may have lost against Swarthmore. Good Luck to the Shorewomen Netters!

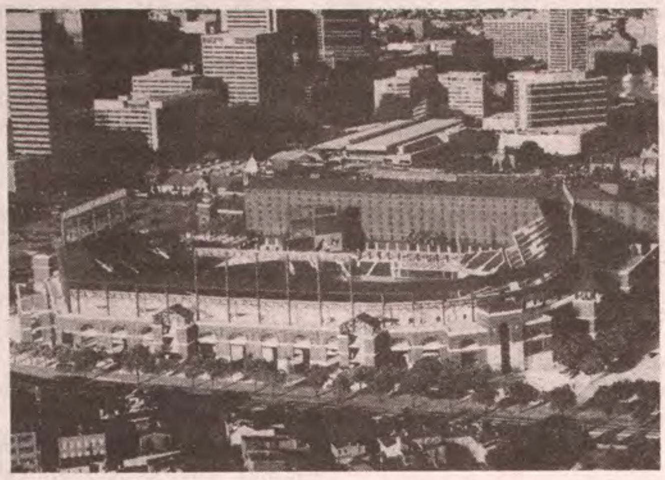
When plans to build the Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center were first announced to the Washington College Community, a distinct grumbling was heard from certain parts of the campus. "Why do we need this gigantic facility at our small liberal arts college?" "Shouldn't we be concentrating a little more on the foundering academics here at Washington?" "What's the matter with the Cain Dome?—It's got so much character, so much tradition." Well, in one short week since the Lifetime Fitness Center opened, I've begun to wonder how Washington College ever survived without it. The praise for the new building has been incessant, and any anti-LFC sentiment seems to have disappeared along with the plans for the new soccer locker room.

Similarly, when construction began on the new stadium in Baltimore, there was much complaint. Die-hard Memorial Stadium fans could not see the purpose in building a new stadium to replace one with which there was nothing inherently wrong. I'll admit, living near the stadium, I was not a little angered by the plans myself. I remembered walking to the stadium with my Dad and brothers on sunny summer afternoons to watch the Orioles play. The atmosphere was always exciting, with the huge crowds and the vendors and the raucous carryings on of (O-R-I-O-L-E-S) Wild Bill Hagey in section 33. I remember chanting "Eddie! Eddie!" when the champion slugger stepped up to the plate and I remember jumping up and down on the metal slats of the general admission seats when Murray ripped one over the centerfield fence. I remember singing along to John Denver's "Thank God I'm a Country Boy" during the seventh-inning stretch, and I remember being thrilled by the pitching of Jim Palmer and Mike Flanagan. Finally, I remember being happily annoyed at the announcer's, "Give that faaan . . . a contract," every time someone caught a foul ball. In short, for the people who grew up with Memorial Stadium, who could spend whole afternoons reminiscing about it, the new ballpark seemed a ridiculous waste of time and money.



Last week, we had the opportunity to visit the new stadium. Three weeks prior to opening day, college newspapers in the area were given a press conference and a tour of Oriole Park at Camden Yards. Perhaps the only disappointing thing about the new stadium is the name. Aside from the ridiculous sound of the words 'Oriole Park,' Camden Yards is the ultimate baseball stadium. One of the most important reasons for this is that the new stadium, unlike Memorial Stadium, was designed for baseball only. In the event that Baltimore ever receives another football team, a separate facility will be built 3/4 of a mile South of Camden Yards to house the new team. (If we get a team this year, they will play in Memorial Stadium for a year). Thanks to this fact, Camden Yards' dimensions are much more intimate, which helps to cultivate the old-style stadium aura. Contributing to this phenomenon is the presence of the Camden Yards Warehouse, the cast iron logo of the 1892 Orioles on the end of every row of seats, and the real pine benches in the dugouts.

A few more notables include a mini 'Green Monster' in right field, to make up for the short rightfield line, Prescription Athletic Turf, designed to withstand more moisture and grown on our very own Eastern Shore, wider seats with more leg room and no obstructed view seating, party suites which can be rented on an individual basis and can accommodate up to 60 people (the estimate on those was about $2,000 per game), a decreased slope in the upper deck, effectively eliminating the nose-bleed sensation, speakers in every section of the stadium to eliminate the echo reminiscent of Memorial Stadium (now we only have to listen to "Give that faaan . . . a contract" once per catch), elevated bullpens, a new Sony JumboTRON video board which is apparently five times better than the old Diamond Vision, even during day games, and finally, direct transplants from the old ballpark including homeplate and the rightfield foul pole.

Certainly, anyone who grew up with the Baltimore Orioles will be sorry to see Memorial Stadium go. Gone are the festive summer afternoons and evenings of eating nachos, drinking beer, and watching Orioles' baseball on 33rd street. I'm sure I'll miss it for awhile, but after visiting Camden Yards, I know I won't miss it for long. The Orioles Ballclub has changed. No longer do we scream "Eddie! Eddie!" until we're blue in the face or laugh at the antics of Wild Bill or hold our breath in anticipation of Jim Palmer's next pitch. New chants and new acts and new players have moved up to take the place of the old. We should look on the move from Memorial Stadium as the closing of a thrilling chapter in Orioles' history and look forward to the opening of this new oldstyle stadium at Camden Yards as the start of a great new relationship between Baltimore and the O's. Who knows, the change might just be what they need to get back on track. In any case, some people in Baltimore may be grumbling now, but I'd bet my Cal Ripken Jr. rookie card that they'll be singing a different tune come opening day.

LAX Moves to Five and One

Last Saturday the Men's Lacrosse team went up against chilly and brisk conditions to face visiting Colorado College. It proved to be an exciting and close match between the Shoremen and the Tigers with Dave Slomkowski, a former first team All-American goalie here at WC and presently Colorado's assistant coach, traveling back to Kibler Field to get a look at the team he left behind. Although the score remained close, the Shoremen held the lead over the Tigers throughout the game.

Washington had forty attempted shots on goal, almost doubling Colorado's twenty-two attempts. The Shoremen not only out-shot Colorado, they had 31 more ground balls and controlled 15 of the 23 face-offs. In the cage, Freshman Toni Forti and transfer Andy Manos demonstrated great effort with Forti tallying four saves during the first two quarters and Manos tallying six saves in the final two quarters. Scott Overend and Kevin Doyle helped the keepers on the defensive end with strong play against a tough Colorado offense.

At half-time, Washington led by only one goal but, early in the third quarter, Freshman Greg Lawler scored his third goal to put WAC ahead 7-5. However, The Tigers stayed right in it and made a real go of it in the third by scoring three goals of their own, trying to gain the lead from the Shoremen, to no avail. With 11:31 remaining in the fourth quarter and a man-down, Chris Cote scored on a pass from Lawler to put the Shoremen ahead 9-7. Although Colorado hit two more shots in the fourth quarter, Lawler and Cote combined for another two to keep the lead. Overall, Cote and Lawler paced the Shoremen with four goals each while Sophomore Chris Sanchez contributed two and Jason Paige hammered one.

The men continue their season, traveling up to cold Cornell University, to challenge old-time rival, Hobart, on Sunday March 29th at 2:00 PM. Washington lost to Hobart 18-6 in the '90 Division III Finals and again lost to them in the regular season last year. Let's wish them luck as this could be the year they will break their losing streak against the Statesmen!

Keith (water buffalo) Whiteford pitched a nine inning shutout against Saint Johns Fisher College last week to bring Washington's record to 1-4. Whiteford dazzled opposing hitters with a cornucopia of pitches, notching thirteen strikeouts on the day. It was a characteristic effort for Whiteford who at present can boast a 0.64 earned run average. That, ladies and gentlemen, is the kind of performance that earns you the honor of Newt's POW.

With Whiteford pitching as strongly as he was, the Shoremen had plenty of time to score themselves. And they used most of that time waiting until the bottom of the eighth inning to get their offense in gear. Senior Co-Captain John "Beast" Morrall ignited the Shoremen batters with a double to right center field. Then Whiteford punched a single into the outfield, advancing Morrall. By the end of the inning, Mike Hanifee, Gerry Scully and Dan Coker all had helped themselves to an RBI or two, boosting the Shoremen to a 5-0 lead. In the ninth, Whiteford continued to pitch well and the rest of Washington's defense closed out the game without committing a single error.

After having their Saturday game versus Ursinus postponed due to adverse conditions, the Shoremen prepared for a doubleheader against the Green Terrors of Western Maryland this past Wednesday. Ha- But that's next week!!

WC Swimmers and Swim Team Make All-Academic Team

Congratulations are in order! That's right ladies and gentlemen, three of our very own have been recognized by the Middle Atlantic Conference on academic achievement. Junior Andrew McKim (3.62 GPA, MAJOR: Int. Studies), Senior Kasey Carroll (3.69 GPA, MAJOR: Biology), and Sophomore Nancy Whiteman (3.51 GPA, MAJOR: Psychology) have been named to the MAC Winter 1991-92 All-Academic Team this season.

In addition, Washington College's women's swimming team has received 1991 All-Academic Team honors from the College Swimming Coaches Association of America (CSCAA).

Washington, with a combined 2.949678549870098765 GPA for the Fall 1991 semester, was one of 60 teams nationally to have received the award, which is earned by the entire team compiling at least a 2.8 GPA on a 4.0 scale. Besides Washington, ten Division III women's teams achieved All-Academic status, including Hiram College, DePauw University, Wheaton College, Macalester College, Baldwin-Wallace College, Kenyon College, Tufts University, Regis College, Hollins College and Augustana College. Washington was the only Middle Atlantic Conference institution on the CSCAA honor roll this season. The only other Maryland team on the list was Division I Towson State's women's team.

Washington's women's team posted a 5-6 regular season record and finished 10th in the Middle Atlantic Conference Championships three weeks ago.

Earlier, the CSCAA had recognized Shorewomen senior two-time All-American Kasey Carroll as an individual Academic All-American. It was the third consecutive year that Carroll had earned the distinction. Way to go Aquamen and Aquawomen!

fighting down the course it was obvious that this would be a passionate battle. Trading seats for the title, the WC women showed their determination by walking through their competition and winning the race.

The Varsity Men entered three boats, the first of which was a Pair without Coxswain, an event which is a great feat to master. The WAC Pair finished off their opponents early on and plunged through the finish line with the third win of the day. The Varsity Men's A and B boats lined up against the Skidmore eight and awaited the official's command. This race was a tough battle. The rowers toiled against the adverse conditions and in the end The B boat followed the A boat through the finish and WC came up victorious... again.

The day drew to a close with the victorious WC crew teams exhausted and elated, the first race of the spring season was over. The crews will race again on Saturday, April 4 at the JHU Invitational... be there.

Pssst, guess who? YOU FOOL!! I can't believe you fell for the oldest one in the book—It's SPIDERMAN and THE VAUGHNSTER comin' at you better, stronger, faster. We can rebuild it, we have the techn—wait a second, we're getting off on another stupid sidetrack here . . . Before we get down to business we'd like to acknowledge the heroic actions of WC's Dan Kretzer. In last week's rugby match, Kretzer, in an effort to save his coach in a brawl, picked up a player and body slammed him into the turf. "It was just like that scene in The Deerhunter. You know, the one where De Niro's being pulled out of the water by the helicopter—" Okay, okay, Nate, we get the idea.

And this week's POW---The one they call "ACE," the hero of last week's baseball shutout, Keith "Whitey" Whiteford. Whitey, a Sophomore hailing from Calvert Hall in Baltimore, has pitched fourteen innings and thrown an amazing 20 strikeouts (13 of which came in last week's game), maintaining a .64 ERA. In addition, Whiteford has proved himself to be a valuable asset at the plate, hitting consistently in the early season. Certainly, Whitey is amazing on the diamond but, when it comes to hardball on the CAPS court, everyone knows he's just a scaredy-cat.

WC's Rugby Club in Action

Rugby Roughed Up By Kent Island

By Brandon White
Staff Writer

Last weekend the Rugby Club went out and suffered its first home loss of the season to the Kent Island Rugby Club. At the half, Kent Island had scored only one tri, making the score 4-0. In the second half, Kent Island's bigger and faster forwards turned it on and rattled off two more tris but missed their extra points, making the final score 14-0. "It was not that Kent Island was any more experienced then us, it was that their forwards were bigger and their backs were much faster" says Shawn Hamill, President of the Rugby Club. Players who had exceptional games were Skip "the Illegal Hitter" Meissner, Dave Snyder, and Peter "Stein" Hagen.

Next week, the Rugby team plays arch rival St. Marys, whom the team already defeated this season 33-8, at Worton Park on Saturday at 1:00pm. Be there to see the action!!!!!

Lacrosse Club Opens Season, Loses 15-11

The newly formed WC Lacrosse Club opened its season this Saturday with a game against the Delaware Lacrosse Club. WC opened the game with an early lead rattling off two straight goals. The Blue Hens rallied and took a three goal halftime lead. WC rallied to tie it up, but lost momentum as a result of its lack of endurance and a few mental errors. "All in all the club's performance was very good," said Matt Johnson, President of the Lacrosse Club. "We only had two practices before the game and the club itself has only been established for two weeks. Delaware's Club has been established for many years and had already had five games before playing us. We did extremely well for our first game." John Nunn had an exceptional game playing in the goal for the first time since high school and looks to be one of the club's biggest assets.

The club plays two games this weekend. On Saturday they play Ferrum and on Sunday they play Montgomery Rockville. The time and place will be announced. Come out and see the club action!!

Cheyenne Poet Questions WC's Rightful Ownership of Native American Artifacts

One of the Native American artifacts in the Albee Collection on the second floor of the Miller Library

By Amanda Burt
Staff Writer

When Lance Henson visited Washington College last Thursday, March 26, to read from his poetry and discuss Native American poetry and politics, he was shocked to find several Sioux items that may have been illegitimately acquired before they were donated to the college in the Albee Collection, the relatively small Native American exhibit in Miller Library. Among the items in question are a war shirt that was supposedly worn by Crazy Horse when he was killed in battle and a war bonnet. Though Henson himself is a Cheyenne, he contacted the Sioux Tribal Nation this week to notify them of the collection's possessions, as they may want to attempt to reclaim the artifacts.

Professor Lynn Doyle was with Henson and his wife, Jeanetta, when they discovered the items. According to Doyle, the two of them had been photo-copying some Native American poems from books that are rare to find when they inadvertently saw the display case, located on the library's second floor, as they were leaving.

"It was my impression from Henson," says Doyle, "that the war shirt may originally have been stolen as one of the bounties of battle." She recalls that Henson believed that Chief Red Cloud's headdress was probably a legitimate gift to the college. While Doyle notes that it would be a nice gesture to return the items if the claims were legitimate, she admits that it would not be easy to figure out to whom the articles should be returned.

Paul Boyer, Editor of*Tribal College: Journal of American Indian Higher Education*, a periodical whose office is located in Washington College's Bunting Hall, agrees that it is not an easy task to determine who the rightful owners of newly found artifacts are. Often tribal groups will migrate, making it difficult to locate the heirs. He says that all members of the Native American community do not agree that all remains and artifacts should be reclaimed from larger institutions such as universities and museums. While some strongly oppose anyone holding the items other than the tribal group to which they belonged, others want the transfer to be gradual and agree that remains should be studied by scholars and academic institutions.

"Washington College's sudden dilemma is a smaller example of a very confusing emotional issue," says Boyer. He notes that there is increasing agreement among institutions holding large numbers of Native American remains that they have a responsibility to the tribal groups. Boyer points to recent legislation requiring federally funded institutions to catalog their Native American possessions and says that this law encouraged a movement to return artifacts to their owners. He sees the situation

Two WC Students Assaulted at Premiere of "White Men Can't Jump"

By John C. Griep
News Editor

Mike Swanson and Darren Vican were involved in a brawl last Friday, March 27 at a mall in Dover, Delaware where they went with their dates to view the premiere of "White Men Can't Jump," the latest movie by black filmmaker Ron Shelton. According to Vican, the movie theater was packed when the four entered. The vast majority of the moviegoers were black. "I saw four seats next to each other and asked if they were taken. Someone sitting nearby responded no." Swanson entered the row and Vican stepped back to let their dates enter; however, two black males squeezed past him and sat down next to Swanson. Vican said that he recognized one of the guys from his hometown.

Swanson informed the two men that the seats were taken and one of the men responded that no one was sitting in them. Swanson told them to "get the hell out of the seats," and the two exchanged words. Swanson invited him to step outside to finish the discussion. "He said, 'after the movie.' and I responded, 'What, so you can get your friends together to jump me?'" The usher appeared and asked Vican if they would like their seats. By this point, Vican had spotted four adjoining seats in the front row and told the usher that they would just take those seats instead. During the movie, about six black males moved into the row of seats immediately behind Vican, Swanson, and their dates. Vican stated, "I guess we should have known that something was up."

After the movie ended, Swanson told Vican to stay back with their dates while he walked out first. "I thought that something might happen." He exited the theater about forty feet in front of Darren. Swanson stated, "as soon as I went through the doors to exit the mall, two guys came up behind me and punched me in the back of the head. The guy who I was arguing with in the theater was coming toward me. I got about ten to fifteen feet from him and about fifteen guys jumped me. I just covered up my head with my left arm and started punching. Probably half the guys who were hitting me did not know the guy I was fighting." Swanson stated that his assailants were black males around eighteen to twenty-two years old.

Vican added, "Swanson was in the middle of about ten guys who were punching and running. I grabbed a friend of mine who was standing off to the side and told him to get out of there and someone punched me in the side of the head. I guess it knocked me out. I fell to the floor and hit it with my head and they were just kicking me in the head

NOTHING BUT THE TRUTH

How about another round of applause for Senior Music major John Blakelock on his awe-inspiring Senior Recital last Friday evening in Tawes Theatre. It is one thing to support a friend in attending such an event, it is quite another to be absolutely "swept off one's feet"[1] by its passionate expression. That he communicated this effect without speaking is remarkable. Way to go Blake.

Enough of that stuff. Last week I promised to return with some beef, and here comes the segue. Blakelock's performance should not only be commended for its quality, but for its originality, aptly noted in its title, "A Recital of Original Compositions." "Original" being the key word here; not denoting the composer's inventiveness or imagination, but his capacity to create music which is truly his own. Much of John's work was inspired by other artists (including Schoenbërg, Wallace Stevens, and John Steinbeck - see review), but in the end, especially for those familiar with Blakey, it was solely his music being performed on stage last Friday. We are all inspired by those who come before us, and often draw from them for inspiration - whether that be a writer, an actor, a musician, or even an athlete.[2] But there are those of us who take this "inspiration" a step farther. Those who are doing their best to re-invent the distinction between "original imagination" and "imaginative originality."

The topic of plagiarism has not met with whole-hearted support from the Washington College community. Faculty members cringe every time Professor Brien writes a letter to the ELM or begins to speak at faculty meetings. Many thought SGA President "Sparky" Kelly tainted an otherwise agreeable Spring Convocation by blasting the current state of academic honesty at WC. I'm sure the Greeks won't be too happy with my article this week ("Asshole can't mind his own business!")[3] But, regardless of its popularity, plagiarism threatens the very foundation of our, and every other, learning institution. Yet, this problem is not rooted in our education system, but our very culture itself. In America, plagiarism is not only a widespread practice, but an encouraged one at that.

We have many models to draw from for our inspiration. We see it in the writings of Dr. Martin Luther King, a man Washington College honored several months ago. While writing his doctoral dissertation at Boston University in 1955, King copied extended passages from the original work of his subject, theologian Paul Tillich, and the dissertation of another BU student.[4] King has also been accused of plagiarizing other college papers along with many of his later speeches.

We see this trend in our government. Senator Joseph Biden, of nearby Delaware, plagiarized long passages of Neil Kinnock's speeches during his presidential campaign of 1988.[5] We see it in former President Ronald Reagan, who "forgot" large portions of the Iran-Contra Affair, and present President George Bush who has proven a brilliant liar on a variety of such "small" topics as the Gulf War and the recent dip in the nation's economy. We also see this in the recent S&L fiasco, especially concerning Charles Keating's white lies that will only cost the country billions of dollars over the next couple years. These are our role-models. These are our heroes.

With the recent crackdown on academic dishonesty at WC centering around a new survey questionnaire (Who are you? Have you ever plagiarized? If so, on what? With who? When? Have you in the past, or do you presently associate with anyone who plagiarizes? Tell us NOW!) are we heading into a McCarthy-era type of punishment?

No. The plagiarism problem at WC (and throughout American culture) resembles the S&L bail-out, in that everyone will be held accountable for its reformation. This will not, and definitely should not, become a witch-hunt. But, a solution will only come about if students and faculty BOTH educate themselves and each other. Although students at the collegiate level should be responsible for their own actions, the problem "lies less with the actions of the plagiarists than with the inactions of those responsible for their discipline."[6] In turn, the administration should provide an adequate arena for these discoveries.

Please attend today's Workshop on Plagiarism (see brief on Pg. 3). Academic honesty should always top the list of this, and every other learning facility. By ignoring this problem, we will continue to digress as both individuals and as an institution. By tackling this problem now, we probably will not reap any benefits for at least a few years. But when they come, they will be worth all the effort.

I am through memorializing plagiarists and liars.[7] My heroes, my role models, are people like John Blakelock.[8] As he could tell you, there is not a better feeling than to create something that is wholly yours, and share that experience/knowledge with all.

We are rebuilding this thing called a "liberal arts education." It is a never-ending/fluctuating process that often seems more trouble than its worth. Don't be guilty of not trying. Be guilty of failing, be guilty of saying "I don't know," be guilty of spending more than twenty minutes in the library. But don't be guilty of not trying to do something about it. And that goes out again to BOTH students and faculty.

This (pending further research) is nothing but the truth.[9]

DANGERS OF HAIR REPLACEMENT
BY MICHAEL BIG HAIR SAPP . . . I'M TIRED .
When Bob first met Sy Sperling, he thought that there was no medical cure for balding. It was lucky, then, that Sy handed him a pamphlet that dispelled the rumors of the Hellsinki Formula & Minoxodil, the miracle break-through.
Bob was promised sailboats & champagne, & attractive girls in bright bathing suits. This was the part that Peg, his hooknosed wife, our hero, objected too. "Just be happy how you are," She said. "I like me fine, but I'd like me better with hair," he said.
In truth, Minoxodil is a miracle break-through. Bob grew a pompador & began wearing gold chains. He called Peg "Peggy-O." Bob got his sailboat (rental) & his girls (also rental.) He began driving fast cars. And Peg, poor Peg, didn't know enough to leave him.
USS LOVERBOY
One night he came home from a disco revival humming "Stayin' Alive." Peg was waiting up on the couch. "I've had enough," she said. "Then let someone else have some," he said. He laughed & went to bed mumbling & drunk. Peg took a straight razor and shaved his new hair off so it resembled how it use to look. She cradled his head & sang "Bob, Bob." When he woke up he was really pissed off but he stopped riding in sailboats.

WC Administration Condemns Harassment

To the Editor:

Recently, several incidents directed against members of the Washington College Community have come to our attention, and we view these as clear acts of harassment. Specifically, we refer to incidents involving members of the Gay and Lesbian Alliance, members of our Afro-American community, and a member of the College staff. Harassment is often defined as "an act or communication causing emotional stress specifically addressed to individuals or groups intended to intimidate or humiliate that individual or group because of race, religion, creed, gender, age, ethnicity, national origin, physical disability, or sexual orientation." It is important that every member of the College community know that the Administration will not tolerate such acts of bias-related harassment and that, were possible, such acts will be addressed with the individuals involved.

As an institution we are committed to the moral and legal principle that all members of our community enjoy the right of free speech even when the opinions expressed are very different from our own, or are perhaps abhorrent to us. However, we are equally committed to the principle that this right of free speech is undermined by acts of clear harassment.

We call upon every member of the Washington College Community to take personal responsibility for fostering an environment that is not only receptive to all members of the community but celebrates the diversity of our community.

Such acts of harassment as we cite above diminish each of us and cannot and will not be tolerated.

Future of ‘Fraternity Files’ at WC Questioned

By Patrick Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

All official Washington College fraternal organizations possess some sort of in-house filing system for study-aid purposes, ranging from simple sharing of notes and textbooks to highly organized archives consisting of past papers and exams. Maintaining such a system does not violate any existing college policy, simply because no such policy currently exists. Greek members are encouraged to utilize these files; whether to familiarize themselves with a professor's exam-style or witness first-hand an example of a well-constructed paper. In no way is plagiarism of such files advocated. However, with WC's recent emphasis on academic honesty amongst the student body, does the existence of this system justify itself or does it pose a strong temptation for those students with access to the files? This past week, a recent Washington College graduate [whose request for anonymity has been granted] spoke with the ELM, revealing shocking evidence concerning past misuse of these files.

“I don't know what's going on today,” she stated, “but, in the past I know of at least one occasion where my boyfriend, who was a fraternity member, used one of his brother's papers to copy from. I'm not sure if this happened on any other occasion, because when it did occur, I remember him being under a great deal of pressure. I can't say for sure, but I'm almost positive he got that paper from the fraternity file.”

When asked about the college's policy concerning Greek organizations possessing such filing systems, Maureen McIntire, Dean of Student Affairs, stated that the college has no policy concerning “fraternity files.”

“There is no official policy,” McIntire said, “it is something they [WC Greek organizations] do on their own. However, “she added, “we are concerned about how that information is being used. At one end of the scale a student could be using the files simply to examine an exemplary paper. On the other end, however, a student could be plagiarizing the paper's content.” It is all the “gray-matter” in between these extremes that concerns McIntire, regarding the temptation for fraternal members to misuse their files.

“If they are doing that [misusing files],” McIntire stated, “then they are doing the college and their organization a great disservice.”

To further clarify this situation, the ELM spoke with a representative of every official WC Greek organization concerning their policies towards content and up-keep of their filing systems.

Monita Airen, President of the Alpha Omnicron Pi sorority:

“We do not have a filing system of past papers or exams. The only study-aids we keep in our chapter room are current textbooks that members can borrow or browse through.”

Traci Castello, President of the Zeta Tau Alpha sorority:

“We do not have papers or exams on file. We do have a bunch of notebooks stored in a chest in our chapter room. They were left behind by past Zetas to be a helpful study-aid. But no, we do not have an organized filing system of old papers. Just the notebooks.”

Jennifer Sloan, President of the Alpha Chi Omega sorority:

“We have ‘scholarship files.’ They're located in a filing cabinet in our chapter room. They are all out of date. No one has been putting stuff down there. We do have old exams and exam questions. We also have books and lab reports from previous classes. Any sister can use them. There are also Baby Bio exams down there which sisters use and are current.”

Chris Graham, President of the Phi Delta Theta fraternity:

“Brothers voluntarily deposit old tests in a file that is kept by our Scholarship Chairman. We do not keep papers in the file. If we did, and other people outside of the fraternity were to access and possibly copy them, then we would be considered liable. Brothers feel free to deposit their old tests, but are not forced. These tests are used frequently, and are an easier way to study for upcoming exams. They give an indication of what professors want; what they base the material on (class notes, lecture, readings).”

William Halagarda, President of the Theta Chi fraternity:

“We have no organized filing system. We do have a couple piles of old exam question sheets and blue-books, some old notebooks and class notes, but no papers on file. All are kept in Dorchester House.”

Joe Koskuba, member of the Kappa Alpha fraternity (formerly in charge of the organization's filing system):

“At the end of each semester, old notebooks, exams, and papers are collected and arranged by subject. They are kept in a filing cabinet in our chapter room, located in the basement of Middle Hall. I do not think these files are widely used. In fact, I know of no one in the past year who has used them. Papers are kept on file as more of a guideline on how to write a good paper, what a professor wants and expects.”

When asked what he thought of the existence of such filing systems, Kevin Brien, Professor of Philosophy, and a leader in the promotion of improved academic honesty at Washington College, stated he had “deep ethical problems with the files.” He added, “although many students might use these files correctly, the temptation to abuse them is great. The circumstances surrounding the access to such files make abuse very tempting.”

When asked to elaborate on these circumstances, Brien said that since the location of these files is both “insulated” and “exclusive” to specific groups of students, professors have no way to verify when a case of plagiarism has occurred. “If faculty members do not have access to the material these papers are based on, how can they legitimate their grades?” Brien questioned.

Brien would like to see one of two solutions implemented concerning the future of such “insulated” filing systems. “The general student body should have access to these files, like they do to previous theses in the closed reserve section of the Miller Library,” he stated. “But, some of my colleagues and myself within the Philosophy department have wondered if it is a good idea to even have old theses on library file.”

Brien's second suggestion, the one he favors more than the public access alternative, would be for the official fraternal organizations to voluntarily destroy their files. “In practice,” Brien said, “we know that such files have been misused. I would like to see an end to that.”

Everyone Must Read This Brief Concerning Today's "Workshop on Plagiarism"

On Friday, April 3, Washington College will present a symposium on academic honesty, aptly titled "Workshop on Plagiarism" at 3:00 p.m. in the Forum Room of the Casey Academic Center. George Gopen, Director of the Writing Program at Duke University, will lead the meeting. Throughout his career at Duke and other universities, Gopen has examined the problem of plagiarism in the academic context, and the ethical and pedagogical questions such a study would reveal.

In an article titled "Ripping Off Research" (Duke Magazine-Feb. 1992, by Stephen Nathans), Copen states, "Such an admittedly ugly subject demands attention." He adds, "There is a discrepancy between what we say about plagiarism and what we do in the real world."

It is hoped that through this symposium, members of the Washington College community can decipher this important "discrepancy." All students and faculty are greatly encouraged to attend this important meeting, as it will hopefully provide insight into the future improvement of academic honesty at WC.

Summer School Guidlines

Students interested in taking courses in summer school must complete a summer school permit. It is the students' responsibility to read and follow the guidelines and policies for taking summer school credits. Both the permit and a copy of the guidelines and policies for summer school can be obtained in the Office of the Registrar.

Pirate, River Explorer Coming to Chestertown

Two interpreters portraying an early eighteenth century Chesapeake Bay pirate and a seventeenth century river explorer trader will be performing and lecturing on the plaza in front of Casey Academic Center, Washington College at 1 p.m. on Sunday, April 5. Sponsored by the Washington College Historical Society, interpreters William Balderson and Carson Hudson represent Living History Associates, Ltd. of Richmond, Virginia, an independent organization which has supplied historical interpreters to Jamestown Island, the National Park Service, the Mariner's Museum in Newport News, and the Science Museum of Virginia. The event is also sponsored by the Joseph H. McLain Program in Environmental Studies and the Student Government Association.

The Chesapeake Bay, a center of commercial activity throughout Maryland's history, has also been the scene of turbulence wreaked by storms and human conflict. Dressed in appropriate regalia, the characters will demonstrate how traders and pirates perceived the Chesapeake Bay region and how they fit into the society of each time period. The goal of Living History Associates is to develop interactive programs between audiences and educated interpreters who enable history to become tangible and ‘alive.’ A natural, outdoor setting is the ideal backdrop for such a presentation. Audience participation will be encouraged following the main program. In case of inclement weather, the program will be held in the lobby of the Casey Academic Center.

Dedicated to promoting the history and culture of the Eastern Shore and the State of Maryland, the Washington College Historical Society is a two-year old organization eager to welcome new members. Any student interested in joining should contact President Cynthia Slaby at 778-9168 or Vice President Jenifer Grindle at 778-9324.

SGA Report

The Senate and Executive Board of the Washington College Student Government Association met in the Casey Academic Center Forum on Tuesday, March 31. The next meeting will be held on Tuesday, April 7 in the CAC Forum. Anyone is welcome to attend.

SAB Supports Min. 2.0 GPA for Graduation

The Student Academic Board met on Wednesday, April 1 at 7 p.m. in the Casey Academic Center to discuss the 2.0 GPA graduation requirement proposed by the Student Academic Council. The Academic Board voted to support the proposal to require graduating seniors to attain a minimum cumulative GPA of 2.0. The SAB suggested that this proposal, if implemented, should go into effect for the graduating class of 1994, the current sophomore class. The SAB also brought up a number of concerns which they would like the Academic Council to address when they discuss the minimum GPA proposal. These concerns included: "friendly" warnings to students whose cumulative GPA drops below a 2.2, and a more serious warning letter to students whose GPA drops below a 2.0, along with a letter home to parents.

The annual State of the Major reports are currently being prepared by the student representatives. SGA Vice President John Kelly, who chairs the SAB, will collate the reports and his report should be finished by May 1.

Constitutional Amendments

The proposed constitutional amendment to mandate a dress code for the SGA was tabled due to the absence of Senator Doug Peterson, who wrote the amendment.

Senator Will Phipps distributed a proposal to limit the number of excused absences which a dorm senator is permitted. Currently, the number of excused absences is unlimited.

Senator John Griep distributed a number of proposed changes to the SGA Constitution. His proposed amendments are concerned with SAB meetings and the selection of representatives, the SCC, the position(s) of social chair, the publicity committee, the appointment of Parliamentarian, and write-in votes.

Class Officer Elections

Senator Lee Russo announced that petitions for class officers will be available in Student Affairs on Friday, April 10. Petitions should be returned by Friday, April 17, and elections will be held on Wednesday, April 22.

Funding

The SGA allocated $500 to fund the hot air balloon rides on Saturday, April 11 from 8 a.m. to 11 a.m. $1 will be charged for each person.

The SGA allocated $2200 to fund Probable Cause, who will be performing at the Theta Chi Heineken Party on Saturday, April 4. The SGA and the Thetas will split the door receipts. The Washington College Dining Service will be in charge of alcohol sales.

$100 was allocated for the Chestertown Optimist Club. This group provides funding for charitable organizations in the Chestertown area.

The Senate approved $919.50 to help sponsor Awareness Week, which begins on Saturday, April 11 with a symposium on the proposed incinerator at the Aberdeen Proving Grounds. On Saturday evening, two bands will be performing. The Senate also approved $650 to fund one of these bands.

Campus Lighting

Senator John Phoebus reported that he took a night tour of the campus with President Trout to examine the problem of lighting on campus. The lights in the Reid Hall parking lot have been replaced and new lights were put up at the crosswalk. Lighting is still a problem between Minta Martin and Reid and near Cardinal.

Academic Dishonesty Surveys

Senators were reminded that all Washington College students will be asked to fill out a survey on academic dishonesty. SGA President Kevin Kelly strongly recommends that everyone fill out the surveys honestly.

and body."

Meanwhile, Vican and Swanson's dates approached a mall security guard and asked him to break up the fight. He allegedly stated, "The cops should be here soon" and made no effort to stop the brawl. The two women then found a telephone and called the police themselves.

At this point, an off-duty police officer appeared. He displayed his badge and shouted that he was a cop. Swanson said that he could also hear sirens coming closer. His assailants began to run and "I started to chase them. The cop grabbed my arm and stopped me. That was when I saw one of the guys pull a shotgun from his back seat." The suspects were able to drive away before the police arrived.

Vican and Swanson are currently considering the possibility of a lawsuit against the mall due to the inaction of the security guard.

Sioux Nation Claims War Bonnet in Library

here as part of this larger movement.

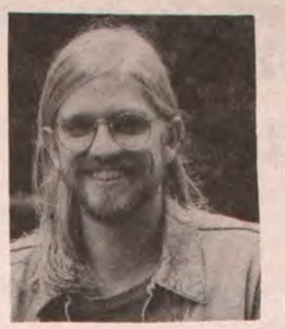
Dr. George Shivers, Professor of Spanish at WC, admits that in his twenty-three years of teaching, he has never seen the Native American items put to use. "It might be a good idea to return them," he says. "If we make a ceremony of the occasion, it would be a good educational experience for everyone."

In a telephone conversation Wednesday, Henson spoke with the ELM. "It is time for people to communicate in a humane way," he said, adding that returning Native American artifacts aids in the healing of our country's wounds. Because President Bush proclaimed 1992 as the year of the American Indian, Henson believes it would be an advantageous time and humane gesture to return the items to the Sioux nation.

Henson said that his wife contacted Marla Waters, the fifth member on the Executive Board of the Sioux Tribal Nation, to inform her of Washington College's possessions. Waters also spoke with the Elm on Wednesday and said that no one knew that Crazy Horse's war shirt and Chief Red Cloud's war bonnet were here. No formal decision has been made on the planned course of action. "I have to talk to the elders before we can do anything," she noted. Waters said that the Sioux Tribal Nation have reclaimed other artifacts and plan to build a museum and cultural center where the Battle of Wounded Knee took place, near Pine Ridge, South Dakota.

President Trout says that he is aware that the Sioux may want to reclaim some of the artifacts in WC's collection but claims that he has not yet had time to determine the origin of the gifts. He plans to contact the Director of the American Museum of Natural History in New York to get a better understanding of the issues involved in legitimate claims. He expects to have a reasonable answer should the Sioux Nation contact the college. "I am open and receptive to legitimate claims," he says.

Q: Should Washington College give the Native American Artifacts to the Sioux Nation?



"I think they should give the things back. We don't need them. If they're just gonna put them in some hidden, out of the way place, they may as well give them back. Now if President Trout were to wear them full time..."

Joe Hamilton, senior

"These artifacts are important to the college in that they serve to remind us of the fact that we are living on land which was once somebody else's. The preservation of such items in a conspicuous location frequented by non-Indians is as important as the maintenance of concentration camps in Germany."

Scott Koon, sophomore

"We should give them back if they ask for for them back. It's nice to have them in the library, after all. If we're going to keep them, we should put more focus on them, though."

Michael Mucha, sophomore

WASHINGTON

"I would like to see the items given to the Sioux Tribal Nation. We have no use for them here. If people would like to see Indian artifacts displayed, they could very well see them in a legitimate museum."

Franci Green, junior

"If the claims are indeed legitimate, then it would be a nice gesture to return them to the Sioux Indians for their intended museum."

Denise Marshall, sophomore

"We should give them back... in exchange for some hot Indian babes."

Adam Brown, junior

Self Defense Workshop

The Washington College Security Department and the Sophomore Class will be sponsoring self-defense workshops for 50-60 female students on Saturday, April 11 at 1 p.m. and Tuesday, April 14 at 7 p.m.

Interested students can sign up in the cafeteria next week.

Although the second workshop will build on some of the techniques taught on Saturday, students can elect to attend just one of the workshops.

Duane Dieter, a martial arts expert from Easton, MD, will be teaching the self-defense classes. Dieter taught a workshop last semester at Washington College which was sponsored by the President's Office. Although this workshop was poorly attended, students who did participate said that Dieter is an excellent instructor of self-defense techniques.

Racial Debate to Spark Controversy

The Debate Society of Washington College has chosen a decidedly controversial topic for their April 9 debate. The Motion, "This House Supports the Ku Klux Klan," is again a hypothetical one. Debate Society Chair Kate Absher wants to make it perfectly clear that the Society does not necessarily endorse the KKK or support its views. Absher is planning on trying to get two Klan menbers to debate against two Washington College students. "The only views we get of the KKK are through films like Mississippi Burning, and I think this would be a unique opportunity to hear both sides of the story," says Absher.

The debate is scheduled for next Thursday, April 9, at 8:00 p.m. in the Casey Academic Center Forum.

Student Profile: Tina McCuen

Tina L. McCuen is a Junior double major in German and Humanities. She is a three-semester Dean's List Student, with an approximate GPA of 3.76. A first-year RA in Queen Anne's, Tina can often be found in the Lit House, where she is an active Writers' Union member. Tina helped to formulate the idea for the Lit House Café, which is now run by Will Phipps.

Last summer she worked for the University of Delaware Center for Archaeological Research. She worked on-site at the dig with fellow WC students Justin Cann and Chris Mihavetz. On her return last fall, she was a guest speaker for the WC Intro to Anthropology classes, giving a presentation on her experience, complete with slides.

This summer, the Junior Fellows Society is sponsoring Tina in a summer study abroad program through Rutgers University. Tina will be studying in Germany, where she will be doing research for a project that she plans to spend some time completing. Her Humanities major concentrations are in Gender Studies, Anthropology, and English, and she will combine her studies of German with these fields to do research on how politics since the National Socialist (Nazi) movement have influenced the development of the masculine gender in Germany.

Tina's other activities include being President of the Anthropological Society, Treasurer of GALA, and member of the German Club. During her sophomore year, she volunteered at the Kent County Senior Center. She loves her German classes, her plants, and her two rats. After graduation, Tina would like to join the Peace Corps in Eastern Europe, or to go to graduate school to do further studies on issues of gender.

Special Report: Music at Washington College

This semester has seen quite a bit of activity from the Music Department, as well as from other areas of campus, when it comes to musical events. Besides the standby of the Concert Series, there are four separate Department-affiliated musical ensembles (Chamber Music Ensemble, which performed last Sunday; WC Jazz Band, WC Community Chorus, and Early Music Consort) with concerts this semester. The Drama Department is also getting into the act; Senior Shan Driscoll is directing Pippin, a musical drama production to go up later this month. Anywhere on campus, you're likely to walk through a dorm and hear some student practicing guitar or singing. This prevalence of student musical talent not only fuels the established ensembles on campus, but will be showcased in two open-mike sort of performances this month, one in the C-House and one open jam sponsored by the Drama Department to raise money for renovations to the Green Room (time TBA).

To call attention to the recent tuning of the campus towards more musical performances, I've collected four reviews of concerts that happened in the last week. John Blakelock's Senior Recital was the first Composition Recital since Kate Bennett of Cowboy Jazz graduated. The same night, John Marcus of Maintenance was thrown a benefit party in the Coffeehouse, starring "The Movies." Saturday night, I-House's Toga Party had a good party band for a good party. Last but not least, the Chamber Music Recital last Sunday was the perfect way to take a break on that lovely Sunday afternoon.

Following the reviews is a short cap of the upcoming music events for the month of April at Washington College.

Blakelock Lets the Music Do the Talking

By Dan Kretzer
Staff Writer

The heavy set, six foot one senior John Blakelock does not fit into the typical stereotype of the stuffy, wimpy, overdressed music major. Indeed, just the opposite. One might easily mistake the shabbily dressed, soft spoken Blakelock for just another local farmer who took a wrong turn and wandered onto campus. So perhaps some of the estimated hundred and fifty people who attended Blakelock's Senior Composition Recital on Friday, March 27, were quite pleasantly surprised. The show was comprised of twelve original works of music written by Blakelock, and it brought together some of the best musical performers in the area, including Blakelock himself.

Blakelock proved himself more versatile than a Swiss army knife, presenting a brass quintet, a woodwind quartet, a couple of vocal pieces, selections of electronic music, a euphonium (it's kind of like a tuba) solo and a number of show stopping piano pieces. His range of instruments was also quite impressive. He performed on the piano, with a euphonium and a guitar. Certainly there was a wide variety in the music presented.

The show opened up with the brass quintet composition entitled Tribute to Johannes Brahms. This piece was written in the style of twentieth century composers. While many shy away from this style because of its dissonance and atonality, Blakelock himself is a big fan and his emulation of the twentieth century composers was compelling.

Blakelock's vocal pieces displayed a mastery of both ends of the vocal scale, one for a bass and the other for a soprano. John Farr [Kathy Mills' husband] sang bass in the majestically tongue in cheek Emperor of Ice Cream [based on the Wallace Stevens poem]. The Music department's Ann Mathews provided her own delicate soprano voice for Henry Purcell, a Gerard Manley Hopkins poem put to music by Blakelock.

In the midst of the recital, the audience was treated to something they might not have expected. The lights went out and in complete darkness two selections of electronic music were played from a prerecorded tape. The first was entitled Exercise in Minimalism, an entertaining piece that I still can't get out of my head. The second was a tribute to Blakelock's favorite twentieth century composer called Sad Man Schönberg. Schönberg was a composer who never got the following that Blakelock believes he deserved, which perhaps explains the title of the piece. A picture of Schönberg graced the recital's advertising posters (he was the handsome devil on the left).

Blakelock's solo performances were some of the evening's highlights. His euphonium solo, Tom Hamilton, was a very creative work for an instrument that does not usually have solos written for it. In 5 Guitar Pieces, Blakelock showcased five short pieces that were the result of several months, or perhaps years, of playing and practicing. In the fifth piece, Blakelock had the audience laughing with delight as he loosened the strings and put a medicine bottle beneath them to lower tension and increase their length. The result was a guitar that played with a very unusual twang, and a song that pleased everyone. Blakelock's final solo, and the recital's finale, was an enraged and turbulent piano solo entitled The Burning Barn. This stormy piece ended with Blakelock slamming down on the piano with his hand.

Blakelock's most common form was the piano solo. Kathy Mills performed We Thank Thee Now Our God, and fellow student Mike Tyson joined Blakelock in 100 Beats, a piece that had the two pianists playing at the same time. But the most moving piano solo, and arguably the best piece in the recital, was Release No. 1 in A-flat Major. Blakelock wisely chose the talented Tyson to play this elegant and emotionally charged piece. When Release No. 1 finally had to come to an end, it seemed as though the audience would never stop applauding.

When the recital was finished, John Blakelock received a standing ovation. Known for his shyness, the blushing musician and composer came out for only one curtain call during which he gave the audience a look that said: "Aw, come on. You're embarrassing me." Backstage he was all smiles, basking in the compliments of friends and family who went back to congratulate him. Technically, the recital was a requirement for Blakelock's graduation, yet one couldn't help but feel that he enjoyed giving it just as much as the audience enjoyed hearing it. Blakelock, in my opinion, rates an En Passant.

"Movies" Reviewed

By Greg Hickman
Staff Writer

"The Movies" thundered through the Coffeehouse last Friday in a benefit concert for John Marcus, WC maintenance worker. The band gave such a butt-kicking performance that it was a shame that there were so few students present to enjoy the experience. "The Movies" were definitely a college band, playing classic rock tunes we all know, and even some newer "alternative" stuff which also appeals to a lot of us. The band had the full setup, which really rocked the foundations of the student center. Vocals passed easily from the bass player to the lead guitarist, and the harmonies were clear and consistent. No nasty shrieks from these guys; the group worked smoothly as an ensemble, enjoying themselves as much as we enjoyed them. Everything they played was very danceable, as witnessed by the diehard shakers out on the nearly empty dance floor. Attendance at C-house functions seems to have plummeted since the abolition of easy-to-get alcohol, and this is a shame. The alcohol has not been taken away from us entirely; it is still readily available in the Snack Bar. The CIA and Student Activities have booked some really good bands lately, including "The Movies" and others, all of which have given enjoyable, rockin' performances.

"Slam" Dancing

By J. Tarin Towers

"The Slam" played their first gig on Saturday night at I-House's Toga Party, and contrary to popular belief, they did it for free. Lauren Montenegro, last year's Liberal Arts valedictorian, happens to have a brother who plays bass, so WC happened to be the kickoff for this new band's career. "The Slam" is a bunch of College Park-types who have the uncanny ability to make any song sound like a Ramones original. One WC senior remarked that the band looks like their music. I suppose that this could be a compliment or insult for the band, depending on whether anyone really wants to look like the Ramones sound.

The drummer/lead singer, Carlos, kicked ass on many a tune, and he added to the effect by swinging his head around as if it were attached by a string while still playing the hell out of the drums and singing/screaming the lyrics. The strain of singing and drumming at the same time, à la Phil Collins on acid, is reported to be too much for the leader of the band, who reputedly plays every instrument at least as well as his bandmates.

Consequently, they're recruiting a new drummer, so that Carlos can play lead guitar, with their current guitarist filling in the rhythm guitar spot, now vacant. While it would be a crying shame to lose such a strong feature of the band (the drums), if Carlos can jam on guitar like he can on drums, then perhaps it would be a welcome change. At the I-House gig, the rhythm section was strong, loud, and clear, while the guitar served as fill, and the keyboards were barely audible.

This punk cover band also threw in a few (not bad) originals. Their repertoire included not just punk standards like Sex Pistols (three) and the Clash, but a hardcore version of "You Can't Always Get What You Want" by the Rolling Stones that started off the classic way, nice'n'slow, and then kicked into a slamdanceable (hence the band's name) three-minute thrash. They also pulled off a killer cover of "Grey Cell Green" by Ned's Atomic Dustbin. This band is definitely from the school of "who needs four chords," but their music was good to listen to, to dance to, and to drink to.

Chamber Music for the Masses

By Ciaran O'Keeffe

Despite the Chamber Music Recital being poorly attended, those few gathered in Norman James last Sunday witnessed a concert that was most enjoyable and enlightening. Flutes and their players abounded at this occasion with only one item on the program without flutes. Pieces ranged from the traditional Telemann and Händel to the not familiar Farrenc and Sammartini, finally ending with a brass quartet piece by the twentieth century composer Frackenpohl.

Each piece was performed well, with the various soloist sections being handled competently by all musicians. The mixture of ensembles helped to create an interesting chamber music array with my only disappointment being with the Händel Sonata in which we only heard two movements. Jennifer Nyman, Melissa Sirick and the rest of the ensemble entertained us so magnificently it was a shame to see them leave the stage so quickly.

Greg Hickman, once again, showed that his experience and competency with the flute placing him marginally above the other performers.

All performers, again, deserve an applause, and I encourage students of Washington College to take 30 minutes out of their schedule on a Sunday afternoon and come to these concerts. They are free and well worth the effort.

And NOW for Something Completely Different

By Deborah Boyer
Horsley Society President

Some last minute updates in regards to the "We Won't Go Back" March in Washington DC this Sunday the 5th, sponsored by the Margaret Horsley Society and Student Affairs:

The buses will be leaving from the parking lot next to the Casey Swim Center (behind Tawes Theatre) AT 7:00 a.m.; therefore, it would be wise to be there by at least 6:45 so that we can all be together on the same bus (We are sharing the two buses with the Kent County League of Women Voters).

As long as we have your ID Numbers, breakfast and lunch will be provided, box lunch style, by the WCDS. People with special eating habits (vegetarians, etc.) may want to bring their own food in case their needs are not accommodated.

This will be a long day, so people may want to consider bringing a bag for things to drag along, including the boxed food and drinks (and don't forget to account for the weather).

Marchers are urged to wear white, and if you have something white that has Washington College on it, that's all the better.

We of course would have liked everyone to go together, but knowing the impossibilities of that, we are encouraging all independent travellers to try and meet up with us so that we can all march together. Either follow the buses or meet up with us in Washington. There will be WC people on the front steps of the National Gallery (across the street from the mall and down to the right) until 11:00 a.m. Meet us there!

We encourage faculty/staff/students to all walk together. This is an opportunity for all-campus unity. A few faculty members have questioned this possibility and we will certainly try our best to get everyone together.

Brief Itinerary: 6:45 arrive to lot/ 7:00 departure/ get off at new Carrollton Metro Stop/ Take Metro to Smithsonian Station/ Gather on steps of National Gallery until 11:00/ Head to the Mall and get organized by NOW/ March starts at 12:00/ Leave rally and try to be back at buses by 4:30 - 5:00 so that we can get back to school by 6:30 - 7:00.

One more thing: bring a tennis ball, as many as you have, on which to write a message to the President and the Supreme Court. These balls will be deposited in front of the White House.

Sophie Kerr Prize

The Sophie Kerr Prize is awarded at Commencement to the senior deemed by the Sophie Kerr Committee to have "the best ability and promise for future fulfillment in the field of literary endeavor." Students wishing to submit samples of their writing are invited to do so. All submissions must be in the hands of the committee by the last day of classes and may be brought to the office of the Chairman of English Department for convenience and safe-keeping. Manuscripts will be returned to their owners after Commencement. All graduating seniors are eligible recipients of the award.

Anyone for Tennis, Wouldn't That Be Nice?

Women Netters Prove They Can Play Div. One

By Rachael Rice
Staff Writer

Another week of tennis action and Sophomore Pam Hendrickson remains unbeaten. Hendrickson, playing at #2, improved her record to 10-0 this week, while the team, notching two wins, including a victory against Division I Towson State University, improved to 6-4.

The Shorewomen blew into Gettysburg last Saturday to face their MAC arch-rivals, the Bullets. While high winds forced the ladies inside, only Senior Tracy Peel appeared disgruntled. "Cold, windy days are my absolute favorite playing conditions," commented Peel, who managed to shake off her disappointment and plaster Andrea Nichols at #1, 6-0, 6-0.

Hendrickson, who claimed that her heart was actually with the baseball team, managed to save a little for her own effort, knocking off Carrie Kendrick at #2, 6-2, 6-1. Miriam Dittmann, who has been playing the best tennis of her college career, gave up only five games in her rout of Mia Remis. Dittmann prevailed at #3, 6-3, 6-2.

The bottom half of the singles line-up has been struggling throughout the '92 season, as evidenced by their scores on Saturday. Jen Sloan faced Jeannie Ozanne at #4 and was bested 5-7, 1-6. Kristy Karns was stopped by Kristen Hall at #5, 0-6, 1-6. Rachael Rice outlasted Karns and Sloan but not her opponent. Barely recovered from the anguish suffered due to false rumors of a keg-draining incident, she dropped a tough 3-setter to Kelly Kane, 6-3, 4-6, 3-6.

The teams entered the doubles split at three matches apiece. Peel and Hendrickson handled Nichols and Kendrick easily, 6-2, 6-0. But Sloan and Karns, playing at #2 doubles, pulled off the win of the match, besting Ozanne and Hull, 6-4, 4-6, 6-2. Playing the best doubles they have all season, Sloan and Karns were able to shake off singles' losses and hang tough. Sloan commented "I owe this victory to all the extra attention the coaches have been giving me in practice, especially Todd Helbling." Rice and Dittmann also posted a win at #3, completing the 6-3 sweep of the Bullets and solidifying chances of a repeat MAC title.

Gettysburg was not the only victim of the Shorewomen this past week, as they handed the Division I Towson State Lady Tigers a defeat on Tuesday. Peel and Hendrickson each posted a 6-1, 6-0 victory. Peel blasted April Jourdan at #1 and Hendrickson bounced Laurie Morgan at #2. Dittmann played a hard-fought match at #3, but after 2 and a half hours, she finally succumbed to Terry Matthews, 7-7 (7-3), 4-6, 2-6. Sloan struggled at #4, losing to Jen Frank 0-6, 3-6. Diana Claussen faced similar troubles at #5, dropping two sets to Beth Flaks, 4-6, 1-6. Kristy Karns made quick work of Yana Karabelas at #6, 6-0, 6-1. When asked about her match, Karns replied, "I wasted no time out there. In fact, I don't waste anything."
Lee Russo helped the Shoremen along at #7, besting Erica Sully, 6-2, 7-6 (7-3).

The Shorewomen had to do their dirty work in the doubles once again. Peel and Hendrickson, playing at #1, trounced Jourdan and Flaks 2 and 2. Sloan and Karns did not fare so well at #2, losing to Matthews and Frank, 2-6, 1-6. Rice and Dittmann, in a hotly contested match, pulled off the Shorewoman victory at #3, branding Morgan and Erica Sully, 6-3, 6-0.
Coach Tim Grey claims that this is the most aggressive doubles he has seen out of his #3 team, but admits that the 5-4 wins have been "a little too close" for comfort.

The Women's team, who played Catholic at home on Thursday, will face Division II Millersville tomorrow at home at 11am. Grey believes the women have the potential to do well for the remainder of the season. "With hard work, determination, improved play at #4, #5, and #6, and most important, unity, the team can capture a second MAC victory and seriously vie for a bid to the Division III nationals. But unity is the key; the women know what they must do to succeed: go out there and play—and win—as a team."

Men's Tennis Starts Early in Quest for Nationals

By Doug Hoffberger
Staff Comedian (NOT!)

On Saturday, March 28, the Washington College Men's Tennis Team improved their modest record of 8-2, to a whopping 9-2 with a clean "Maryland Terrapin" like sweep over Ursinus. The win over Ursinus, which is located in the beautiful state of New Jersey, is the first win for the Shoremen within the MAC Southeast conference. Haverford, Johns Hopkins, and Widener are the remaining conference showdowns on the WAC Netters schedule.
The Shoremen, without the aid of two of their three top performance players, were still able to hold off the awesome, yet shallow, attack of Ursinus College, which, if I didn't mention before, is located in sunny New Jersey. The Shoremen's Frank Hartwig and Trevor Hurd were unable to overcome their injuries for this one, but should return soon to give the WAC Netters the depth that is commonplace within the Shoremen tennis program.
At the number one spot, the head honcho, the leader of the pack, the "big cheese", Alberto Diaz rolled over his opponent 6-1, 6-0. At number two, Emilio Bogato ousted Jed Levitas, 6-1, 6-3 while Carlos Nuno handily defeated Ursinus' Dave Miller by a score of 6-1, 6-0. Jeff Rexford was victorious at the fourth position as was Deepak Raja at the Fifth. And by the time Tim "BIRD" Reardon was finished toying with his opponent both teams decided to call it a day on account of the weather, apparently it was just too darn cold! Oh why oh why must April Fools come but once a year?
On March 30, the Shoremen defeated Haverford giving the Netters an overall record of 10-2, and an MAC southeast conference record of 2-0. Under the coaching masterminds of Tim Gray and Tom Finnegan the Shoremen were able to edge out Haverford by a 5-4 margin.
Alberto Diaz, due to mid-season shoreman injuries, has become very familiar with the number one position, or at least more familiar than his opponent who he beat in straight sets, 7-6, 7-5. Trevor Hurd remains undefeated this season in singles and doubles with a straight set win over Haverford's Santiago Gefford. This feat qualifies Trevor for the Walt Williams Div. 3 Tennis Hall of Fame—way to go Trevor! At the number three position, Emilio Bogato recorded the last singles win of the day for the Netters, beating Haverford's number three seed 6-1, 7-6. Carlos Nuno lost in three sets, the final score was 5-7, 7-6, 7-6 (18-16). At the fifth and sixth positions respectively, Andy Bohutinsky and Jeff Rexford came up short in two hard fought matches.
Entering the doubles portion of the match, Haverford and Washington were tied at three wins apiece. At first doubles, Alberto Diaz and Trevor Hurd spanked their opponents and taunted the relentless crowd in their 6-1, 6-1 victory. The score was now Washington College 4, Haverford 3.

Seeing the outcome of the singles matches, the masterminds of coaches Finnegan and Gray went to work pairing Diaz and Hurd together, number three seeded Bogato with number six seed Jeff Rexford, and Carlos Nuno with Andy Bohutinsky, two players full of vigor and doubles experience. The match went into a tie when the second doubles team of Bogato and Rexford were beaten 6-4, 6-2. However, the coaches cashed in when Carlos Nuno and Andy Bohutinsky reported their three set victory.

Half way through the season, the WAC Netters have their eyes fixed upon a return to nationals as well as another MAC title. A combination of good coaching and player confidence should lead the Shoremen to a stellar end of another winning season.

WC Athletes Attacked: Racism Hits Home and Hits Hard

By Charlie Linehan
Co-Sports Editor

Warning: The following article has nothing to do with Washington College athletics aside from the mention of two WC athletes.

Was anyone else upset by the announcement of the KKK rally planned for the anniversary of Martin Luther King Jr.'s assassination in Galena?

Was anyone else's stomach turned by the story of the "fight" between Mike Swanson and Darren Vican, and a group of 20 people last Friday night at a movie theatre in Dover?

Finally, did anyone feel really sick when, after hearing that Swanson and Vican's assailants were black, somebody turned to you with that 'I-told-you-so' look on their face and said, "Ain't that just like a bunch a niggers?"

Okay, first let me get one thing straight. As Mike Swanson will be the first to admit, he was just as much responsible for the start of that fight as was the guy that he was originally supposed to fight—but that's not the point. The point is that all three of these events are indicators of serious racial problems within our society—problems fueles by sheer ignorance. Down here on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, a KKK rally isn't such a surprising thing, at least not judging by what I've seen and heard during my past three years here at Washington College. Having grown up in New York City, seeing one or two white guys get beat down by twenty black guys (switch the races or mix them if you want—it happens all ways) isn't so unbelievable to me either. What's incredible is the ignorance which normally accompanies the aftermath of such incidents. Wouldn't a more appropriate comment to both the rally and the fight be, "Ain't that just like a bunch a cowards?"

I just got back from watching A Soldier's Story for film class. For those of you who have never seen it, it's about a black captain in the U.S. Army who goes to a training base down South to investigate the murder of a black Sergeant—a man who has taken it upon himself to initiate a Hitler-like purification of the black race; to get rid of what he considers to be the "singin', clownin', yassuh bossin'" element dragging his race down. Sorry to ruin the ending but, when the main character (Captain Davenport) finally catches the murderer, it turns out to be a black soldier whom we've grown to respect. By way of explanation, the soldier points out that the Sergeant was a terrible man. Davenport simply says, "Who gave you the right to judge?" and sends the soldier off to the stockade to await trial. The point is that Davenport doesn't take pity on the guilty man because he is an upstanding black man whose worst crime was to kill a low-down slimebag who would probably have been killed sooner or later anyway. Davenport's only objective is to see that justice is done. If a white man had committed the crime, Davenport would have done everything in his power to see that the man was punished. Race is not the issue. It's a question of right and wrong, and murder is just as wrong no matter what color your skin is. Period.

So what the hell does that have to do with the KKK and the Dover incident? Just this—Davenport did more towards ending racism by ignoring the color difference in people's skin than he could ever have done by letting the educated, upstanding, black murderer go free. The incident in Dover wasn't typical of black people, just like the upcoming KKK rally won't be typical of white people. Rather, both incidents are typical of a bunch of spineless individuals who suddenly find a kind of false courage when in the company of a group people like themselves. I don't have the answers to ending cowardice in this country but I know that dealing with incidents like these as typical of cowards goes a lot further towards improving American society than blaming the incident on the color of an individual's skin. The only way to achieve equality is to ignore race and simply assume equality, and that's the bottom line. In the aftermath of these incidents, shouldn't we be shaking our heads at the cowardly actions of a bunch of people who lack the courage to stand alone rather than wallowing in the ignorance of race bashing?

Women's LAX goes 1 – 1

The journey back from defeat can be a difficult one; but women's lacrosse proved they have what it takes to pull together and come out victorious. The score was 8-9 as the referee blew the whistle to signal the end of the first half—Washington trailed by one. But the Swarthmore team did not stand a chance as the Shorewomen raced to the field to secure ten more goals for an incredible second half come back. Not only did the lady laxers turn on the heat to defeat Swarthmore 18-9, but WC kept its opponent from scoring even one more point in the entire second half of the game.

Washington outshot Swarthmore 30-16 as Margaret Doyle and Amy McCleary scored six goals a piece. Kristy Hilgartner added four while Brigid DeVries and Kirsten Lucas each contributed one goal to the Shorewomen's first victory of the season last Thursday. Powerful assists came from Doyle with four, DeVries with three, Lucas with two, and McCurdy and Hilgartner each with one.

WC then went up against the mighty Ursinus team on Saturday, and while the Shorewomen's opponent led only by two at the end of the first half, Washington was unable to secure enough goals to come out with a win. Margaret Doyle remarked that, "the final score really didn't reflect our playing that day. I felt the team as a whole really worked well together." McCleary chalked up her first of four points with an assist from Lucas in the first seven minutes of the game, and returned the favor to Doyle to tie it up in the first half with eleven minutes remaining. WC also maintained draw control throughout the entire contest, but Ursinus came out on top to beat Washington 13-6.

Look for last Tuesday's contest against Western Maryland and this Saturday's game at Susquehanna in next week's issue. GO WAC!

Rugby Beats Arch Rival St. Mary's 14-6

By Brandon White
Staff Writer

This weekend the WC Rugby team went out to windy Worton Park and played arch rival St. Marys. Previously this year WC defeated St. Marys in the Severn River Invitational. WC took an early lead in the first half with two field goals by Shawn Hamill and a beautiful tri by Bill "Ice" Halagarda. At the half the score was 10-0. St. Marys rallied in the second half with a field goal to make it 10-3. WC came back with a tri by Peter "Stein" Hagan (his first tri in his rugby career). After the game Stein said, "We proved our dominance over St. Marys a second time. This win proved to be much more satisfying." Also on that day the B-side proved its dominance with a 10-0 win over St. Marys B-side.

This Saturday, at 1 p.m., the WC Ruggers take on Mt. St. Mary's away on their turf. It should be yet another tough battle for the boys of C-Town as they hopefully prove their worth once again.

Lax falls by narrow margin; Baseball wins big!

WC Sticks with Hobart

Pat "Stand Back I Think It's Still Alive" Lebowitz vies for a ground ball

By Melissa Harmeyer
Staff Writer

Due to the snow and poor field conditions up at Hobart College this weekend, the men's lacrosse team challenged the Statesmen, a team they have not beaten since 1985, in beautiful Ithaca, N.Y. on the modern day turf field of Cornell University. Last year Hobart arrived at Kibler Field and left with an easy 16-4 win and, although the losing streak stayed alive this year with Washington falling 11-7, Hobart had to work unexpectedly hard to be victorious in this one. Considering the Statesmen had lost to high caliber Division I Virginia by only 1 goal, Coach Corcoran was rather pleased with this year's Sho'men performance.

Hobart, leading 6-4 going into halftime, shortly became flustered when, with 9:12 remaining in the game, Sophomore Chris Sanchez nailed his second left handed shot of the game to put Washington within one, down only 8-7. However, when Washington lost their opportunity to tie the game late in the fourth period, the Statesmen high-scorer, James Patten, capitalized, scoring two goals to put Hobart up for good.

Defense seemed to be the key in this one as Senior All-American Kevin Doyle, with the help of Scott Overend, kept Hobart's two team leading scorers from finding the net all game. Behind the defensive wall, the cage was shut off by Toni Forti, who started in goal, and Freshman Bill Griffin, who substituted in for Forti and demonstrated his hidden talent with dazzling one on one snuffs. When it was all said and done, Griffin had compiled a total of 18 saves.

Offensively, the Shoremen scoring was spread out with Greg Lawler scoring two and Chris Cote, Jamie Carver, and Brian Flynn all contributing one a piece.

WC continues their schedule on Saturday with a home game against New Jersey based Drew University at 1:30 p.m. Come out and cheer 'em on at the Kib!!

Hey, it's the Bleacher Creatures. Go fix us a turkey pot pie! IN YER FACE!! Well, it's been a pretty tough week. We even found ourselves driving by convenience stores. . . that weren't on the way home --- Sorry, did you say somethin'?

Whoa, let's slow down a little bit here. Let's focus on the real STUDS (killer T.V. show) of the WEEK, the stylin' and profilin' pair from West Genny, sportin' the toe breakin', calf huggin' knee highs in the club lax game last Saturday. That's right folks, WC has found its very own Walt Williamesque, trend settin' athletes in the form of Benny Lamana and Joey Dell. Ladies, ladies. . . please. Now we know what you're thinkin'. What's their number? How can we get in touch with them? Well, we aren't really at liberty to say (778-5044). . . Hey easy Slash, don't think we forgot you. You eat hominy & grits, bob for apples, and wear grippers.

Speaking of hominy & grits, let's get to the Newt's POW. This one goes out to Big Burly Bill Griffin for his astounding performance against Hobart last weekend. Would you believe this kid hasn't stepped in the cage all season during a regular season game and he gets the nod unexpectedly, answering the call by stopping 18 shots over three quarters. And that ain't no April Fools Joke either folks. Keep up the good work!

Baseball Stays alive in MAC

Keith Whiteford, currently with a 1.20 E.R.A. and 32 stirkeouts, extended his winning streak last Saturday, leading the Shoremen to an 8-3 victory in the first game of their doubleheader against Haverford. But on this day much of the statistical brilliance came from the bat of Junior Joe Boan, who was 3-4 on the day with two doubles and three R.B.I. Boan, a standout all season for WC, leads the team in Home Runs and is also among the team batting average leaders with .270.

But neither Whiteford's arm or Boan's bat could save WC in the next game as the Fords came back with a vengeance, exposing the gaps in the Shoremen's spotty defense. Washington did nothing to help themselves at the plate either; loading the bases twice and failing to score any runs. Leaving men on base has been a problem for the team this year and meant a 13-1 loss in the second game of this double header.

Against Lincoln College Gerry Scully had his first collegiate start on the mound. And what a start it was. From the first pitch WC controlled the game. Rory Conway lead all hitters with four ribbies as Washington rolled to a 26-5 victory. The second game of this double header was almost a carbon copy as Jerry Hunt, also in his first start on the mound, aided in a 23-0 flogging of Lincoln. Offensively, Dan Coker hit 2-4 on the day with 5 R.B.I.. But the real story of the game was Than Parker who, in his first college at bat, hit a rocketing home run, announcing his arrival onto the college baseball scene with authority.

This Wednesday WC played at Ursinus winning 8-0 and 13-0,improving their overall record to 7-7. Right now they are 3-1 in the MAC Southeast and face Swarthmore away on Saturday, April 4.

Lacrosse Club Goes 2-0 in Weekend Games

By Brandon White
Staff Writer

Last Saturday the WC Lacrosse Club racked up its first win of the season against Ferrum State 24-8. WC took control early, leading 5-0 in the first five minutes of the game. They continued their domination through the entire match-up, rattling off 24 goals and allowing only 8. Four seemed to be the lucky number of the day as high scoring came from Chris Seymour, Matt Newkirk, and Matt Johnson, each with four goals.

The Club then returned on Sunday to face a much more competitive squad, Montgomery Rockville. Again, WAC took the early lead in the first ten minutes going up 5-0. By the end of the half, however, the Rockvillers rallied and came within one. Yet, to no avail, The Clubmen regrouped and tightened up its defense with the help of Paul Obrecht, Joe Dell, and Shawn Hamill. At that point the offense was able to take control of the game and glide to an impressive 17-10 victory.

Thanks to the support that came out last weekend. The Clubmen will return home in two weeks to face the Washington Lacrosse Club at home at 2:00. Hope to see you there!

Returning veterans Mike "Wiz" Hanifee (foreground) and Rory "Let's Griff" Conway (background) prepare to take on the "hot corner." This threatening dynamic-duo not only adds great defensive fielding but, they are also solid performers at the plate. Hanifee is batting a team leading .333 with Conway hitting a respectable .242. And with less than 1 error per game beteewn the two of them, they have proven their well-rounded capabilities.

Students and Community March for Choice in D.C.

On April 5, forty-three Washington College students, and forty-two people from the Kent County area attended the Pro-Choice March on Washington D.C. They went on two busses and a van provided by the Kent County League of Women Voters. "At least ten and probably more," students went to the March on their own, said Ramsey Bigham, the vice-president of the Margaret Horsley Society, a Washington College organization that supports womens' issues. The College and community marchers contributed to the 500,000 marchers estimated by the Park Service Police, and 750,000 estimated by the March's organizers, making this march one of the largest ever in Washington D.C.

"Students showed up without tickets hoping to get on the bus," said Deborah Boyer, the Margaret Horsley Society's president, amazed by the numbers of people who got up at 7:00 AM on a Sunday morning. "We didn't turn anybody away."

The Margaret Horsley Society and WC's Student Activities helped to defray the cost of the $10 bus tickets for Washington College students. The Margaret Horsley Society also provided sign materials for students to make their own signs, and organized obtaining box lunches for the marchers from the Dining Services. "With Ramsey Bigham and Abby Clifford, we were able to organize a successful trip with a great turnout and support," said Deborah Boyer of the pre-march preparations.

Betty Kerr of the the League of Women Voters, provided the busses, and gave a packet to each person on the busses. The packet included important information, such as the March route, pro-choice stickers and hand knitted headbands and armbands that read "PRO-CHOICE."

Many pre-printed signs said, "I Am the Face of Pro-Choice America," but many had their own original signs, such as, "Bush Stay Out of Mine!" and "Lesbians for Choice," and "If Men Could Get Pregnant, Abortion Would Be a Sacrament!"

In addition to organizing the bus trip for the community, the Kent County League of Women Voters and the Margaret Horsley Society collected about 350 signatures from the college community and about 125 from area residents. They presented these petitions to NARAL (National Abortion Rights Action League) which was one of the major sponsors of the March.

In the past, the Washington College community has been fairly active in pro-choice marches. In November of 1989, over forty Washington college students attended a march of 300,000 people in Washington D.C. Like the most recent marchers, they were confronted by Pro-Life activists who had set up a mock graveyard representing aborted fetuses.

The March route went from the Ellipse, where opening speeches were given, around the White House, where marchers were encouraged to throw tennis balls with Jim Palmer, member of the Major League Baseball Hall of Fame, and former pitcher for the Baltimore Orioles, will participate in the dedication of the Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center. On April 25 a ribbon-cutting ceremony will be held on Washington College's "Family Day" to officially open the center and honor those who contributed to the funding of the new building.

At eleven a.m., Maryland Governor Schaefer and Chestertown Mayor Horsey will deliver greetings to the families and friends of Washington College. Following opening remarks, Jim Palmer, Bob Maisel, and Tom Matte are scheduled to speak on the importance athletics have played in their lives. WC President Trout and Dean Taylor will also give speeches, recognizing Benjamin Johnson for raising funds for the new building. After the dedication ceremony, various athletics and cultural events are planned. The Rowing team hosts the Washington College Invitational, an event that will begin at ten a.m. at the college's Hynson Pavilion. At one o'clock, Women's Softball plays Western Maryland College, and Men's Baseball faces Widener University. The Men's Lacrosse team challenges Salisbury State at two o'clock. From ten to four, the Annual Spring Student Art Exhibition will be open, to be followed by the college's Luau, featuring the band Black Sheep, at the Pavilion. Capping the festive day's busy itinerary will be the Drama department's performance of the musical Pippin at Tawes Theatre.

KKK Debate Postponed, WC Admin. Cites Security Issue

By Jason Ronstadt
Staff Writer

Following the Ku Klux Klan rally in Galena last Saturday, April 4, Washington College students Kate Absher, Lionel Dyson, and Seth Engel collaborated to organize a debate concerning the KKK and its constitutional right to assemble. But the three students soon found themselves debating the school's administration for the right to hold such a function.

The problems began when members of the Washington College administration, particularly Dean McCintire, Dean Maxcy, and President Trout, learned that Absher had invited the Grand Wizard of the Cecil County KKK to attend the debate. The Klan leader accepted Absher's invitation on the grounds that he would be allowed to bring his entourage of bodyguards with him.

When news of the Grand Wizard's scheduled appearance broke, the school began receiving calls and comments from the NAACP, local minority leaders, and Washington College students, all expressing their concern for public safety. Dean Maxcy stated, "Frankly, much of our job as Deans at the college entails overseeing the safety of students on campus, and we felt we couldn't generate enough security in the short amount of time we had." Dawn Israel, a member of the Dale Adams Heritage Exchange Society, commented, "If the President's goal is to make the campus more diverse it would be contradictory to allow a group based on hate to come to campus."

The three debaters found themselves in the midst of some heated controversy, but this never dwindled their belief that the debate was a good idea. Said Kate Absher, "I was approached by several members of the Dale Adams Heritage Society.... [They felt that] bringing the KKK to campus was legitimizing them. It seemed that they would rather ignore it (racism)." Absher continued, saying of the administration, "They're a bunch of bureaucrats who can't do anything without taking ten months to prepare." Seth Engel, another debate coordinator said, "I believe the whole security thing is just a smokescreen. Following our meeting with the Deans I went to see the Mayor of Chestertown and he told me that it would be easy to provide ample security for the

Politically Correct Editorial

This week I was all set to blast the administration for their decision to "postpone" the Debate Society's scheduled debate titled, "This House Supports the Ku Klux Klan." I had my cap peeled back and that Casey-building editorial in front of me for inspiration. I mean I was practically frothing at the mouth for this one. But just the other day, a faculty member informed me that as editor of the school newspaper, I was, along with the SGA president, a student member of the administration. I was understandably shocked. Could this be possible? I immediately marched over to the Buntagon, Administration Control Center, where my greatest fear was confirmed by a smiling secretary. The ELM editor was indeed considered an official member of the Washington College Administration Society™ she informed me. How could this be? I asked the secretary. Selling out wasn't part of my job description. Mr. Attenasio, she replied, selling out was indeed a very important part of your job description, and an integral requirement for induction into the college's administration.

The secretary then escorted me into the office of a large man with a limp handshake who introduced himself as the director of administrative induction ceremonies. He had apparently just finished with Sparky, who left the office sporting an asphyxiated smile, muttering to himself, "I will not cause trouble, I will not cause trouble..." The large man then pulled a lever on his desk revealing a secret passage down to the basement. Follow me, he said, pointing down the damp, unlit passage. Granted I was nervous. But, like any good future administrator, I blindly followed him down this dark tunnel.

The large man informed me we were headed to the secret initiation headquarters. First I think we made a wrong turn and ended up on the old set of Frankenstein, but then I noticed some scrawling on the wall which read "Cater was Here," and I knew we were in the right place. In this room I was greeted by several gowned figures (no silly not the KKK) who were to perform my initiation. Greetings, they said, and welcome to the first of many inane, inept, boring, and pointless meetings you will be required to attend as an official administrator. They then asked me to assume the position.

I was then shackled to a sweaty brick wall at my wrists and ankles, toothpicks wedged between my eyelids to ensure, as they said, adequate attention throughout the process. Two cloaked men sat across from me smoking cigarettes. A ceiling fan slowly circled overhead, casting delayed shadows on the movie projection screen directly behind the table. I said, come on, this is a joke, right? Anytime now a couple of AO∏s are going to run out and spray us all with whipped cream or something, right? Just some sort of pledge joke involving the ELM editor, right? Wrong, Mr. Attenasio. This is no dream. No AO∏s will be in attendance.

A horn sounded from behind the screen. Another figure entered the room, nodded to the others, and began the initiation. He immediately removed my backbone and genitals, while presenting me with a second face. The two men behind the table rose from their seat and approached me. One turned the projector on while the other told me to raise my hand and repeat the secret oath. While "It's a Wonderful Life" showed on the screen before me, I was to repeat the secret oath, word for word, over and over, until I got it right. Then and only then would I be permitted into the exclusive society. The following is a few excerpts from that secret oath:

1). I, as an administrator, reserve the right to remain hypocritical on a continual basis. I will utilize this policy especially concerning previous remarks I have made in the ELM. For example, if someone asks me why I objected to this week's debate, "This House Supports the KKK," I will refer them to the April 3 issue in which I stated, "As an institution we are committed to the moral and legal principle that all members of our community enjoy the right of free speech even when the opinions expressed are very different from our own, or are perhaps abhorrent to us." If a student asks me why I made such a remark last week only to contradict myself this week, I will reply, because I am hypocrite, that's why.

2). At every possible opportunity, I will buckle under to pressure from special interest groups. In no way whatsoever will I ever make a stance besides the one I deem as politically correct.

3). I will do whatever I can to squelch any attempt by the student body to rise above their apathy. This includes any and all debate topics they feel pertinent and timely. If asked by a student why I reserve the right to such a policy, I will refer them back to pledge number two, the one that states I, as an administrator, buckle under to pressure from special interest groups.

4). As an administrator, I will not be able to juggle two thoughts in my head at the same time. This pledge again relates to the KKK debate in that I will not understand that just because students wish to debate such a topic in order to obtain a greater sense of awareness, not ignorance, that they also do not support such a disgusting stance as that of the KKK.

5). I will stretch, or even create excuses, to avoid such heated debate topics as "This House Supports the KKK." Even though I realize the need for intellectual discussions at WC, I will do whatever I can to postpone such an event to a later date, in the hopes it will be forgotten. Such excuses include stating adequate security could not be provided for such a debate, even though Chestertown's mayor stated he would guarantee "more than enough" security. But he, like myself, is an administrator, and cannot be trusted.

6). And last, but not least, I will write nice, politically correct editorials. Students do not understand that being an administrator is a no-win job in such situations as this debate.

Following this oath, I was allowed to leave. On my way out of the Buntagon, I remarked to myself how offensive that huge oil painting on the first floor would be to some people. You know the one of the bareback black man laying the cornerstone of Smith Hall while several white colonial-types stand above him, smiling. I thought those same people who opposed the debate would probably find offense in that symbolically placed painting. But knowing that seemed so fitting, and put a warm spot in my gut as the newest administrator at WC.

(We at the ELM would like to officially congratulate Bridgette on her recent decision to legally change her surname from Ferris to Winchester.)

In the summer he went without a shirt. He was a fat kid & he had only scabs where his nipples should be. One day someone asked him why he kept biting off his nipples, & he just smiled sheepishly.
Now, though, I think I understand him. He was too young to smoke, drink, or get a tattoo. He was one of those unexplainable breed that expresses themselves through destruction. Every child needs a badge of some sort, & every hero must be memorable.
You can call it self-mutalation. Call it a cry for help. Call it the despair of the drowning man, who, as he sinks, punches an innocent fish in the gills. But it was none of that. Letters to the Editor

Student Opposes Cancellation of KKK Debate

Dear Editor,

This is a letter in reponse to the unfortunate and distressing events that have taken place this past week at Washington College. As you may be aware, this past Thursday there was supposed to be a debate by members of the Washington College Debate Society. The topic of the debate was "This House Would Support The Ku Klux Klan". Many of you may have seen the posters advertising this debate, and I know of many people both on and off campus who were planning to attend. The timeliness of the debate was key; just this past Saturday the KKK held a march in nearby Galena. This march, combined with the racially motivated attack on two students the week before, had placed the issue of race and race-related problems squarely in front of the student population here at the WAC. For the first time in my four years here, the student apathy that we all detest vanished; people were talking about the incidents and discussing the problems behind closed doors. The student population was finally waking up to the reality that these problems existed- even in our ivory-towered setting.

Seizing the initiative, and boldly addressing the issue that nobody else would touch, Kate Absher, founder of the Debate Society, courageously planned to hold a debate on the issue. She did this under the impression that we in fact attended an institute of higher education, one where issues were free to be discussed in a reasonable and open forum, where all students could par-

Chlorine Gas Incinerator

To the Editor:

I am writing this letter as both a concerned citizen of Kent County as well as an alumnus of the College. Many of you like myself chose to attend Washington College because of its excellent reputation, but also because of its ideal location. Some of you like my husband and myself will choose to remain and make Kent County your home. Unfortunately in recent months Kent County's residents have learned of the United States Government's plan to dispose of thousands of tons of mustard gas at Aberdeen Proving Grounds. This plan will in essence destroy the peaceful way of life that has made Kent County so desirable to all of us. The Army has proposed to build an incinerator at Aberdeen (just six miles from Kent County) to dispose of the chemical weapons stockpiled there.

The incineration of mustard gas at Aberdeen poses a number of risks to all residents of Kent County. First, we will share the danger of adding mustard gas, a known carcinogen to our atmosphere.

Workshop Cited as Key Source in Footnoting Plagiarism Problem at WC

By Patrick Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

George Gopen, leader of last Friday's Workshop on Plagiarism, an event which took place in the Forum Room of Washington College's Casey Academic Center, prefaced the discussion with a story involving his first encounter with undergraduate academic dishonesty.

"I didn't realize how widespread the problem was until the early 1970s when I was a beginning professor of English at Loyola University in Chicago. Halfway through the semester, I suspected one of my students of foul-play on her paper. Rather than approaching that student personally, I made an announcement in class stating that I knew someone had plagiarized on the past paper, and if that person came to my office, then we could talk about it and maybe work something out. I expected just that one person, but to my horror, four students showed up at my door!"

Since that initial encounter, Gopen has dedicated much of his time as Director of the Writing Program at Duke University to solving the problem of academic dishonesty on the collegiate level. He presented his knowledge on the subject to a smattering of WC students and faculty members at Friday's symposium, both enlightening and surprising the audience with his discoveries.

According to Gopen, well over half of college undergraduates in the US practice academic dishonesty on a continual basis. "In fact," Gopen stated, "a recent Rutgers University survey revealed that 71.9 percent of Duke's 1991 graduating class admitted to some sort of wrongdoing in their four years of college."

So why is the problem so widespread amongst college undergraduates? Gopen believes the source of this question is rooted in the grammar and high-schools that produce these students. "In these systems," Gopen explained, "the teachers are overworked, and consider it good if students just hand in their work. Students are not told to think for themselves on their assignments. They are not properly schooled on the correct techniques of proper notation. Therefore, they feel the work they are assigned is intended to make them suffer. So, in their minds, it's morally alright to cheat against this suffering."

Many students are not even aware if and when they are acting dishonestly on an assignment. According to Gopen, ninety-two percent of Duke's student body did not consider it plagiarism if someone they knew gave them the paper, or if they incorporated some of their own work into it.

But, Gopen also noted the problem of plagiarism in not solely restricted to students. He witnesses it in the law profession (he is also a practicing lawyer), and even in the writings of college professors. "The fact is that almost every article published by college faculty members, if handed in on the undergraduate level, would be considered plagiarism." Gopen believes this is true because professors often confer with their colleagues on such articles, but never cite them as sources.

So what can college's do to lessen this problem amongst their student body? Gopen offered several practical, and immediate, solutions that, under his direction, have helped Duke reduce academic dishonesty by some eighty percent in the past four years.

1). Students should be taught how to properly acknowledge sources when writing their papers. To accomplish this, teachers should provide specific examples of plagiarism. They should not assume students are already aware of these forms.

2). All teachers should state on paper their policy concerning academic dishonesty.

3). College Ad-hoc committees on academic dishonesty should handle all acts of plagiarism swiftly, fairly, and even-handedly.

4). Learning institutions should move away from a competitive to a collaborative model. Students and faculty should feel like they are "all in this together." The teacher acts as the leader in the learning process. Therefore, students and their teachers will learn to learn together.

debate."

However, due to this concern with security, Absher called the KKK and the NAACP and told them not to come. She planned on having Washington College students debate both sides of the issue. But when she returned with this change in the format, the administration still said no, saying that the issue was "too emotionally charged." Seth Engel responded by saying, "That's the whole reason we wanted the debate now. Historically this campus has been somewhat apathetic to such an issue. We can't continue sweeping all of this under the carpet."

Caroline Housekeeper Injured:

Faces Physical and Financial Woes

By Chris Mihavetz
Staff Writer

One of the hardest working employees at Washington College was knocked out of commission recently. Karen Maitland, who has worked with the housekeeping staff for almost eleven years, fell from the porch of her Queen Street home on the morning of March 20 and badly injured her arm. She blamed the fall on the unseasonably cold weather that caused her front porch to ice over.

Ms. Maitland, with the permission of her family doctor, had already been working for a week with tendonitis in her left arm when she fell and did severe muscle and ligament damage to the same arm. "It seems like my arm's getting progressively worse," Ms. Maitland said, "it keeps swelling up and my doctor said the swelling should have gone down by now. Dr DuShuttle said surgery could be a possibility. If that happens I'm really going to be out of commission for a while."

Orthopedic and Sports Medicine specialist, Dr. R.P. DuShuttle M.D., told Ms. Maitland at an appointment last Wednesday that she would not be able to return to work for some time. Initially he advised her that she would be out of work for at least a month, but when Ms. Maitland complained that she would be receiving no income whatsoever during the bulk of that period, he said they would talk further in two weeks after he saw how the arm was progressing. Until then, however, returning to work is not a possibility for Ms. Maitland.

"It could be a minimum of one month before I'm able to return to work. I had five hours sick time and two and a half hours personal time, that's it, the end of my pay. I had one week's vacation left and I had to use that too. I'm on nothing right now- I'm totally without pay."

Ms. Maitland is more eager to return to work than most might be after an injury such as hers. Having recently separated from her husband, she is very concerned about keeping herself afloat financially. "I wouldn't care if I was getting the money, but I've got to keep my place going for my own sanity. I can't lose this place. It means so much, I mean I'm on my own and I'm doing everything by myself, it's really important to me."

"I mean I never thought I'd sit here and say that I want to go back to work, but I can't. When I went to the emergency room they gave me a paper to take back to the college that said I'd be off a minimum of five days. When they give you something like that, any doctor that is treating me will have to say that he has released me before the college can let me go back to work, that's college policy. I guess with the injury, if I go back and it gets worse I can hold the college responsible, I guess that's what they're saying. So until the doctor releases me from his care and says it's okay for me to go back, they can't allow me to come back to work."

Understandably, this entire incident has been a source of frustration for Ms. Maitland. "I keep getting mad at myself that I fell down. I get so angry because I finally had myself where I was living comfortably, not worrying about anything. Now I've fallen back in that same pit that I just pulled myself out of."

A number of students at Washington College have come to know Ms. Maitland personally. Her good nature and her willingness to listen and confide has made Ms. Maitland a campus favorite and she is usually visited during her lunchbreak in Caroline House by students. Currently, other members of the housekeeping staff are taking time out of their busy days to maintain Caroline while Ms. Maitland is out, and while the students seem perfectly content with the job being done, something is missing. One student remarked, "Caroline seems even uglier without Karen around."

The Board of Publications is now accepting applications for the position of
Editor-in-Chief
for the '92-'93 Washington College ELM. All letters of intent should be addressed to Chairman Richard DeProspo by April 17.

Klan Debate Axed

ticipate. Is that not what we are at college for? I did not come here to be coddled and insulated from the real world- quite the opposite. I came here to recieve the training necessary to be able to deal with the real world. In the real world racial problems exist, as they do here at campus. The difference is that out there they are not just swept under the rug. However, as Kate soon found out, the ugly question of Political Correctness became paramount. Students and staff, both minority and white, were upset by the topic. They felt "scared" of the notion of discussing the KKK. In fact, members of the Dale Adams Heritage Society actually approached Kate and called her an "animal" for even suggesting the debate. Members of this group complained to Student Affairs, and the Deans, not wanting to offened anyone, promptly forbid us from having the debate.

I was supposed to argue for the Klan with my friend Lionel Dyson. For those of you who don't know us, I am a Jewish-American and a registered Democrat. Lionel is an African-American. Obviously neither of us support the KKK. What we do support, and what was going to be the basis of our case, was that while we may not agree with the views of certain people, in this country there is a fundamental right to expression of opinion. No matter what these views may advocate, everyone in the United States of America has a right, guaranteed by the Constitution, to freely express their views. I believe that this right, as well as our right to freedom of assembly, is the most important part of our national heritage. Where would we be today without it? How many great authors and thinkers and politicians would have been silenced without it? It is easy to look at other countries in the world where this right does not exist. The old Soviet Union for example. Iran, for example. These countries try to control their citizens views. But this is the UNITED STATES OF AMERICA! It couldn't happen here!

Of course, I was wrong. The Deans said that there was not adequate security for this type of event; I talked to the Mayor of Chestertown, who was shocked that the school would prevent a debate like this, and he guaranteed that he would provide any extra security that the school might need. The other reason the Deans gave us was that "tensions were already too high" on campus concerning the issue. Couldn't we "wait until things cooled down"? Of course, that would defeat the purpose of the timing of the debate, which I mentioned before.

In the end it was apparant that various people, both students and staff, felt that it would be of detrimental value to the students to hold the debate. I think that that is just what hate groups like the KKK want- ignorance and apathy. Just sweep it under the rug- the problem will go away, right? Well, folks, it won't go away. It's time that we stopped being concerned about not offending people. What we need is EDUCATION. Those who oppose it are merely stooges for people like the KKK. If someone gets offended by the viewpoints expressed in such a debate, GREAT. Know what that means? It means they are THINKING about the problem. If that is not what college is for, then I don't know why any of us are here.

Truly Shocked,
Seth Engel

P.S.- Perhaps the topic of our next debate should be "This House Supports Mickey Mouse vs. Minnie Mouse", because that is what this college is in danger of becoming- a joke of an institution. Of course, we wouldn't want to piss off any radical feminist animal lovers out there, either.

Aberdeen Incinerator

In a county with an already staggering incidence of cancer, this threat alone is terrifying.

Second, there also exists the threat of an explosion or other type of accident during the operation of the incinerator. In a 1988 draft report study prepared by the United States Army, should a major accident occur at Aberdeen and assuming the most favorable weather conditions, they estimate 45,500 casualties. It is a very real possibility that you, a roommate or friend could be one of these casualties.

Third, in case of emergency, the citizens of Kent County will be evacuated through an emergency preparedness plan. In essence you will have to be prepared to leave at a moment's notice, whether in class, on the playing field, at a party or in a dorm, should you hear the alarms. Is this something you desire to deal with during your college career?

There are viable alternatives to incineration. Recent case studies have shown that an incinerator currently operated by the Army (Johnston Atoll in the Pacific) has been overbudget and ineffective in performing its task. For example, in an eighteen month period at Johnston Atoll, the emergency alarm requiring evacuation was sounded 145.8 times. In addition, the Army admitted that one leakage took them four days to confirm. One alternative which was discussed and rejected by the government was transporting the additional stockpiles to Johnston Atoll for incineration. However, the Army has entered into an agreement with the citizens surrounding that facility which bars them from further action there. (The stockpiles which were burned there were from Germany and Japan. Both countries requested that we remove our chemical weapons from their soil and dispose of them. The stockpiles were transported to Johnson Atoll for incineration.) Reasons cited for this action were concern for the area's citizens' health and also the marine life in this part of the Pacific. Isn't it ironic that a heavily populated area near the Chesapeake Bay should receive less concern?

We ask that you contact your state and national officials and voice your opposition to the construction of this and all incinerators for this purpose. In addition to Aberdeen, the Army proposes to build similar incinerators at seven other sites nationwide. In addition we hope that you will attend the April 11 symposium at Washington College on the incinerator. At that time, representatives from the Army, emergency preparedness office and opponents of the incinerator will voice their opinions on the issue. If you have any questions about the symposium or would like to help the citizens of Kent County defeat the incinerator, call 778-5968.

Sincerely,
Nancy K. Nunn

messages onto the lawn. Democratic Presidential hopefuls, Jerry Brown and Bill Clinton, as well as the Rev. Jesse Jackson and Jane Fonda were among the celebrities who led the March. It ended up on the Capitol End of the Mall where more speeches were given. Intermingled with the speeches were performances by Peter, Paul and Mary, who performed, "If I Had a Hammer," and Cindy Lauper, who performed a new song. WC Junior Gehrett Ellis described the march by saying, "There was an incredible feeling of unity. It also gave one a sense of worth."

Diving into the Wreck: Reflections on the March for Women's Lives

Bridgette Winchester[1]

Sunday April 4 at the March for Women's Lives my eyes swallowed combat-clad feminists, grandmothers, purple-headed hipsters, and fathers with kids slung on their backs, all brandishing signs reading, "Keep Your Rosaries Off My Ovaries," "Bush Stay Out of Mine," "Every Ejaculation Doesn't Deserve a Name," etc. A six-year-old boy screamed:

What do you want?

Throng: CHOICE!

Boy: When d'ya want it?

Throng: NOW! FOREVER!

Someone sounded a battle horn. The March had begun. We were drifting from the Ellipse toward Pennsylvania Ave., incited by a rousing "The Colors of My Womb" song by some unmemorable poetess. Before long, the chants died out as the procession slowed to a slug's pace. In forty-five minutes, we'd gained about 100 yards.

A rumor spread through the crowd that the March mapped out a new route, due to Anti-Choicers (or Pro-Lifers, take your pick) lying in the street before the White House. I never got that story confirmed—I just remember one man dodging tennis balls flying over the President's fence, bravely defending a forlorn Horton the Elephant and his slogan, "A person's a person no matter how small."

I was swimming amidst all kinds of people—but we weren't going anywhere. I saw the look of claustrophobia sneaking in their eyes and I thought of people getting trampled at City College, NYC at a recent rap concert, at soccer games in South America. What was I doing here? My disoriented band of friends and I sought a way out of the crowd but couldn't tell where the crowd began or where we could stop off and take a leak.

I turned and this frizzy red-headed veteran smiled at me. She works for Planned Parenthood in Topeka, Kansas and had run the lines last summer at Witchita when Operation Rescue demonstrated there. She looked weathered forty-three or forty-five and has a son about my age. She and forty others from Kansas came all the way for this. I never found out her name.

We made it past the White House, pulled over and watched. It was endless—people from Texas, Idaho, Wisconsin, Vermont, and New Jersey were all there. I turned again and looked at one of my closest friends and realized I came to the March for her.

I went for most of the women I know, who have all at one time or another had the scare of pregnancy needling their insides. There because I am here. My mother's younger than the Woman from Topeka but just as battle weary. She was my age when she chose to keep me.

One young impotent intellectual approached me after the March and gave me his commentary on his experience that day as a "passive activist." He probed me for my personal Weltanschauung. I told him I didn't hurl any tennis balls and I'm still digesting.

Balloon Launched at WC

This Saturday, April 10, from 7:00 a.m. until noon, a demonstration on hot-air ballooning will take place behind the Cardinal Dorms. Rainbow Balloon Adventures, owned and run by Bruce Fussellbaugh, will be setting up their balloon and offering tethered rides (weather permitting) as a part of their demonstration.

Mr. Fussellbaugh has entered in the Preakness Hot Air Balloon Race for the past few years, and frequently does promotions for area schools.

The reason for the early hours is that early morning is the best time to inflate a hot-air balloon and guarantee its getting off the ground. Students are needed to help set up and take down the equipment, and the entire college community is invited to come and enjoy this instructional and enjoyable event. The balloon expo is sponsored by the SGA/CIA. Raindate is April 12.

Student Profile: John Phoebus

John Phoebus is a Sophomore, double majoring in Philosophy and Political Science. He describes himself as a "basically boring person," but this is largely because he's involved in so many executive-type activities that he hardly has time for outside interests.

He's the Vice President of the Sophomore class, and is currently an SGA Senator. He was elected last month to be SGA Treasurer, and he'll be inducted on Tuesday. He received awards at the Student Leadership Ceremony for his work in these positions. His main activist role was one of safety; he has worked hard to establish an escort service, women's self-defense classes, and to improve lighting on campus. This concern for other students was the impetus for his being honored as a student leader, and he was also certified by B.U.I.L.D.

This summer, Phoebus hopes to be a volunteer intern in the Office of the State's Attorney in Somerset County, where he lives in Crisfield with his parents. He will probably also do waitering work at a local restaurant. The summer before his senior year, he would like to intern for the British Parliament and study with the Hansard Program of Great Britain. His tentative plans for after graduation include the possibility of graduate school for Law.

Phoebus is a continuous Dean's List student, with a GPA of 3.66. He is a REC Sports fanatic who plays in the softball league, as well as the basketball and soccer leagues. An avid "Trekkie," his other interests include playing guitar, piano, and trumpet. He adds that he always goes to breakfast when they feature his favorite tasty treat, scrapple (mmm).

Awareness Week

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

The big event this week is rather a series of events, one that offers something for everyone to get involved in, no matter what their interest. Awareness Day/Awareness Week is one of the biggest activist events on campus in recent memory. The list of speakers, musicians, and other activities is a large one, and the main calendar for the week has at least one thing scheduled every day from Saturday to Thursday.

The event was originally conceived by the WC Chapter of SANE/Freeze, the peace organization. They expanded their agenda from awareness of simply peace to include several organizations under the umbrella of awareness.

Participants include SANE/Freeze, WC Chapter; Hands Out; Amnesty International, WC Chapter; Margaret Horsley Society; GALA; Dale Adams Heritage Exchange; Psychology Club; Visual Artists' Union; Democratic Club; Goldstein Program in Public Affairs; Student Government Association; Shoe Strings Magazine; Infinity Recycling; and the Save Our Streams Co-op (Terra Firma, Kent Conservation, Chester River Association, the WC & Chestertown Community & MS SOS).

The Student organizers are Ann Veiga, George Jamison, Andrea Nolan, Rachel Fink, Jason Truax, Deb Boyer, Gehrett Ellis, Mary Holmes, Tarin Towers, and Kristin Coyne.

All Proceeds go to Pacem In Terris, a grass roots organization based in Delaware. They promote peace on the local and international levels, and have sent representatives to Northern Ireland and El Salvador. They serve as an umbrella for causes such as the environment and issues of race and gender.

Please check the calendars in this issue for the details on times and places for events for Awareness Day and Awareness Week.

The 40th-Anniversary season of the Washington College Concert Series concludes Monday, April 13th with a performance by the New York Woodwind Quintet, featuring pianist Gilbert Kalish.

For its own forty seasons, the New York Woodwind Quintet has maintained its position of pre-eminence in the field of chamber music. With more than twenty compositions written for and premiered by the Quintet, the group has made invaluable contributions in the expansion of repertoire for woodwinds.

Meatsa Meatsa, Tennis Tennis!

Men's Tennis Takes It to the Wire

By Doug Hoffberger
Staff Writer

The WAC Shoremen bolstered their record to an impressive 11-2 with a 7-2 victory over Vassar College last Wednesday. Both Frank Hartwig and Trevor Hurd, who were troubled by early season injuries, have now returned to the Netter line-up, giving the Shoremen coaches full advantage of their tennis roster. With Hartwig and Hurd settled back into the action, the Shoremen's line-up looks as follows: Frank Hartwig at the number one spot, Alberto Diaz at number two, Trevor Hurd at number three, Emilio Bogato at number 4, Carlos Nuno at number 5, and Andy Bohutinsky at number 6. The competitive and remaining roster which includes Jeff Rexford, Tim "Bird" Reardon, Deepak Raja, And John Alexander play according to the opponents, what the coaches want, and a number of other factors that inhibit more play for them, such as injuries.

Vassar, one of the weaker teams on the Shoremen schedule, gave the coaches a chance to give some more experience to some of the WAC newcomers gracing the courts this season. Against Vassar, the Netters made a clean sweep in singles, including Jeff Rexford's and John Alexander's exhibition matches.

In the doubles segment of the match, Carlos Nuno and Andy Bohutinsky were paired together and were victorious at the number one position. At the number two spot, Emilio Bogato and Jeff Rexford, who are familiar with one another's doubles play, surprisingly lost in a ten game pro-set, 10-5. Rounding out the doubles teams, were two freshmen, Nashvillite Deepak Raja and Rehobeth Beach, Delaware native John Alexander, who lost 10-4.

On April 5, the Shoremen travelled to Skidmore and returned with only their third loss on the season to move their record to 11-3. After the loss to twelfth ranked Skidmore,the Shoremen's chances for a return to National's are slim, a first for the Netters in four years. After decisively beating Skidmore last year 8-1, the Skidmore match was a large let down for the Shoremen. Coach Tim Gray was assertive in stating the fact that the loss of top '91 Shoremen Scott Reid and Irakli Metriveli has had some bearing on the Netter's performance this season. "The gain of Frank Hartwig, who still has one year of eligibility left, has been a great asset to the team, but we have to have our fourth, fifth and sixth singles positions step up their play..... We just have to work harder at those particular spots in which we are struggling in some of the bigger matches," commented Gray.

Still bothered by some mild pain in his arm, top Shoreman Frank Hartwig, who, until the match versus Vassar, had not played since March 14, lost in three sets, 6-4, 3-6, 7-6 (5). Alberto Diaz and Trevor Hurd, who occupy the second and third spots for the Netters respectively, produced the only two singles wins for the Shoremen. Although all the Shoremen's top six singles players have produced respectable records, Diaz and Hurd have remained strong all season with singles marks of 12-1 and 10-0 respectively. At the number four position, Emilio Bogato lost in straight sets 7-5, 6-4. At the number five seed, Shoreman Carlos Nuno played a tough match but came up short in the third loss of the day, 5-7, 7-5, 6-4. This season Carlos Nuno has had five matches that have gone to a third set, and has been victorious only one time out of those five. The other six matches produced straight set victories. At the number six position, co-captain Andy Bohutinsky lost 6-2, 6-2.

Entering the doubles segment, the Shoremen needed a clean sweep to take the overall win. Alberto Diaz and Trevor Hurd were paired at first doubles, Frank Hartwig and Emilio Bogato at second, and Carlos Nuno and Andy Bohutinsky at third. Serving for the match in the third set, Diaz and Hurd made some crucial mistakes and eventually reported their third set tie-breaker loss shortly before the second and third doubles teams for Washington had reported straight set wins. The Mighty Shoremen had lost and their was silence in Skidmoreville.

The men's next big match is versus Rochester away on Sunday April 12. The Shoremen must win the remainder of its matches and must defeat Rochester by a margin of 7-2 or greater. The NCAA Ranking Committee picks the top twelve teams in the country to go to Nationals and their decision is not based on record alone. There are politics involved as with any major NCAA decision. The fact that the Shoremen have been a frequent visitor and solid competitor in Nationals would be enough politics for me, but then again nobody asked my opinion, oh well.

Women Netter's Slay D II Millersville

By Racheal Rice
Staff Writer

When Millersville arrived in Chestertown this past Saturday, the women's tennis team proved its ability to compete on any level. The team soundly defeated its Division II opponent 7-2, and improved its record to 7-4. Assistant Coach Todd Helbling, who was acting-Head Coach in the absence of Coaches Gray and Finnegan, explained the importance of this tune-up match. "The team is heading into one of its most difficult stretches with matches against Elizabethtown, Dickinson, and Catholic all falling within a 4-day period. The women needed this win under their belts to get mentally prepared for some vital MAC and D3 opponents."

Much to Tracy Peel's dismay, the weather broke by match time this past Saturday, and conditions were warm with only a slight breeze blowing. However, she quickly shook off her disappointment and turned up the heat on her opponent, Tanya Hutsko. After her 6-2, 6-0 victory at #1, Peel was asked what accounted for her spirited play. "Well, I truly believe we have all been able to refocus upon the team concept. For instance, this morning we had a pre-match, team meal at Unruh's (pronounced OON-rooh's, Afrikaans for "Ellen's") Coffeeshop. I go out there to win for the team, and it drives me to play even harder."

P. J. Hendrickson took a little more time with Tina Genay at #2, but came off the court with a 6-3, 6-2 win. Miriam "Boom-Boom" Dittmann was again tough at #3, defeating Paige Sanai 6-1, 6-2. Last week's altercation with a Towson State opponent went unreported for fear of retaliation. Saturday's match was relatively uneventful due to few problems with scoring, line calls, positioning, or cries of "Relax!" to fuel Boom-Boom's anger.

Washington dropped its lone singles match at #4. Jennifer Sloan played a grueling two sets against Christi Welcher, but came up empty-handed. Although losing 3-6, 5-7, Sloan seemed certain she would have an opportunity to fulfill another Millersville conquest in the near future. "If faced by a further Millersville challenge, I will come out on top!" she exclaimed emphatically.

Diana Clausen, recovering from her 17th bout with illness this season, proved that she can find her way onto the tennis court as easily as to Health Services. Clausen dropped Gretchen Price at #5, 6-4, 6-2. Kristy Karns, who started her match a little late due to a malfunctioning racket "shock-buster," was also successful, defeating Julie Hambric at #6, 6-2, 6-2. Rachael Rice set a new college record, playing—and winning—three times in the same match. She defeated Abbe Alderfer at #7 and Sue Sweet at #8. When asked about the feat, she answered "I saw the challenge, there was no danger, so I took it."

The women continued to show their muscle in the doubles. Peel and Hendrickson paired at #1 to defeat Hutsko and Genay, 6-0, 6-0. Hendrickson likened the match to a "walk in the ballpark." Dittmann and Rice won by the same score at #3. Rice claimed that her partner was hitting the ball "like a shotgun . . . we tried to play intense tennis, dropping no games . . . reflecting on the match later that evening, we were very pleased with our performance." Karns and Sloan, filling the #2 slot, were unable to capture a victory. They went down 1-6, 3-6 after a short come-back in the second set. Coach Helbling expressed his pleasure with the win in his post game remarks: "The women have been working hard and this match proves it. They have been a pleasure to coach, and I genuinely look forward to every minute I spend with them."

The team faced Elizabethtown at home yesterday. (which will be covered next week) They will play Dickinson at 1pm tomorrow and Catholic University at 12 noon Sunday. Both matches are scheduled to take place at the WC tennis stadium facility. Next week the team will travel to meet MAC foes Western Maryland and Johns Hopkins, Tuesday and Thursday, respectively. Come out and support the netters!!

Spring begins as WAC Lax and Baseball Hit Mid-Stride

A Quick Guide to WC's Real Spring Sports

By Charlie Linehan & Chris Vaughn
Co-Sports Editors

Well folks, at the risk of jinxing ourselves, we think it's safe to say that Spring has finally arrived. Gone for another year are the deceptive days of pre-Spring weather:

"Have you been outside yet? What's the weather like?"

"Oh, it's nice out. I mean it's not summer yet but it's definitely warmer than yesterday . . . a little colder than Monday but still pretty nice. You might want to wear a sweater or something but then again you'd probably be okay like that."

Yeah right. Rough translation of that last sentence: I'm really excited for it to get warm around here so I'm trying to ignore the fact that it's barely over 35 degrees outside and convince you to wear shorts today so we can both look like idiots.

But that's all a thing of the past. Look at the facts, there's a lacrosse game today (Wed.) and not only is it not rainy and cold, it's not even threatening to rain—in the face of that uncharacteristic set of circumstances, who could possibly deny that Spring has finally arrived?

Okay, so Spring is here—what's the big deal? The big deal is that this is easily the best time of the year to be a Washington College student (not necessarily from an academic standpoint, but in terms of sheer enjoyment it doesn't get much better than this.) This is the time when professors start teaching class outside, when stereo speakers appear in the dorm windows to accompany the festivities on the lawns in front of the dorms, and when athletic event attendance doubles (to the dismay of professors teaching afternoon classes). And . . . most importantly, this marks the opening of what some would consider the real athletic season here at the WAC.

That's right, this past Tuesday at 2:15pm, one day after the historical opening day Orioles game at Camden Yards, the boys of Caroline (and assorted others) kicked off the Spring '92 stickball season in the newly renovated stadium located in the crux between the Queen Anne and Caroline dormitories.

For those of you who have never experienced an afternoon of stickball at Caroline Yards, well, you might say you've never really experienced the joys of warm weather at WC. The first and most important thing about the event is the incredible amount of junk talking which accompanies each game. If you can't talk junk, you may as well not even attempt to play. The second important thing is a player's ability to avoid the numerous natural obstacles dotting the field—There's nothing more surprising than going back for a short pop-up and ending up in the middle of one of the bushes lining the driveway. Third and finally, in the outfield, you must be capable of watching traffic and the batter simultaneously in order to avoid getting hit by a car during an over-zealous attempt to catch a flyball. Secondary to all that is one's actual attempt to win the game, which has more to do with luck than anything else.

For those of you who might not be into the Caroline scene, may we suggest a round of campus golf? This favorite pasttime of many a Washington College Alumn tees off at hole #1 on Somerset's front lawn and, heading north, follows a counter-clockwise course around campus and back to Somerset's front door. Not only are the greens fees free, but this sport is probably the best way to catch a tan on campus and, if you utilize the pocket on your golf bag correctly, it's probably the best way to catch a buzz as well. In addition, you may want to familiarize yourselves with the course in preparation for the May Day festvities in which Ted Greeley and Dave Taibl have promised to carry on the golf tradition started by illustrious '91 grads, Greg Ruppert and Matt Petz.

Finally, for those of you lacking the stamina for a game of golf, we have always found WC croquet to be a popular sport. Now we must admit, Spiderman and the Vaughnster have not engaged in a good croquet match-up since freshman year but ohhh the memories we have. If you are looking for a nice relaxing, in fact, soothing sport this is a game for you. Set up the wickets, grab a mallet, and off you go. We recommend the well maintained grass course in front of Somerset. (the place Spidey and The Vaughnster lost their croquet virginity.)

Of course, if Spring Fever has really got you, we're always looking for a tough and rugged battle on the caps court. So, step to us and bring it on!!

Last Saturday, out on The Kib, the ninth-ranked Washington College Shoremen soundly defeated visiting Drew University, 15-6. Against the Rangers, the Sophomores and Freshmen took control of this one, tallying forty-eight attempted shots on goal. The combined efforts of Chris Cote, Jason Paige, Chris Sanchez, and freshman Greg Lawler led the attack, scoring thirteen of the fifteen goals.

Brian Flynn, another Sophomore, began the scoring brigade three minutes into the first quarter which sparked a six goal run for WC to put the Shoremen ahead 7-0 by the middle of the second period. The rout continued into the second half. Early into the third period the team took advantage of a Rangers penalty when Chris Cote scored off a pass from Jason Paige in the extra man situation. Lawler, also in the third quarter, took a couple more stabs and stung another two which put Washington ahead 10-3.

During the fourth quarter, the Rangers tried to make a run of their own, consecutively scoring three goals within eight minutes to diminish Washington's lead. But Paige answered back with two goals as did Cote with one of his own, crushing any chance at all for Drew.

Freshman Bill Griffin proved his abilities once again in the goal in his second appearance, saving seven attempted shots by the Rangers. On the defensive side Senior Kevin Doyle, Junior Scott Overend, and Sophomore Dave Ratta exhibited why the Shoremen are a team that should not be underestimated. Tim Riggins and Jerry Davis also demonstrated their defensive abilities during Saturday's game.

Washington faced MAC foe Swarthmore College this past Wednesday on Kibler and have a tough match against 10th ranked Franklin and Marshall tomorrow. Don't miss 'em and look for the coverage next week!

Baseball Rolls On As They Head For The Final Stretch

By Jason Ronstadt

Last week the Washington College Baseball team traveled north to Swarthmore Pennsylvania for a doubleheader against Swarthmore College. In the first of the two games the Shoremen started strong. John "Beast" Morall picked up two R.B.I.'s in the third inning by hitting an inside the park home run to center field with. The offense rolled on in the fifth inning as Mike Hanifee, Dan "Motion Man" Coker, and Gerry "The mack daddy'll make ya" Scully all drove in runs. But all this offense ended up amounting to a 11-7 loss as the Shoremen defense struggled. Said Coach Athey, "We played very sloppily on the defensive side, and it wasn't even poor pitching. Our guys just made too many errors." This would seem the case as five of the eleven runs Swarthmore scored were unearned.

Losing in such a fashion did nothing else but anger Athey's resilient bunch. The team rallied in the second game behind ace pitcher Keith Whiteford who posted seven strikeouts on the day. Said Coach Athey of Whiteford, whose E.R.A. now stands at 0.41, "You can really see the team's temperament change when Keith is on the mound. Everyone out there on the field believes with out a doubt we'll win the ball game." Coach Athey was also quick to credit the leadership of Co-Captains John Morrall and Vinnie Sanudo. Said Athey of the duo, "John has been consistant behind the plate and Vinnie seems to lead us by example every day. He has yet to make an error this year and time and time again has played well when injured." On this day, the team's spirit and effort payed off as Whiteford walked away with a 3-2 victory over the Swarthmore Garnets, boosting their record in the MAC Southeast to 4-2.

This Tuesday the team split a doubleheader with the University of Maryland Eastern Shore. Coverage of those games and the team's up and coming battle with JHU this Saturday will be covered next week. JHU and Widener on April 25, the last remaining MAC bouts, are part of the final six home games this year and will be the deciding factors for the team's chance at an MAC championship. So don't miss what could be THE TEAM OF THE YEAR!

Amy McCleary snags one in mid air while streaking past a defender

By Renee Guckert

The Shorewomen faced another tough loss last Tuesday (9-17) when they travelled to Western Maryland College. While Washington maintained draw control at midfield and beat their opponents when racing to recover ground balls, it just wasn't enough to hold off the Western Maryland squad. Margaret Doyle secured four goals and two assists, Kristy Hilgartner had three goals, and Amy McCleary had two goals and two assists.

However, every cloud has a silver lining. After losing to Western Maryland, the Shorewomen travelled to Susquehanna University to secure their second season victory. Just 2:26 into the game, mid-fielder Amy McCleary, unassisted, powered the first bullet into the upper left-hand corner of the goal past Susquehanna goalie Christi Butcher. Then, a mere thirteen seconds later, McCleary fed a pass to Margaret Doyle who proceeded to score her nineteenth goal of the season.

Despite the fact that Washington led 4-2 at the half, Susquehanna fired up in the second period, scoring three goals in a row. But Washington goalie Nancy Millhouser continued to make save after save as Brigid DeVries, Megan McCurdy, and Jessica Hall led the defense on interceptions and ground ball control. In the meantime, Kirsten Lucas, with an assist from center Kristy Hilgartner, led the attack back on its path to victory with 19:24 left to play. Following two more Susquehanna goals, the dynamic duo of Doyle and McCleary worked the ball down the field and into the net for the second time.

Finally, with only 2:35 remaining in the second period, Doyle fired once again, this time on a free position, to break the tie and ultimately give Washington the win, 8-7. Brigid DeVries commented, "it was a hard game both mentally and physically, but we pulled out a win by relying on each other as well as the fundamentals." Eleanor Shriver also revealed that "our transitions—the mid-field play—needs to be stronger, but wins are sometimes hard to come by. Even though the score was only 8-7, a win is a win, and I think the team was happy with it." Way to go Shorewomen. Keep up the good work!!

Spring is finally here and so are The Bleacher Creatures, right in your face--Chaa Ching! Before we get busy we'd like to start with a small, very small, commendation to our lovely and talented Editor-In-Chief. Not only can he write (yeah right) but apparently, at least from what Pat says, he can catch as well. Of course no one really witnessed this amazing softball grab, which he described to us in finite detail, but we're willing to give him a little poetic license on this one. Hell, we figured, at least he's got that going for him, which is nice . . .

O.K. wait. Now what? Oh yeah, that's right, Newt's POW! Not only is this week's choice a stud librarian, a prolific aid to Spanish students, and a world reknowned smoother mover, Ohhhh Alberto "Why don't you attempt to return this Serve VO5" Diaz is one of WC's best players on the court. He has taken on the position as team captain and filled both the #1 spot, while Frank Hartwig was injured, and the #2 spot with confidence while going practically undefeated this season with 13 singles wins and 9 doubles victories already. Says assistant coach Todd Helbling, "Alberto is one of the toughest competitors on the team. He gives it 100 percent at every match and he leaves it all on the court. In addition, he consistently boosts the spirit of the rest of the team and keeps them going strong. We are very happy that he is only a junior and look forward to seeing the good things he will do next year." Good Job VO5!!!

Softball Off to a Rocky Start

Well folks, it's been a rough early season for the WAC Softballers. Due to some pre-season injuries, the Washington College softball team has made several adjustments. Junior transfer Leeann Steuer, the Shorewomen's catcher, has been placed on the injured reserve list indefinitely, pending the recovery of her injured shoulder. Nikki Goenaga, another Junior transfer, has moved behind the plate to cover for the ailing Steuer. Senior Co-Captain Marie "DaaaCru-sher!" Mohler has moved to shortstop from her original position as centerfielder. Junior Jen Rupert has replaced Mohler in centerfield, while Freshman Denise Coleman has made the adjustment to fill Rupert's void in rightfield.

Despite these necessary but unexpected adjustments, the Washington College softball team is working quite hard. The Shorewomen opened their season against Franklin and Marshall, one of the team's toughest opponents. Senior Co-Captain Edna Diefenderfer (Sorry—Did you say something?) showed a superior effort on the mound in their 5-2 loss. Quite the team player, Diefenderfer has made a great transition from shortstop to pitcher. Washington outhit F&M 8-6, receiving outstanding offensive power from Coleman, Mohler, Goenaga, Hastings, and Rupert. Mohler remarked, "With F&M as one of our toughest opponents, coming out of our first game with a loss of 5-2 is something to be proud of and is an indication of the strength of this team and the things to come."

The team has also played Cecil Community College, Lebanon Valley, Gettysburg, and Swarthmore. The Shorewomen came close to a victory in the Swarthmore game, losing by only two runs.

Their season record is not indicative of the team's capabilities. Mohler adds, "With some players in unfamiliar territory, we are working hard to adjust and continue on with our game. We have a tight defense and with a little more confidence at the plate, along with warm weather, the scoreboard will be more indicative of the heart and skill behind this team. The ability is there. We just need to pull it all together as a team."

Come out and support the team at their next home game on the back field across the railroad tracks on Wednesday, April 22nd against Wesley!

"Toxic Incineration on the Chesapeake Bay:" Hundreds Attend Symposium at WC

By John C. Griep
News Editor

A public symposium on "Toxic Incineration on the Chesapeake Bay: A Public Dilemma" was held at Tawes Theatre on Saturday, April 11. The symposium was sponsored by the Goldstein Program in Public Affairs and McLain Program in Environmental Studies and organized by a group of concerned citizens from Kent and surrounding counties to examine the issues surrounding the proposed construction of a chemical weapons incinerator at Aberdeen Proving Grounds. Over 500 citizens attended the symposium.

The United States Army has already constructed one chemical weapons incinerator, which is currently operating on Johnson Atoll in the Pacific Ocean. Various chemical weapons agents are being incinerated at the Johnson Atoll Chemical Disposal System (JACADS). A second incinerator is being built at Tooele, Utah, where "over 42%" of the U.S stockpile resides. Incinerators are also planned for seven other domestic sites which house various chemical weapons agents.

Dr. J. David Newell, Professor and Chair of the Department of Philosophy and Religion, was the moderator for the symposium, which was divided into two sessions. The panelists for the morning session, which ran from 10 a.m. until noon, were Charles Baronian, Deputy Program Manager and Technical Director of Chemical Demilitarization at Aberdeen Proving Grounds, David McMillion, Director of the MD Emergency Management Agency, Pat Costner, Director of Research and Technical Studies for Greenpeace, and Craig Williams, Director of the Kentucky Environmental Foundation and Common Ground.

In his opening remarks, Baronian commented, "I think we can all agree that the chemical weapons stockpile is no longer wanted, no longer necessary and needs to be gotten rid of. The stockpile sits, it exists, and it represents a threat. And if we can get rid of that threat, once and for all, safely and environmentally sound, I think all of us can support that goal. The United States is trying to take the lead in ridding the world of chemical weapons."

Baronian stated that Aberdeen Proving Grounds currently contains about 5% of the U.S. stockpile of chemical weapons. The only chemical weapon stored at Aberdeen is mustard agent, which is stored outdoors in one-ton containers. "Mustard is a lethal, highly carcinogenic chemical weapon used in World War I, now prohibited by international treaty." (The actual number of containers stored at APG is classified.) Baronian pointed out that the "largest risk [from the chemicals at Aberdeen], according to the programmatic EIS (environmental impact statement), was associated with transportation, followed by do nothing, or continued storage, followed by ... demilitarization." A fact sheet which was distributed by a citizen's group stated, "The Army has estimated that as many as 42,000 casualties could occur in the event of a serious chemical leak or spill at Aberdeen." Baronian stated, "those 42,000 deaths came from the programmatic EIS and they are associated with the transportation option."

The programmatic EIS was completed in 1988, at which time the Army determined that on-site incineration was the best option. Baronian remarked that the Army will perform another programmatic EIS, which will examine the operating data from the JACADS incinerator, before making any final decisions for Aberdeen. For this second study, the Army will ask themselves: "If I knew then, 1988, what I know now, 1992, would I have reached the same conclusion about the environmentally preferable alternative? If the answer to that is yes, then the Army plans to create an environmental impact statement, site specific, implementing that decision. If the answer to that question is no, we'll stop and re-open alternatives."

Addressing possible alternatives to incineration, Baronian stated that the Army has asked the National Academy of Sciences to appoint a team of experts to look at new technology. Some alternatives to incineration which will be examined by the National Academy include: neutralization, biodegradation, supercritical water oxidation, molten salt, ultraviolet, and plasma reactors.

McMillion stated, "I live in Maryland and I want to make sure that we're doing everything we can to be prepared in the unlikely event of an incident at Aberdeen. . . . We have individuals in emergency management on standby 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, 365 days a year." The

Newell Resigns As Graduate Program Director

By Amanda Burt
Staff Writer

After seventeen years as Director of the Graduate Program at Washington College, Dr. J. David Newell has resigned from his position in an effort to strengthen his commitment to undergraduate activities. He will continue to direct the twenty year old program until his current contract expires in August.

When Newell was appointed as Chair of the Department of Philosophy and Religion in 1987, he immediately began to feel the conflict between his undergraduate and graduate duties. "I made a sincere effort at doing both administrative jobs at once, but with a full-time teaching load, I knew it would only be a matter of time and I would have to choose," he says.

Though Newell claims that he enjoyed his associations with the Graduate Program and wishes it well, he is anxious to devote himself more fully to the needs and interests of the Philosophy Department. "I came here to teach philosophy to undergraduates. That is where my heart is and that is where it has always been," he notes.

He feels confident that he is leaving a solid foundation for the next Director, as a special Task Force on Graduate Education just completed a six-month study revealing that the program at WC is in good health. While Newell chaired the Task Force, other members included previous and current students of the program, faculty members from each area of graduate study as well as one faculty member who does not teach in the program, and a representative from the Registrar's Office.

Four different questionnaires were developed according to recommendations from the Administrative, Faculty, Alumni, and Current Student subcommittees of the Task Force and were then administered by Helen Kerr of of the Office of Institutional Research. Faculty members, certain administrative officials, recent graduates, and enrolled students of the program were all asked to respond.

After the raw data was simultaneously submitted to the Task Force and Dean's Office, separate reports were filed by Gene Hessey, Senior Vice President for Management and Finance, and Dr. Jack Hamiltion, WC's Registrar. A final report was sent via the Dean's Office to the Academic Affairs Committee of the Board of Visitors and Governors, which is currently reviewing the report's recommendations.

The report, which will serve as a basis for the Middle States self-survey to be completed next year, provides a means by which to strengthen the Graduate Program. Some recommendations include expanding the number of degree programs offered and the formation of a Graduate Student Affairs Committee that would consider the possibility of creating a lounge and organizing social activities for graduate students. In addition, the report suggested that the governance of graduate students be more fully integrated with that of the college.

Dr. John B. Taylor, Acting Provost and Dean of the College, says that it is too early to determine who Newell's replacement will be, but he claims that the decision will be made in light of the report's recommendations. "I would hope that a decision would be made by the end of the Spring Semester," he says, "but it depends on who is interested."

Newell is only the third director of the Graduate Program, which was created in the early seventies in order to provide a a curriculum of study for area teachers needing advance professional certification and graduate credit. Professor Thomas McHugh, who headed the Education Department, developed the program in the early seventies. When he left WC to accept a position at Vassar College in New York, Dwight Kirkpatrick, Chair of the Psychology Department at the time, assumed McHugh's position. Kirkpatrick found the work overwhelming and resigned after one year. Newell was then appointed as Director.

The Graduate Program at WC currently offers Master of Arts degrees in Psychology, English, and History/Social Science, as well as selected topics in Education.

This Editorial Supports the Aberdeen Incinerator

With the current status of the KKK debate permanently in limbo, the ELM decided to present one of its own. This unofficial debate, moderated by Pat, Justin, and Griep, took place in the ELM office at 4 am on Thurs. morning. We originally planned on including members of the radical environmental group EARTHFIRST! in this discussion, but the administration squelched that idea, stating adequate security could not be provided in case these revolutionaries attempted to sabotage the college's valuable construction equipment. In their place we present three alternative speakers: Justin Jersey will debate for the proposed incinerator; Luna Stacks and John Talbot, Jr. will debate against the incinerator.

Justin Jersey, Pres., Comm. for the Mutation and Retardation of All Living Species (MoRALS)

You Eastern Shore types wouldn't know progress if it swam up to you and knocked you off your skipjack. First you didn't want Rt. 95 cutting through your sacred farmlands. Then you got excited about a proposed nuclear power plant. And now you're up in arms about the Aberdeen Incinerator. Well hello, and welcome to the twentieth century!

Of course this project is dangerous. Sure it'll kill people, or worse yet, make their lives a living hell. We've seen such results at the Johnson Atoll Incinerator in the Pacific. But I'm here to tell you, those people were also skeptical at first, until they realized the benefits such a project offered. Today, if asked whether or not they wanted their incinerator removed, I'm sure the Pacific survivors would reply, 'no way!'

They say the Eastern Shore of Maryland is God's Country. Well if that's the case, then God wants an incinerator. He's looking out for you as is the military on this one. Just think of the benefits. Besides the jobs created for the actual construction of the project, thousands more will develop in local health-care facilities. New hospitals, evacuation sites, and rescue squads will need to be built, along with ambulance repair shops and medical supply depots. New communities will spring up virtually overnight. Physicians, first-aid instructors, and scores of nurses will move into the area, thus increasing the demand for housing. With them will come their children, who can then be educated on the hazards of mustard gas incineration in their brand new, state of the art school system, funded exclusively by the US Army and government.

I say the incinerator is just the shot-in-the-ass this region needs. Sure some people are going to die. But, whoever survives the initial holocaust will ensure a strong, adaptive gene pool for generations of future Watermen to come. Put aside your fishing poles, midnight strolls, and unpolluted rivers. Realize your future and that of the Eastern Shore rests on the approval of the incinerator. Don't let your fears get in the way of progress.

Luna Stacks, Students Against Death (S.A.D.)

The Aberdeen Mustard Gas Incinerator threatens the existence of life on earth. Excess mustard gas could severely damage the microlayer of the Chesapeake Bay. This thin layer on the surface of the water provides the largest fraction of atmospheric oxygen. Ecological stresses are already accumulating on the microlayer from other pollutants and increased UV radiation.

This microlayer is also one of the most important carbon-fixing ecosystems. If this layer were to be severely damaged or destroyed altogether, we would not only face a depletion of oxygen, but an increase in atmoshperic $C0_2$, a greenhouse gas. The rest of the Chesapeake Bay would feel the effects of losing this most important primary producer.

Even if the microlayer were to survive escaped gas, the rest of the Bay ecosystem would still feel the effects. Mustard gas would be found in ambient levels in phytoplankton, the major component of the microlayer, but would be more concentrated in the zooplankton and filter feeders that feed on them. The mustard gas would be even more concentrated in higher order predators, the fish and crabs that many humans eat. This process is called "biological magnification". Mustard gas is a known carcinogen. Go ahead, eat that carcinogenic Callinectes sapidus.

Even if the incinerator works properly and releases no mustard gas, it would emit dioxins into the atmosphere. The process of "biological magnification" would also apply to these dioxins. In humans, as well as fish, dioxins cause cancer, reproductive defects, and damage to immune systems.

The Army has a duty to investigate every other disposal possibility before considering such a clearly dangerous option as incineration, especially on the shores of the already ecologically wounded Bay. This horrible agent of warfare should never have been made in the first place, but now we must do our best to dispose of it safely. The Army made this mess, and they should dispose of it, but they also should take every ecological and safety factor into consideration. The mustard gas has been at Aberdeen for a long time, and it can stay there until some safe means of destroying it can be found.

John Talbot, Jr., Pres. of Eastern Shore Citizens Against Pollution Emissions (E.S.C.A.P.E.)

Maryland has the highest cancer rates in the U. S. and the Shore has the highest rates in the state. We oppose any chemical weapon detoxification program which may increase the risk of cancer in the region. According to the April 7, 1992 edition of Rachel's Hazardous Waste News, "Officials of EPA and private research scientists now admit that hazardous waste incinerators emit hundreds of times more dioxins and other toxic air pollutants than is allowed by EPA regulations. . . . Scientists employed by [the] U.S. EPA admitted last month that modern hazardous waste incinerators simply cannot comply with existing federal regulations because they cannot destroy all chemicals with 99.99% destruction/removal efficiency, the efficiency required by federal law." "Aberdeen Proving Grounds and Edgewood have two Superfund sites.... Such sites continuously release some amount of toxic vapor into the atmosphere."

Our group is opposed to all pollution emissions from the military-industrial complex based on the western shore of the Chesapeake Bay. Very little heavy industry is based on the Eastern Shore of Maryland and we feel it is unfair for our children to have to breathe the pollution of those dirty Baltimorons. We are already putting up with excessive automobile emissions from unwanted beach-goers, which damages our wonderful forests and cropland, why should we put up with even more noxious, toxic air pollutants from the other side of the bridge? Keep your toxins in your own backyard and out of our Bay!!

Debate over KKK Debate Continues

Dear Editor:

This letter is in response to Mr. Seth Engel's uninformed letter to the editor which appeared in last week's ELM. First of all, we should make it clear that members of the Dale Adams Heritage Exchange were not uniform in their opinion of whether or not the Ku Klux Klan should come to campus. True, members of our group did confront Ms. Kate Absher about their idea of bringing the Ku Klux Klan to campus, but we did so individually. We went to her with individual complaints, not complaints which were representative of the group's beliefs. Our President, Ms. India Henson, stated in our meeting that this issue was very delicate and she said that everyone should follow their individual opinions. That's exactly what we did. Some of our members agreed that the Ku Klux Klan had the Constitutional right to speak, and some were even preparing to come to the debate. However, I, Dawn Israel, started a petition that would keep the Ku Klux Klan off the campus. This was an individual effort and the Dale Adams Heritage Exchange had NOTHING to do

Dear Editor,

It has been rumoured that President Trout has called me "stupid" in suggesting a debate on the Ku Klux Klan. A member of the faculty has also supposedly commented, "What is a twenty-year-old student doing organizing such a debate anyway?" Furthermore, Dean McIntire accused me of being "frivolous" in attempting to hold a debate on the KKK.

In this letter I would like to discuss my alleged "stupidity," frivolity," and "youth" and defend myself against these

Correction

In the article, "Oriole Legend to Dedicate New LFC," that appeared in last week's ELM, it was reported that Jim Palmer, Bob Maisel and Tom Matte would speak at the April 25th dedication of the Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center. They have been invited to speak at the Donor Preview Dinner on Friday, April 24th. Washington College is currently awaiting confirmation from Governor Schaefer and Mayor Horsey, who have been invited to speak at the dedication ceremony on Saturday, April 25th.

The ELM sincerely regrets any confusion that arose as the result of this article.

Chemical Weapons Incinerator Proposed for Aberdeen

state agency ensures that local and state emergency response personnel are adequately trained to meet any possible catastrophes. Local and state agencies must develop plans to deal with disasters and must engage in regular training sessions to demonstrate their responsiveness. "In 1988, the studies indicated that continued storage posed a threat to the communities around the stockpiles. Subsequent to that, the Army and FEMA (the Federal Emergency Management Agency), came to an agreement ... that FEMA would provide resources to the state and local jurisdictions in assisting us in improving our emergency preparedness plan."

McMillion described the sequence of events that would go into effect if an incident took place at Aberdeen. Local and state emergency response plans, which have already been developed and approved, would go into effect. A recently installed telephone "hotline" system would immediately and simultaneously transmit information to state and local officials. "If evacuation is determined necessary by local officials, then you would be notified through various alert systems. . . ."

McMillion concluded by encouraging everyone to participate on the local emergency planning committees.

Costner remarked, "Greenpeace and the Army, specifically Charles Baronian, agree that the obsolete chemical weapons stock must be demilitarized. I would define that as having its potential as chemical weapons eliminated. It must be demilitarized and it must be detoxified and disposed of. It is the detoxification and disposal aspect that Greenpeace . . . and I believe the scientific information and the Army's experience at Johnson Atoll . . . all would attest to the fact that incineration is wholly inappropriate for detoxification."

Costner also stated, "No incinerator works 100%. . . . One concern, that was not well addressed at Johnson Atoll, and which has not been well addressed at any hazardous waste incinerator, is the problem of products of incomplete combustion. You always get products of incomplete combustion." Costner was also concerned with the monitoring and detection systems at JACADS. "These monitoring systems are highly unreliable."

Costner concluded by commenting, "I would say that experience with JACADS shows the same experience we're seeing with every other hazardous waste incinerator in the country in that this technology is simply inappropriate for the disposal of either hazardous waste or nerve agent."

The final speaker for the morning session was Craig Williams. Williams is currently involved in a fight against the construction of a similar incinerator in Madison County, Kentucky. Speaking of the Army, Williams said, "The reality, or better yet, the mentality, of imposing their will on the people has not changed. What has transpired now, over the years, is quite simple. A policy decision has been reached and no one within the bureaucracy that formulated the policy is willing to reconsider or adapt to concerns of the people who should have been part of the decision-making process from the beginning. . . . The decision to use incineration as a baseline technology is a perfect example of what we in Kentucky call 'backend thinking' . . . . The solution was decided upon and, ever since, the studies have been tailored to fit the decision."

"The people here in Kent County, as recently as four years ago, stopped the siting of a municipal waste incinerator in your community. . . . Now you are faced with a similar situation, but the stakes are considerably higher. Not only must we consider the dangers of incinerating a known cancer-causing substance, but we must . . . consider the potential for decades of continued use of this facility, should it ever be constructed." The Army is currently barred from using the facilities after the chemical weapons stockpiles are eliminated, however, as Williams pointed out, "the law could easily be changed."

"It is apparent that every aspect of our lives and lifestyles will be affected if this program is allowed to continue on its present course . . . . Whether you are concerned about your health or that of your family . . . whether you are concerned about your environment in general . . . or if you are just scared to death by the prospect of burning chemical weapons in your neighborhood, it is imperative that you get involved in this effort to stop this rush to burn."

Following Williams' remarks, Dr. Newell departed slightly from the program and invited Congressmen Wayne Gilchrest and Tom McMillen to speak. Gilchrest told the crowd that he introduced a bill, H.R. 4975, "which would ban incineration of chemical weapons in the continental United States until the Secretary of the Army certifies to the Congress that alternatives have been thoroughly evaluated. Although the Army studied methods of chemical disposal in 1988 and found incineration the preferred method, the technologies to dispose of hazardous waste have developed rapidly since then. It only makes sense to take a good, hard look at the applicability of these alternatives before we charge ahead with incineration." McMillen stated that he is "strongly opposed to an incinerator at Aberdeen. I have studied this proposal and have reviewed the technical arguments, but I remain unconvinced that adequate scientific research has been completed to sufficiently answer the questions which surround incinerator emissions and human health." Both men stated the need to work together on this issue.

Gilchrest and McMillen were followed by questions from the floor. Carla Massoni, president of the Kent County Council of PTAs, stated "We've been very concerned about the cancer rate on the Eastern Shore. Maryland has the highest cancer rates in the United States and the Eastern Shore has the highest rates in the state. What I am concerned about is whether the Army studies have looked at the cancer risk of the incinerator on the Eastern Shore in particular."

Baronian responded that the Army, with expert advice from the Department of Health and Human Services and EPA, has developed a "safe exposure level considering the carcinogenic properties [of mustard]." He then introduced a doctor from APG, who stated that risk assessment studies by EPA and other organizations found a neglible risk for cancer from the incineration of mustard at Aberdeen. The doctor also stated that the EPA uses the most sensitive segments of the population when computing their risk assessments. The risk assessment studies are based on optimum operation of the incerator.

The panelists for the afternoon session were Robert Perciasepe, Secretary of the MD Department of the Environment (MDE), Peter Montague, Research Director of the D.C.-based Environmental Research Foundation, and Charles Bracelin Flood, author and representative of Concerned Citizens of Madison County, Kentucky.

Perciasepe outlined the department's role in the process of demilitarization. The position of the state Department of the Environment "has been to review each situation on its own merits. . . . We feel that public health and safety are paramount." Although the department does not have a final position on the proposed incinerator, Perciasepe stated, "I want to make it clear that we are asking and have been asking the same questions that are of concern to everyone else and we expect to see the answers when we get the program analysis of this project."

Dr. Peter Montague discussed the ethical considerations surrounding the proposed incinerator. Montague stated that "the decisions that you allow to be made here . . . will be impacting people all across the United States and in fact in other parts of the world." According to Montague, the incineration of mustard gas can result in stack emissions of dioxin, which is "a truly nasty molecule . . . much nastier than mustard gas, and unfortunately it's going to be created by the machine that's intended to get rid of the mustard gas." The danger of dioxin exposure includes cancer, reproductive and developmental defects, and damage to the immune system. Montague also argued that public health programs should follow a policy of prevention, not "catch up." "What is the solution to this problem?" Montague asked. "Prevention. Prevent the incinerator from being built. Montague concluded his presentation with the projection of a cartoon which stated, "If you think you are too small to make a difference, then you have never been in bed with a mosquito."

Charles Bracelin Flood also spoke about the efforts of the Concerned Citizens of Madison County to fight a proposed incinerator at the Lexington-Bluegrass Military Depot in Richmond, Kentucky. Flood stated, "Until now, we in the bluegrass region of Kentucky, have been the leaders of this struggle. . . . Nothing would please me more than to see the citizens of your beautiful, environmentally fragile Chesapeake Bay area surpass all that we have done." Flood then outlined what the citizens of Madison County had accomplished in the last 8 years. "At the outset, we were naive. We really believed that we could make the Army change its decision to incinerate. . . ."

Flood remarked that the U.S. Congress is in charge of the Army and that pressure should be put on Congress to put a stop to incinerator construction. "Ironically, this issue, which should be decided by safety considerations, may well be determined by the cost associated with the incineration experience." According to Flood, the estimated costs for the chemical weapons disposal program have skyrocketed from $1.7 billion in 1984 to $7.9 billion. Flood concluded by stating, "Welcome to the fight. There is no doubt that we will prevail."

with the petition. The petition never even reached Student Affairs or other administrators. In discussing this issue with Reverend Cordell Hunter, President of the local N.A.A.C.P., India was informed that President Trout had written a formal letter, long before this debate was arranged, to Rev. Hunter saying that the Ku Klux Klan, would not be allowed on campus for any reason. That, perhaps is one of the primary reasons why the Ku Klux Klan was denied admission on the college campus by the administration; IT WAS NOT MY PETITION! Actually, we do not know why the administration cancelled the debate, even after the Ku Klux Klan would not be in attendance. We had nothing to do with this decision. Even those who were afraid to go to the Debate because of the presence of the Ku Klux Klan, would have willingly come to discuss the ideologies and the inhumane acts of the Ku Klux Klan.

Furthermore, Dale Adams Heritage Exchange has no problem discussing racial issues. As a matter of fact, we highly suggest that students participate in these sort of discussions. However, SOME of us felt that bringing the Ku Klux Klan on campus would be detrimental, and was not the only way these issues could be discussed. Some might say that this fear is not legitimate. This is far from true. You may not understand this fear, but it is not an ignorant one. Unless you are a target of their hatred, and unless you have been horrified with stories that your parents and grandparents have told you about what they've had to endure, then of course you don't understand. But, because one doesn't understand, one should not call a perfectly legitimate fear irrational.

I, Dawn Israel, was one of the few who felt that the presence of the Ku Klux Klan would be dangerous for most minorities, if not all, involved. Mr. Engel, you are wrong. I would love for the college community to assemble and discuss the Ku Klux Klan, the Neo-Nazis or racism in general. In fact, racism is a topic in much need of discussion. We know what the Ku Klux Klan believes: they hate people because of their color, their religion, their creed or their sexual preference. Yes, I think it's pertinent that people know that they exist, however it is also very important for people to understand the covert racism that is present here at Washington College, as well as all over the world.

So, if you want to discuss racial issues, then let's get together and arrange something. The Dale Adams Heritage Exchange would be more than happy to oblige you and the rest of the Debate Society.

Debate Society President Clarifies Situation

allegations. I will do so by discussing why I began the Washington College debating society; why I chose the Klan as the society's third topic for debate, and how I planned to organize the proposed debate.

I will begin my defense at the beginning. Last year I attended St. Andrews University in Scotland under the auspices of Washington College's junior year abroad program. St. Andrews University houses a thriving social and club life. The school year begins with a club fair in their equivalent to our gymnasium. At this fair each club was allotted a table in which to advertise the activities of their club and tempt students to join their organization. Practically every student was involved in a club — whether it was the wine tasting club, the Scottish reel society, the mountaineering club, or a host of others. Surprisingly, I suppose to some, this fair was organized by St. Andrews students and each club was run by the students.

Furthermore, every two years St. Andrews held a week long arts festival where plays, concerts, art exhibitions, and films were held around the clock. Also surprisingly enough this festival was completely run and mostly participated in by students. In fact last year a twenty-year-old female student organized the festival.

I am thoroughly convinced that because the students ran the social and intellectual life outside the classroom at St. Andrews that the life there, in the words of one of my Scottish friends, was and is "absolutely brilliant." During my year at St. Andrews, I never saw a top administrator, but what I did see were students administrating and passionately involved in the university.

As some may guess, I joined the St. Andrews debating society. The society met weekly and debated international, national, and university-related issues. For a university in a country deeply divided by class and ancestry, the debates were extremely healthy for the campus and the community. Communists, Socialists, Liberals, Labourites, Conservatives all came together and argued political issues in the form of a debate.

Upon returning to the United States, I thought Washington College, deeply divided by cliques and income brackets, would also greatly benefit from a debating society. Our first two debates on the Greek system and on the rise in tuition were somewhat successful. Yet I learned from the Greek debate that a debate composed entirely of the opposition is an unequal, one-sided debate.

Therefore, when the issue of the Klan presented itself as a highly relevant and controversial topic, the need for the extreme right, specifically members of the Klan, was felt necessary for the debate. It is stated in the Washington College debating society's constitution that only students are allowed to debate at the tables, and only students were debating at the KKK debate. However, when the floor was to be opened up for general discussion, two members of the Klan, and I stress the adjective two, where invited to be among the audience. Two members of the NAACP were also invited to attend.

Upon final decision of the debate topic on the Klan, I and my committee believed it necessary to have the presence of security at the debate. I myself personally called and talked to members of the State Police who assured me that whether the debate was held two months from now or two days from now they could provide adequate security. Seth Engel also called Mayor Horsey who also promised security upon request. Therefore, I would like to argue that security was not an overwhelming factor governing the administration's decision to cancel or "postpone" the debate.

The overall factor in the administration's decision to squelch our debate was that the issue to be discussed was too controversial and was opposed by a faction of the student body, faculty, and administration. The reasons the administration opposed the debate were the reasons why I chose the debate. Racism is ignored on this campus. Yet every time a student enters the dining hall and is served his meals, racism is present. I thought by choosing a sensational topic such as the KKK might awaken students to the questions of race and civil rights they have become hardened to.

My generation did not experience the Civil Rights Movement nor the race riots that succeeded it. As a child, the Klan was a hooded figure out of Roots. Through this experience I have learned the KKK are men with a very warped philosophy, yet a philosophy that should be examined and understood if racism is ever to end.

Librarian Discusses Klan

To the Editor,

As one of those opposed to some aspects of the Debate Society's proposed topic "This House would support the Klan," I would like to throw some possible light on the cause for such opposition. First let me say that I recognize and respect the right to freedom of speech guaranteed by the Constitution and I am not opposed to a debate on the Ku Klux Klan among students. What I objected to was having this debate against the Klan as was first proposed and further modified to have Klan members in the audience by invitation. This situation though, bold and courageous would seriously jeopardize the safety of members of the community. To say that adequate protection would have been provided and that the fear was unwarranted is to ignore the history and activities of the Klan. To insist that the only issue here is freedom of speech is to deny the other rights which the Constitution guarantees to individuals.

The Ku Klux Klan has been in existence since the 1860's and their history and activities have been amply documented. Many of their atrocities were levied against Blacks as well as Whites. If the Washington College community needs a debate in the presence of the Klan to teach them a first hand lesson on racism then we definitely need to redefine the process of education. It seems to me that the planners of the debate either have little knowledge of Klan activities; no experience, even vicariously, with Klan activities; or they are being led by an illusion of grandeur. The illusion in thinking that by inviting Klan members to the college and through an intellectual academic exercise in the form of a debate, they can expose the ignorance and atrocities of the Klan without any opposition. The illusion in believing that the embarrassment of their cause and position would force them to leave shamefully accepting defeat. The illusion that this bold initiative would drive the Klan from Chestertown and its environs while at the same time bringing about the enlightenment of Washington College students. Again, I refer you to the history and activities of the Ku Klux Klan.

As I listen to the various arguments around campus or take a closer look at Seth Engel's letter I wonder what that debate would have been like. It seems that most of the arguments revolved around freedom of speech, fear of open discussion, and the need to stop being concerned about offending people. The real issue of racism seemed to have gotten lost in the shuffle. Racism is not easily forgotten or swept under the rug. It is a too frequent experience for many people of many races. There are many ways of educating people about the subject. Racism has been here for hundreds of years and it is unlikely that it will vanish overnight whether we ignore it or face it bravely with such a debate. If Mr. Engel can be so arrogant in his denouncement of those who oppose the debate as "stooges for people like the KKK," I wonder how he would handle the objection of the Grand Wizard to a Jew and an African American, "who obviously oppose the Klan," arguing objectively or factually for his side.

"Sparky" Hands Over the Gavel: New Executive Board Takes Office

The newly elected SGA Executive Board members were sworn in by outgoing SGA President Kevin "Sparky" Kelly. After the brief ceremony, the former executive board members made brief comments to the Senate and then made their exit from the Casey building. Kelly stated that he felt a bit of "regret" at leaving his position after one-and-a-half years as SGA President. It was announced that Amy McCleary would not be able to fulfill her duties as Secretary. Kristen Kujawski, who received the second largest share of the votes for the position, was appointed to fill McCleary's seat. This appointment was approved unanimously by the Senate. Bridgette Winchester was appointed to the position of SCC Chair and Will Phipps was appointed to the position of Parliamentarian.

Minimum GPA

The Senate unanimously approved a resolution to support a 2.0 minimum GPA for graduation, as well as a 2.0 minimum GPA in major courses. This plan, if approved, would go into effect for the incoming freshman class.

Junior Class Auction

The Junior Class Auction, originally scheduled for this past Saturday, April 11, has been re-scheduled for Saturday, April 25th. Proceeds from the auction will benefit the junior class beautification project.

Funding

The Senate allocated $1450 for Black Sheep for the Luau on April 25th.
$500 was approved for the April 15th Comedy Club performer. An additional $600 was approved for the performer scheduled for April 29th.
$400 was allocated for a street performer to appear on Monday, April 27th.

Another Student Responds to Engel Letter

Dear Editor:

First of all may I state that I am not debating nor am I trying to convince anyone to agree with anything I have to say.

We the students of Washington College have the right to express the things that we feel affect our well being and our scholastic growth while we study on this campus. That is why I feel that the students of the Debate Society have the right to have their timely discussion on the issues that concern the Ku Klux Klan. We are not running from racism, nor are we running from the people who hate us for our natural being. We the members of the Dale Adams Heritage Exchange Organization, whose main purpose, as stated on our birth, was to alleviate the stereotypes, and misunderstandings that people have concerning others of different races, creeds, religions, and social backgrounds, so how can anyone say that we are running from racism. The main thing we want to be is a bridge, that will unite the differences we have.

As I stated earlier, if you were to ask many of the members of our society, did they agree with having this delicate debate, our answer would probably be "Yes." However, we disagreed with the fact that there was a need for the Ku Klux Klan to be brought on campus, to only strike fear in some people's hearts, and stir up possible violence. As I have personally told Kate Absher, "Some people, might call you an animal, I don't agree; just believe, but I do believe your choice to have these ignorant people on campus is a bad decision." I was totally misquoted in last week's Elm, when Seth Engel, said that some Dale Adams members called Ms. Absher, an animal. (Let's get the facts straight, before we accuse an entire organization, of saying something, which opens our entire society to bad and false publicity.)

Furthermore, may I clarify, that the views that have been stated by myself and other minority students on campus, have nothing to do with the Dale Adams Heritage Exchange Organization. Our views, are, our individual opinions and thoughts. In the mean time why, don't whose people who still believe that it is no big deal, what's the commotion all about, think how they would feel if we were to ask the Black Panthers, or Louis Farrakhann, and other hate groups to be guests on this campus, I am sure that even Mickey and Minnie Mouse would have to shed a tear for even such a thought.

The Return of Writers' Theatre

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

As part of the O'Neill Literary House Monday Series, next Monday the 20th will mark the return of Writers' Theatre to Washington College. Traditionally, students of the Drama Department's spring Playwrighting class and other interested playwrights share their works with an audience on the Lit House Porch.

This year, three selections from plays and one dramatic monologue, all written by WC students, will be performed. The works include Andrea Nolan's Life Goes On; Forrest M. George's Paradise; Tina Dayhoff's Freckles, Rainbows, & Something to Do; and J. Tarin Towers' Passages.

The reading will take place after tea at the O'Neill Literary House, on the deck at 4:00 p.m. The public is welcome to attend.

Student Profile: Bruce Hamilton

Bruce Hamilton is a senior majoring in English. He transferred to Washington College from Montgomery County Community College, Germantown Campus, in January of 1990. Concentrating in Modern and Postmodern Fiction, Bruce has a pervading interest in the creative arts.

Bruce is possibly best-known on campus for singing, everywhere he goes — stairwells, hallways, the fire lane, and not least of all for the Sacred Cows. The Cows have two gigs planned for later this month, one at Newt's and one at the Sig farm party. The Cows were chosen as favorite band at last year's Battle of the Campus Bands, and they've played at the CoffeeHouse, Newt's and the Blackhearts Ball.

He is also visible on the stage in Tawes Theatre. Last seen playing the title role in Cyrano de Bergerac, Bruce also had several monologues in last spring's Drinking In America. He also played MacBeth in high school.

Bruce's greatest love may be literature. In fact, the only time he seems to be seen without a book nearby is when he's on a stage. Bruce edits the Collegian, and is a past Arts & Entertainment Editor of the ELM. Besides journalism and literary nonfiction, Bruce writes poetry, plays, and short stories, and one of his works, a prose poem, appeared in the first issue of Crack. He describes most of his friends a "fictional."

Bruce's future plans include "writing the Great American Novel." He may work at Camp Echo Hill this summer, and he would like to get an internship in a publications firm or magazine.

An active member of the Writers' Union, Bruce's other interests include speaking French, playing guitar, drawing and painting. Bruce has been on the Dean's List and has at least a 3.0 GPA. He lives in Port Republic with his mom.

Pippin to Close Drama Season

By J. Tarin Towers
A&E Editor

Pippin, the first musical to be staged by the Washington College drama department in two years, will be performed next weekend, Thursday the 23rd through Saturday the 25th. Shan Driscoll, a senior Drama and English major, is directing the show as her senior drama thesis.

The last WC musical was Sweeney Todd, which Peter Johnson directed and Driscoll assistant directed. Driscoll says that Sweeney was the show that convinced her to become a drama major. She wanted to direct a musical of her own from the start. When she arrived at Washington College she was intrigued by the fact that drama majors could stage a production, and she had planned on doing Pippin since she declared her major. After years of doing technical work such as lighting and costumes, she will now be working hands on with actors instead of instruments.

"Pippin is a modern morality play," says Driscoll. "The character [of Pippin] is searching for fulfillment in his life by going through a series of events alternating between Heaven and Hell, as in Medieval Catholic morality plays. The religious themes in the script were downplayed so as to make it more of a modern approach, as opposed to having religious overtones."

Senior Mike Tyson, a Spanish major, is the Musical Director for Pippin. Tyson was the Assistant Musical Director for Sweeney Todd during his sophomore year. He will be conducting the orchestra, which features Assistant Musical Director John Blakelock on euphonium, Ciaran O'Keeffe on piano, Sacred Cows drummer Chris Goldenberg, and Jennifer Nyman on flute, as well as many others.

The cast includes Tim Buckheit as Pippin, Bridgette Avant as the Leading Player, Jason Imber as Charlemagne, Abrah Wilberding as Fastrada, Scott Koon as Lewis, Eve Zartman as Berthe, Roxanne Seubert as Katherine, and Ed Schroeder as Theo.

The chorus consists of Tanya Allen, Kelly Burns, Katie Degentesh, Rachel Demma, Erika Fitzhugh, Elisa Hale, Kristen Hamilton, Patricia Karnes, and Stephanie Tennyson.

Choreographers are Alexandra Nader and Richard McKee. Deidre Riegel has designed the set, and Jason Imber the lights. Additional crew includes: J. Tarin Towers, Stage Manager; Ed Schroeder, Technical Director; Esther Diamondstone, Assistant Stage Manager; Steve Brown, Master Electrician and Light Board Operator; Heather Lynch, Props Master; and Sherry Menton, Costume Consultant.

All performances will be free and in Tawes Theatre. Showtimes are Thursday, 9:00 p.m.; Friday and Saturday, 8:00 p.m. The show will be seated on stage, and reservations should be made in advance at ext. 269.

Kiddie Lit

By Keri Nygaard
Co-Editor, Shoestrings

On Tuesday evening The Sophie Kerr Committee presented "One Hundred Years of Children's Literature." Curtis Kiefer, the lecturer, is a Washington College alumnus, and is now Head of the Central Children's Department of the Free Library of Philadelphia. While reviewing the history of children's lit, he displayed many beautifully illustrated children's books. Most of these were from the Children's and Rare Book Departments of the Free Library, some of which have been on display in our library, but a few were rare autographed books from his own private collection.

Kiefer's fondness for his work was evident in his presentation, which began with the invitation to the audience to "Shake Out Your Sillies" with Bob, Sesame Street's famous sing-along man. Most of the all-ages audience enjoyed jumping up and down, shaking out their "sillies" before the talk began. The audience laughed and sighed in enjoyment while Kiefer read some of his samples aloud.

Kiefer's primary interests in children's lit seemed to be in illustration and book-binding. He also mentioned the continuing importance of the oral tradition and talked about the recent "Second Golden Age" of children's books, specifically referring to their beauty of design and illustration and to their cultural awareness. He stressed how much children really do love their literature, almost as much as did his audience of "grown-ups."

"Sacred Places" on Campus Next Wednesday

By Melissa Sirick
& Jennifer Griffin
WC Historical Society

The Washington College Historical Society is pleased to announce a lecture given by Maryland historian, Lois Green Carr, at 7:00 p.m., Wednesday, April 22, in Hynson Lounge. The topic of her talk will be "'Sacred Places' and the Role of the Historian: Comments on the Development of Historic St. Mary's City." It will be based upon her recent research and discoveries at 17th-century excavations in St. Mary's City.

Before receiving her Ph. D. in History from Harvard University in 1968, Ms. Carr taught history at Harvard, served as a freelance editor with Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., and was the editor of the Maryland Guide during her employment as a Junior Archivist with the Maryland Hall of Records Commission. Presently, she is the Adjunct Professor of History at the University of Maryland at College Park, the Senior Adjunct Scholar at the Maryland State Archives, and is the Historian at Historic St. Mary's City, State of Maryland.

Ms. Carr specializes in early Maryland history, emphasizing its social structure and conditions. A selection of her publications, including Robert Cole's World: Agriculture and Society in early Maryland and "Maryland's Revolution in Government, 1689-1692," reflects these interests. She is also an authority on women's history as seen in her contribution to The William and Mary Quarterly, "The Planter's Wife: The Experience of White Women in 17th Century Maryland." In addition, she has co-edited two collections, Colonial Chesapeake Society and Law, Society, and Politics in Early Maryland.

Continuing to work for the St. Mary's City Commission without salary even though she was furloughed due to budget cuts, Ms. Carr certainly demonstrates her devotion to the historic discipline and profession.

Crew Rows On, Tennis Makes Stab at Nationals!

Practice Pays Off for Crew in Pair of Invitationals

By Laura Green
Staff Writer

At 4:30 on Saturday morning, April 4, The Washington College Crew team boarded a bus headed for Baltimore, to participate in the Johns Hopkins Invitational Regatta. Gathered at the Hopkins boathouse were scores of other crews such as Loyola, Duquesne, Carlow College, U Pitt, Carnegie-Mellon, George Washington, St. John's, SUNY Maritime, Lehigh, La Salle, Mary Washington, U of Charleston, and Stockton State. The race course, which was initially 2000 meters, had to be shortened to 1000 late in the afternoon, due to inclimate weather. This change only effected the crews who raced in the finals.

The racing began with the Women's Pair. Pitted against Carnegie-Mellon's boat, the WC pair maneuvered down the course, finishing 2nd despite their hard work. Next up was the Men's Pair. The WC rowers raced their Vespoli shell admirably against the competition and finished the 2000 meter race in 4th place. Later in the morning the Novice Women hit the course and battered their competition, crossing the finish line in a strong 2nd place. The WC women had little time to celebrate their victory though, as their minds were focused on the finals in which they raced against the best boats in a challenge for the gold. The women drove their competition during the finals, finishing 3rd overall.

The Novice Men's Eight rowed their heat, combining technique and power, and finished 4th. Although the novice boat did not qualify for the finals, they put up an exciting race for the crowd as they fought their contenders neck and neck to the finish.

The Men's Lightweight Four thrilled the crowd by gliding neatly into 1st place at the finish of their race. This boat, consisting of coxswain- Cindy DeWaters, stroke- Leroy Gatell, Ray Herndon, Ari Kodek, and bow- Tim Stoltzfus, has been toiling away on the Chester River in preparation for the spring races. As they proceeded to the finals at Hopkins, their hard work and perseverance became apparent to everyone. The WC four fought the fierce competition of the finals with determination and seized the gold medal for Washington College.

The WC Men's Fours, "A" and "B", competed in different heats of this Varsity event. The "A" boat crashed through the competition and coasted to a victorious 1st place. They entered the finals later in the afternoon and finished 4th overall against some of the stiffest competition these varsity programs had to offer. The "B" boat rowed their Four in a competitive heat and gave the opposing crews an excellent race, finishing in 4th place.

The Varsity Women's Four was an exciting event. With intense desire and concentration, the women faced some very tough adversaries. The WC crew rowed a strong race and pulled through in 3rd place. In the end, the WC crew was happy with the days performances.

Last weekend, the WC crew teams continued on their domineering course, traveling to Camden, New Jersey for the LaSalle Invitational. The cold, rainy weather made for rough conditions for the racers as they rowed against over twenty crews.

Laura Green and Mary Bird raced the Women's Pair in the first event, and took third place. The Varsity Women also raced a Four, consisting of Karen Wright, Kara Wiesenbaugh, Theresa Lerch, Sue Czechowski, and Conci Pope. This competitive Four took 2nd in their heat. They then went on to place 4th in the semi-finals.

The Varsity Men raced a Pair made up of Darryl Calloway and John McCarthy who finished 3rd in a very competitive final. The Lightweight Men's boat finished 2nd to Villanova in their heat, and 5th in the final. The Varsity Men's "A" four containing Amy Osborne, Jon Mulvany, Eric Jewett, R.J. Eldridge, and Matt Conaty, placed 2nd in their heat and 3rd in the final. The "B" Four, with Maria Jerardi, Rod Benson, Glenn Warner, Will Brandenburg, and Lance Mercereau, finished 4th in their heat.

The Novice Women's Eight consisting of Amy Bortmes, Tonya Howell, Mary Clay Thomas, Jen Dougherty, Alexandra Geller, Danielle Miller, Kathy Mullen, Renee Kuhnel, and Jen Oberle, won their heat and 4th in their final. The Novice Men's Four with Lisa Brown, Doug Peterson, Matt Zimmerman, Brendan Norris, and Chip Truesdell got 2nd in their heat and proceeded on to the Petite finals which they won.

The Crew teams will be making the long journey down to Oakridge, Tennessee next for the SIRAS regatta this weekend. Wish them luck as they work to bring home the gold!!

Netters Continue Down Victorious Path But Their Chances for Nationals Look Slim

By Doug Hoffberger
Staff Writer

On Thursday April 12, the Shoremen played the University of Rochester in what was to be the Netters final determining factor in their bid for a return to Nationals. Although the Shoremen won by a margin of 7-2, they will play the remainder of their matches unsure of their chances of receiving an invitation to the '92 National Tournament, to be held in Miami, Florida.

In the Shoremen win, Frank Hartwig, who returned to match play for only the third time since his persistent injury, was handed a three set loss, 1-6, 6-4, 6-1. Alberto Diaz, who has been awesome all season long to no-one's amazement, bageled his opponent, 6-0, 6-0. Trevor Hurd is the only other Shoreman this year to not allow his opponent to score a single game in a match. At number three singles, Hurd retains his undefeated and almost "untouchable" status with a victory over his Rochester counterpart 7-6 (3), 7-6 (3). The latter half of the Shoremen ladder picked up play versus Rochester, with Emilio Bogato leading the way by taming his opponent 6-4, 7-6 (2). Jivan Datta, Emilio's opponent, had a solid Nationals performance the prior season and had a ranking of top 40 in the country. Question, If Emilio's opponent was ranked among the top 40 players in the country, and there were no other ranked players on the Rochester squad, it would appear that Rochester has a stacked team and are waiting to make their move next year. Or it would that I don't know what the hell I'm talking about and should just get on with the article. Co-captain Andy Bohutinsky lost 6-4, 6-0 and Carlos Nuno defeated his opponent 6-0, 6-2, rounding out the match's singles record at Washington College 4, Rochester 2.

Frank "Too Tall" Hartwig volleys a scorcher

The Netters, felt good entering the doubles portion of the match leading 4-2. Their confidence shined as the Shoremen swept the doubles segment and took the match. At number one doubles, Diaz and Hurd, who are extremely familiar with each others style of play, familiarized their opponents with some basic instruction, winning 6-0, 6-2. Frank Hartwig and Emilio Bogato had little trouble with their opponents, winning 6-1, 6-3. Andy Bohutinsky and Carlos Nuno rounded out the doubles portion with a 6-1, 7-6 (4) victory, once again demonstrating that the Shoremen's doubles play has been a stronghold for them all season.

Earlier last week, the Shoremen were victorious over Glassboro State and Johns Hopkins University. The Rochester victory brings the Netters record to a meaty 13-3. As far as the rest of the season is concerned, the team has one more MAC conference match versus Widener and three other scheduled wins.........I mean matches.

The next Shoremen home match falls on my birthday, April 18, and is versus St. Mary's. But for now, the Netters must sit patiently, knowing that their chances for a return to nationals are about as good as the chances of Linehan and Vaughn winning a caps game, 50-50.

(Comments like that, ladies and gentlemen, are what earned Mr. Hoffberger, a really, truly great man, his position as staff comedian.)

Softball Makes Effort to Recover

By Margaret Doyle
Staff Writer

The WAC Softballers are improving everyday! After losing to Gallaudet, the team bounced back to play a strong game against Elmira. Lori Hastings made a smooth transition to shortstop while Sabrina Luginbuhl filled Hasting's void at second. Despite a great effort, the team fell short 5-2. Hastings said, "Defensively, the team was very strong. Offensively, we still need work"

Offensive power came from Nikki Goenaga and Edna Diefenderfer while Julie Dill proved to be a threat behind the plate with an RBI. Hastings stated, "Now we know we have the talent. It's just a matter of putting it all together." The team's high spirits, effort, and enthusiasm has boosted morale, improving their game greatly.

They travel to Dickinson on Friday for a doubleheader. Adjustments being made are Marie Mohler starting in unfamiliar territory as the Softballer's catcher and Denise Coleman pitching in the second game to relieve starting pitcher/co-captain Diefenderfer. Good Luck!

Take Me Out to the Ball Game. . .

Last Saturday was potentially a very big day for the '92 WC baseball team. Like Coach Athey predicted in the beginning of the season, Johns Hopkins was the team to beat in order to keep the hope alive for an MAC championship. As the warm weather hit Chestertown, and the big day drew near, baseball players and fans were getting fired up for the double header showdown, scheduled to take place at Cardinal Yards—a game which promised to draw an even larger crowd than usual due to the the fact that the Varsity lacrosse game was away. At lunch on Friday afternoon, Kyle "Gomer" Hutchison, among others, expressed his desire to sweep the series against the Jays, "If we don't do it tomorrow, we're sunk as far as the championship is concerned. We've really got to take both games, which will be tough. These guys are good, but I think we can do it if everybody plays up to par."

So . . . things didn't work out the way everybody hoped. Let's not discuss the first game—I wasn't there so I couldn't really say what the problem was. Maybe Whiteford had a bad day. Maybe the batting was a little on the down side. Whatever the reason, a 10-3 loss put the possibility of a WC '92 championship all but out of reach . . . oh well, maybe next year.

But then, as WC's star pitcher yielded the mound to number two, Joe Boan . . . and as the fans settled in for what should have been a more disastrous game than the first, WC came alive. Certainly, the crowd's attitude had a lot to do with the team's rejuvenated spirit—never let it be said that Washington College lacks spirit, even in the face of a no win situation. In fact, if anything, the knowledge that Hopkins had just knocked us out of contention for the MAC championship served as a rallying factor—if we could only beat them in this second game . . .

As the sun beat down through the sparse afternoon clouds, Seymour and Snyder led the rowdy charge from the box seats behind homeplate. Adding their support, Spiderman and The Vaughnster, from their upper level seats on the roof of Cardinal G, combined forces with a number of Sigs and Thetas, occupying the general admission seats in centerfield, to put the spark into this talented baseball club.

First and foremost, Boan pitched a spectacular game. With added support from the outfield, gliding across the closely mown grass to make those seemingly impossible grabs, Boan had managed to maintain a 4-2 lead for the Sho'men. Sure JHU's Trotta crushed one deep (very deep) to tie the score late in the game, but it seemed as if everyone's spirits were too high for that to make any difference. Going into the top of the seventh tied at fours, you could almost smell victory—another scoreless top of the inning, no problem.

Problem. Baseball is baseball and it doesn't take much to turn a game around. Say . . . one lousy pitch. Or possibly . . . one fielding error. Or how about maybe two—possibly three—lousy calls from the umpire. I mean, who's to say how the game would have turned out if, in the top of the seventh, the ump hadn't allowed a Hopkins batter a free trip to first base after making no attempt to avoid getting hit by the pitch. Or, if the ump hadn't allowed a runner to come home after the batter fouled the ball back to the backstop. Or, finally, if the ump had called the runner out when Morall stood his ground and made the tag in the base path in front of homeplate on a perfect throw from right field. (Okay, so maybe he barely missed the tag—Hell, I would have given it to him anyway on account of Scully's spectacular throw.) The bottom line is that there were a number of very questionable calls made by the umpire late in the game which certainly had a very serious effect on the game's outcome.

However, like I said before, baseball is baseball. The beautiful thing is that the umpire is just as much a factor as anyone else on the field. Besides, their mistakes probably account for 75% of the crowd spirit—at least, they did on Saturday. So, at the end of seven, the Shoremen had just come up short. Still, it was baseball at its best—including the umpire's contribution. In the words of the immortal Clark Griswold from the well known production Vacation, "Hey, it was fun though, whadd'n it Honey?"

WC Lacrosse Club Tops Washington 14-9

By Brandon White
Staff Writer

Last Saturday the WC Lax Club went out and faced the Washington Lacrosse Club of DC. WC struck first and struck hard in the opening minutes with two quick goals. Washington quickly retaliated and tied it up. During the rest of the half both teams alternated scoring. But, at the half Washington had taken a one goal lead. Most of the goals scored by Washington in the first half occurred during man-up situations, due to the very tight game that the referees were calling.

WC regrouped at the half and came out strong. WC took the lead in the third quarter and maintained it for the win. The high scorers of the game were Gibby Semmes (with a game high of three goals and one assist) and Benny Lamanna(with two goals and two assists).

And let's not forget the close-to-a-bench-clearing brawl! Late in the third quarter #53 for the opposing club took a shot at one of our own C-town boys, in retaliation against a hit that came after the whistle. Out of nowhere, Paul "Obi One" Obrecht came flying in (with grace I might add) crushing the offending player. (Un)Fortunately the scuffle was quickly broken up with no penalties awarded to either side (amazing), and play continued.

WC returns in a week to face the Penn State Nittney Lions on Saturday at 2:00 pm. See you there!

Women Netters Finish Strong

By Rachael Rice
Staff Writer

The women's tennis team notched lucky seven this past Tuesday at Western Maryland College—seven wins in a row. The team, which has not dropped a match since being upset March 21 by Swarthmore, improved its spring record to 11-4. In addition, a win against Johns Hopkins (played yesterday) will secure for the Shoremen a third consecutive MAC Southwest sectional title and a berth in the MAC team semifinals.

The women, displaying stamina and the experience of veteran players, faced four opponents in six days. The series began a week ago Thursday against MAC sectional opponent Elizabethtown. Tracy Peel, Miriam Dittman, and Kristy Karns had little difficulty winning their matches at #1, #3, and #6 singles, respectively. Pam Hendrickson, at #2, struggled in her first set against Amy Hite. But she held on to win the tie-breaker 8-6, and went on to capture the second set 6-2. Jennifer Sloan, at #4, and Diana Clausen, at #5, fought hard but came up empty handed. Sloan lost to Michelle Artz 4-6, 5-7, and Clausen to Andrea Thornton by the same scores. The Shoremen polished off E-town at #1 and #3 doubles, and came away with a 6-3 team victory.

On Saturday the team put away another MAC foe, the Dickinson Lady Red Devils. Perhaps inspired by sunny skies or the first warm day of the season, the women quickly knocked off Dickinson, 9-0. Peel, at #1, dropped 5 games in her victory over Stella Ip, while Hendrickson allowed Emma Monkhouse only 3. Seeds #3-#6, Dittmann, Sloan, Rachael Rice, and Karns, lost a total of only 7 games on the way to victory. The Shoremen were equally ferocious in the doubles. Peel and Hendrickson won at #1, 6-4, 6-0; Karns and Sloan were victorious at #2, 6-1, 6-4; Rice and Dittmann were perfect at #3, with a score of 6-0,6-0.

Participating in the only athletic contest on campus Sunday, the team was fortunate that they had said their prayers earlier that morning. The Catholic University Cardinals, a non-MAC, Division III opponent, was kept in place—but barely—by a score of 5-4. Senior co-captain Tracy Peel said "hard work, concentration, and a lot of six-ball drills payed off in this match. Both Miriam and P.J. played very well and helped to round out the solid 1-2-3 punch." The Cardinals, who were 11-0 going into the match, found their 3 singles victories at #4, 5, and 6. Kathy Philbin defeated Sloan 5-7, 6-2, 6-1 in a contest that was continued in the LFC. Maureen Edwards dropped Rice in two close sets, 6-4, 7-6 (8-6). Karns, unable to put away Tara Dowd at #6, lost 6-4, 6-2. When asked about her match, Karns replied, "By the time I was able to figure out my opponent's style of play, it was too late—and that serve . . . let's just say that I've never seen anything like it."

The teams were tied at three matches a piece going into the doubles. Peel and Hendrickson pushed the Shoremen to 4-3 with a 6-1, 6-4 victory at #1, while Dittmann and Rice put on the finishing touches at #3. "Our 6-1,6-1 score does not tell the whole story," explained Dittmann, who is arguably the stronger half of the #3 tandem. "We had to concentrate from the moment we stepped onto the court—the girls (Philbin and Edwards) got a lot of balls back." Sloan and Karns were not as successful at #2, going down in the second set, 7-5, 6-2.

The Shoremen were undaunted by the Green Terrors of Western Maryland, dropping a total of 12 games in 9 matches. Peel, Hendrickson, Dittmann, Sloan, Rice, and Karns notched victories at #1-6. Clausen and Lee Russo, coming on in the #3 doubles position, handed their MAC opponents a 6-2, 6-1 drubbing. The tandems of Peel-Hendrickson and Sloan-Karns also won handily. This 9-0 win should fuel Shoremen confidence for the remaining MAC matches.

The Shoremen face St. Mary's tomorrow, at the Washington College outdoor stadium complex. On Thursday they travel to Baltimore to face the Division I Loyola Greyhounds. Stay posted for further MAC tournament news—continued success will ensure the team home-court advantage for next Friday's semi-final match.

Women's Lax Stumbles Against JHU

Brigid DeVries works her way through three tenacious defenders en route to the goal

The women's lacrosse team battled MAC rival Johns Hopkins University here at the WAC last Thursday. While JHU secured the win 13-8, the Shorewomen walked away from the field with a sense of accomplishment. Margaret Doyle revealed, "I don't think I've ever run so hard in my entire life, and I thought we had a good chance of winning."

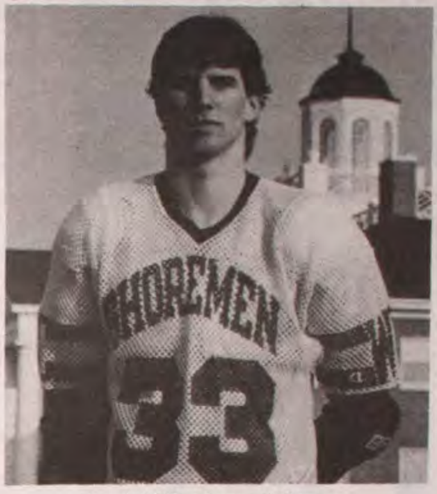
Each of the squad's players contributed a lot of soul to the game by supporting one another, both on and off the field, and attacking Hopkins with everything they had. Assistant Coach Lacy Frazer stated, "I felt the team never gave up, and they played the hardest I've ever seen them play from the first second on the clock to the very last second on the clock. They really played with heart from start to finish."

After the first goal was scored unassisted by Hopkins' Becca Savage, their leading scorer for the game, Kirsten Lucas, Margaret Doyle, and Kristy Hilgartner each fired to set the goal ablaze, making the score 3-1 with 14:35 left in the first period. The Shorewomen defense then held the Blue Jays for a full five minutes until Jessica Tropp, Shereen Chen, and, once again, Becca Savage scored to bring the competition to 5-3 in favor of the Jays. Margaret Doyle, however, with just one second left on the clock, raced into scoring range and sent yet another bullet past Hopkins goalie Brenda Yoo. When the count down hit zero, signaling the end of the half, the Shorewomen trailed the Blue Jays by one.

The second period featured two goals a piece by Amy McCleary and Margaret Doyle. Brigid DeVries, Cristin Albert, and Kristy Hilgartner exhibited dynamic defensive moves as goalie Nancy Millhouser recorded a double-digit save for her seventh game in a row.

Come out and cheer the Shorewomen to victory on Wednesday, April 22 as they take on Haverford in their final home game of the season. Let's go WAC!

NEWT'S Player of the Week



Jamie "The Carver" Carver

NEWT'S CHESTERTOWN BAR
Trust Me
(410) 778-9819

It's The Bleacher Creatures- we're twice as big and twice as hairy this week!! In Yer FACE!! As If. . .

First of all, thanks to Paul's Shoe Store, obviously a member of the Better Business Bureau, Spiderman no longer has to walk around in his ripped, leaking Sambas. BUY ALL YOUR ATHLETIC FOOTWARE AT PAUL'S!

The sports comedy for this week came from the duo that haven't missed a baseball game all season. They call themselves BIG but we just call them bad caps players. Snyder and Seymour, those rowdy, heckling, Wild Bill Hagey type fans, made their presence felt in last week's JHU match-up when they directed a classic line towards the umpire. It came out something like this, "Hey ump, you're obviously no stranger to C-Town liquors." Well, it was funny at the time.

And of couse the really BIG news- Newt's POW is. . . Sophomore Jamie Carver. Says Coach Jim Townsend, "Carver has really come into his own lately. I have little doubt that he'll continue as a force to be reckoned with. In two years. . .whew, look out!" Jamie has tallied 10 goals and 2 assists thus far, giving him an overall twelve points on the season. This week alone he hit 7 netters in two games which helped boost the Sho'men to two consecutuive wins and a current 7-2 record. In addition, Jamie has amassed 45 ground balls, second only to defenseman Scott Overend. Good Job Jamie, keep up the hard work and impressive play!!

Lax Strives for Play-off Berth

The Men's Lacrosse team improved their record to 7-2 after their victories against Swarthmore and Franklin and Marshall this past week. The fourth quarter of both games proved to be a tremendous period for scoring as Washington capitalized a total of 15 times in the final 15 minutes against Swarthmore and Franklin and Marshall, while their opponents combined for only three.

The Shoremen maintained a three goal advantage over their MAC Eastern Division opponent Swarthmore going into halftime leading 8-5. But they really closed the book late in the third quarter when, with only 16 seconds left, Chris Sanchez scored off an assist from Greg Lawler to begin a five goal run that put Washington from a 10-7 lead to a 15-7 lead. Jamie Carver, who totaled 5 goals of his own by the end of the game, contributed two in the run as well. Chris Cote netted four goals in the game, freshman Greg Lawler scored three, Chris Sanchez and Jason Paige had two, and Christian Boone, Bill Brimhall, and Greg Mouracade each had one.

The real match, however, was this past Saturday when Washington went up against tenth ranked F&M and came out victorious. With a scoreless second quarter and only Brian Flynn and Jason Paige scoring in the first, the Shoremen went into halftime tied with F&M, 2-2. Exploding after halftime, Chris Cote scored three goals during the third quarter, which kept Washington neck and neck with the Diplomats. The game stood about even until the fourth quarter when Jason Paige scored off an assist from Stu Warner with 11:25 remaining, a goal that broke the tight game and started yet another five goal scoring streak for Washington. Lawler, Flynn, Paige, and Carver each contributed in the scoring spurt which put the game out of reach for F&M.

Once again, Washington's defense demonstrated tremendous poise, with big games from Kevin Doyle, Scott Overend and Freshman goalie Bill Griffin, who had seventeen saves. Washington outshot the Diplomats, had eight more ground balls, and dominated the face-offs, with Chris Jones winning fifteen of the nineteen.

The Shoremen's road trip continued with a match-up against Widener on Wednesday, which will be in next week's issue, and carries over to Saturday when they face Washington and Lee. Talk about a turn around, Washington now holds the top spot in the MAC Eastern Division with a 2-0 divisional record going into these games. The win against F&M puts them in good contention in the playoffs so let's wish them luck!

WC Admin. Freezes Departmental Budgets

By John Griep
News Editor

The Washington College administration announced this past week that it was freezing "discretionary" spending by academic departments and administrative offices in an effort to conserve funds. The WC administration is concerned about a potential decline in endowment income and annual fund receipts.

Gene Hessey, Senior Vice President of Management and Finance, stated that "at this point in time, any supply, travel, entertainment, or equipment money which has not been committed or expended will not be committed or expended. . . . In the fall we had to revise our budgets based on the loss of state funding as well as a reduction in enrollment. We did an across-the-board ten percent budget reduction. After making those reductions, the college's budget was still in deficit. . . . A deficit is never acceptable, but it was a level which was tolerable in that we had accumulated excess revenues from prior years which we could fall back on . . . to cover any shortfalls this year. As the year has progressed, I must say that the departments have been super-cooperative and have done an outstanding job of controlling costs. What has caused this additional stress financially is the uncertainty of the level of Annual Fund giving that we are going to receive and the level of endowment income which we are going to earn. The pain is not excruciating; obviously, we're close to the end of the program year. Most of these costs, had they been incurred, would have been for the benefit of next year's program. . . . There is something like $100,000 or more of unexpended funds throughout the college's budgets that can be used as a hedge against both the decline of annual giving or the decline of endowment income. . . . Approximately one-third of the potential cost recovery is coming from instructional departments, the balance is coming from administrative offices, Maintenance Department, Food Services, and those other areas."

The ELM also spoke with Dr. Donald Munson, Joseph H. McLain Professor and Chair of the Biology Department and Professor Tex Andrews, Acting Chair of the Art Department to examine how the budget freeze is affecting academic departments at WC

Dr. Munson commented that for a science department, most of the budget is for laboratory items, which are purchased well in advance. "The budget goes from July 1 to June 30 and is supposed to be for the current academic year. You're not supposed to be ordering on this year's budget for next fall. So the question is, how much is left on this year's budget that you need to get through the year? . . . The items that were cut were supplies, equipment, and travel expenses. . . . There's no major concern. . . . If you didn't spend it by now, for the academic year . . . this is an academic year budget . . . what was someone going to spend it for? What I hope doesn't happen is everybody spending all their budgets in the first two months. . . . We have not been Several members of the Washington College community have recently had the opportunity to visit the new home of the Baltimore Orioles. They found Oriole Park at Camden Yards to be not only a comfortable park, but a salute to past ballparks built during the heydey of baseball.

"It was fabulous," commented Trainer Jon Ferber. "It reminded me a little of Wrigley Field, the way it looked, and a little of old Comiskey Park."

Kevin "Sparky" Kelly agreed with Ferber, stating that "It's a field of dreams. I just like the cozy atmosphere of it. It's just the epitome of what my grandfather told me an old ballpark should be."

Oriole Park at Camden Yards was built to be a more intimate ballpark than Memorial Stadium, something the loyal fans of the Orioles appreciate greatly. There is not an obstructed view in the park. "The seating is awesome," exclaimed Ken Pipken. "You're really up close in the new ballpark. You don't feel you're left out of the game, ever!"

Born and raised an Oriole fan, Pipken couldn't help but compare Oriole Park to Memorial Stadium. "The field at the old ballpark was better. The ideas they have are great, but the grounds still need a little work. It's a pitcher's ballpark. It will benefit the new and younger pitchers coming in, because the new facilities are up to date."

Since the Orioles began their regular season the ballpark has been packed with faithful fans, as well as people curious to see what all the fuss is about. As Jon Ferber stated, "Literally, the people are going to come to the ballpark."

Student Vandalism on Campus

By Patrick Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

Despite the recent increase in acts of student vandalism to the Washington College campus (including damage to the O'Neill Literary House, the Queen Anne dormitory, college athletic vans, and young tree saplings), Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects states that these incidents reflect no significant increase in damage done to the school's grounds.

"This [recent] vandalism," Baer said, "is pointless and destructive. It only destroys a significant investment by the college." Baer is especially frustrated by the damage done to the campus' landscaping, stating, "We care about how this place looks...these are big setbacks."

When asked what incidents of student vandalism have occurred over the past three to five weeks, Jerry Roderick, Director of Security at WC, cited five specific examples. The first, happening on the evening of April 11, involved several WC students spraying fire extinguishers down the first floor of the Caroline dormitory. The chemical released has been known to cause severe allergic reactions to skin and the trachea, while damaging property such as clothing and pillows. Roderick stated the students responsible have been apprehended, and have been referred to the Student Affair's Office for judicial action.

The second incident occurred on Saturday, April 18, at 12 am, when several unidentified students entered the second floor laundry room of the Queen Anne dormitory, and ripped a utility sink off the wall, sending a literal river of water down the hall. Many of the dormitory's residents were home for Easter weekend and upon their arrival back at WC, were greeted with sopping wet floor rugs and saturated mattresses. Of the few residents in the building the night of the incident, many spent several hours pushing this water down the stairwell with brooms, while others scrambled to stack student's belongings away from the mini-Niagara. According to Reid Raudenbush, Director of WC's Physical Plant, damage to the sink totalled $120. Although no suspects have yet to be charged, Roderick stated that this incident is currently under investigation.

Hey you! No, not you, the other guy! What's that on your shirt? Ohhh, IN YER FACE!! That's right folks, it's me again, the Patster, the big cheese, the Editorminator. The man with the nose for news is COMIN' ATCHA!! Before I get busy here, I've got a quick public service announcement. This past Monday evening, before a crowd of several thousand witnesses at Cardinal Yards, yours truly was involved in perhaps the most controversial play ever recorded in the modern softball era. Chris "I Need Glasses Worse Than Helen Keller" Kleberg, the game's umpire and opposing team's shortstop, called the Patster, left-fielder for the undefeated Lambadamen, out at second base, a move so blatantly wrong, that it sent the crowd into absolute hysterics. Said one eye-witness, "Pat's so quick, he got hit in the head by his own line-drive while sliding into second! That ump is nuts, man!" So if you see Mr. Kleberg, help him across the crosswalk, keep him away from sharp objects, in short do anything to ensure this kind of injustice does not occur again! Yo, somebody call LensCrafters!"

And now, drum roll please (ladies and gentlemen hold onto your hats!) the moment you've all been waiting for, this week's PAT's Editor of the Week! Yes, it's a new feature here, and what better way to christen its arrival than with the hardest working man in sports journalism-the guy who writes those cutting feature pieces, and writes them hard!-our very own Charlie "Smells Like Teen Spirit" Linehan! Says Charlie of this coveted award: "I'd like to thank all the little people who made this possible, especially my editor, what's his name? Hey Vaughnster, what's that dope's name? The one who thinks Caps is a hockey team from Washington? Yeah, that's it! IN YER FACE!!".......

What's going on here? I go to the bathroom for five minutes, and return to find someone has vandalized my editorial space. We've all reached that point of the semester affectionately known as Crunch Time. The onslaught of papers and exams that stresses out both faculty and students. I've also reached the point of editorial burnout, having peaked two weeks ago with that politically correct one. I don't know how this happened, but I've gotten to be known for my editorials poking fun at the administration. They are depicted as brainless, evil creatures whose sole purpose is to fix what isn't broken, and to break that which is already fixed. These are only hypothetical statements mind you, but when I've got a serious point to make, especially regarding tuition hikes and the right to free speech, I expect the student body to be standing behind me. They are alright, but they're not nodding their heads or signing petitions, they're pulling out trees, pissing on monuments, ripping out sinks, and shooting out the defenseless windows of the Lit House. In short, all the activities mature, responsible Washington College students have become famous for. Do you really expect President Trout to take any of us seriously when instead of flooding him with legitimate gripes, we choose to flood the stairwells of Queen Anne?

I'm no angel when it comes to the occasional choice Wickwire quote on a desktop in Smith Hall. I might even have incorrectly footnoted something along the way in my academic career. But this crap is ridiculous. I'd much rather kick my brain back into third gear and write a whole editorial about Charlie. Again, we're all at that point in the semester. Tell me something I don't know. But if you've got some extra steam to blow off, go play with yourself at the Fitness Center, don't take your frustration out on a poor defenseless tree. Just because this place is called Washington College does not mean you get to go cutting down the nearest tree whenever the mood strikes.

When asked what he thought appropriate punishment would be for the "unidentified" sling-shot assailant of the Lit House windows, Professor Bob Day stated, "I'd like to tie him up to a tree in front of the Lit House and read Rod McCuen poetry to him all day." I think more drastic measures should be taken. Like the eye for an eye system. For instance, if you are caught ripping down a tree at WC, then President Trout and Clint Baer can go to your home and rip out one of your trees. If you tear the sinks out of Queen Anne, then Trout's gonna do some damage to your laundry room. See if your parents like that. Enough of this slap on the wrist stuff. I'm thinking the death penalty. Maybe I should get Matt and Ben going on another special report, titled "Homophobic, Tree-Hating, Slingshot Bearing, Wish I was still in Kindergarten Because Metaphors Confuse Me Meatheads on Campus." Oh, if those people in the Biology department could only come up with Dutch Meathead's Disease.

As for you Linehan, we will settle our differences on the softball field.

As for the rest of you, I hope to see you all at the Senior Reading on Sunday night, 6 pm in Norman James. Attendance is mandatory.

Students Oppose NEWT's Flyer

Dear Editor,

This past Tuesday at lunch someone distributed advertisements for the Sacred Cows, who were playing at Newt's. These advertisements were hung prominently on the walls of the Student Center, in the dorms and were placed conspicuously on each table in the dining hall. The ads featured a photo from a Calvin Klein advertisement. The photograph was of a young man holding a woman who was naked from the waist down. I recall when the ad for Calvin Klein came out I found it offensive.

This is not to say that I find women's buttocks offensive. I love butts as much as the next guy, perhaps even more. What was offensive to me was the way he was holding her. She looks precariously perched, as if she were about to fall. The young man in the leather jacket looks as if he is handling her roughly. The point could be made that she is enjoying the embrace, but we don't know that as her face is not visible. She is an anonymous sexual object.

That is what I found offensive. Images of women as sexual objects are pervasive

To the Editor:

Walking into a student lounge tonight, two things posted on the bulletin board caught my eye: an article entitled "Who Says AIDS Is Hard to Get?"—some of you may have seen it posted on green paper around the campus—and nearly touching it, two of the flyers advertising Newt's $1.00 cover charge for Tuesday evening's festivities—you may have seen this one also: there is a woman clad in a black leather jacket, locked in an embrace with a man leaning up against a metal fence. She is wearing nothing but the jacket.

Only two weeks ago a bikini car wash was advertised on campus to raise money for a charitable cause. The photos used, and the title alone, suggest one thing: sex. I believe the idea of a clean car was lost in there somewhere.

Sex is a wonderful thing, don't get me wrong. But the two things mentioned above are appalling in a day and age where we are supposedly "educated," and therefore liberated. No human being has a right to depict another in such a limiting and degrading fashion. Female sexuality is very real, and very precious, but our society devalues it in every sense of the word by this type of representation.

I have two points to make. First, I find it amazing that this disrespect continues in light of the AIDS epidemic. This is real, folks. In January, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control reported that in our nation alone the AIDS count was 206,392 cases. There were 133,232 deaths. These people are the professionals, the unemployed, the mothers, the infants, and yes, the college students. Around the world,

Budget Freeze Will Not Affect Classes

really harmed by it; classes are over next week.... What could I possibly say I need to order to get me through next week? . . . I am very much more concerned about the financial status of the institution as such. Why did they have to do this? That's the crux."

Professor Andrews was also concerned about the effect that regular, year-end budget freezes would have on spending in the future. "As far as major expenditures are concerned, we've already done it. And one reason we did it early is because this [a budget freeze] happened last year. So the incentive is not to save your money; the incentive is to spend. . . . Some of the faculty wonder if that's wise. I understand that the school is having difficulties. I think there has got to be another way to do this. Coming at the very end of the year when things like this are going on, what are you going to do, screech to a halt? You can't. . . . I really feel sorry for those departments who were very responsible and saved their money because they got burned. I don't think that this is the most constructive way to do this. Maybe we should have a budget review in January.... Maybe the chairs need to give the administration an idea of what's coming. On the other hand, the administration has to tell the chairs what's going on. [They] approve our budget and then [they] say we can't have it, which is it? . . . It's certainly not an incentive to save your budget. . . ."

For They're Some Junior Good Fellows!

The Society of Junior Fellows has accepted sixteen new members this spring. Emilio Bogado (Economics); Laura Breeding, Tina Dayhoff, Kathryn Mullan, Melissa Sirick (English); Samantha Clements (Chemistry); Kristin Coyne, Laura Green (Psychology); Lionel Dyson, Nancy Whiteman (Political Science); Maria Jerardi, Andrew McKim (International Relations); Jennifer Hozik, Chris Vaughn (Business Management); Caroline Jensen (Biology); and Tarin Towers (Drama) bring a cumulative grade point average of 3.54 into the Fellows program.

While some financial grant applications for special projects are still under review, to be released shortly, eight Junior Fellows have been granted financial assistance by the Society.

In the fall senior Michelle Beattie will be serving an internship with the Hansard Society for Parliamentary Government in London. Lionel Dyson will intern at the U.S. Embassy in Manila over the summer. Bridgette Winchester received a grant to do research on the political, social, and economic forces shaping German women after re-unification. Junior Jennifer Hozik will intern in the Maryland Governor's Office over the summer. Maria Jerardi will intern with the U.S. Embassy in Dhaka, Bangladesh, while Andrew McKim will be at the U.S. Agency for International Development in Washington, D.C. Both Erin Page and Stephanie Tennyson will be spending their summer in Quito, Ecuador. While Page will be working at the Quito Language and Cultural Center, Tennyson will be interning at the U.S. Embassy.

Applications for membership and financial grants are reviewed by the Society's Advisory Council. The Society of Junior Fellows was formed last year to serve as a "collegium of scholars dedicated to the exchange of ideas." Dr. Davy McCall, Chairman of the Economics Department, serves as Curator for the Society.

Women's Group Plans Fall Semester's Discussion Topics

By Lynn Clifford
Women's Issues Discussion Group President

The purpose of The Women's Issues Discussion Group is to provide the opportunity for open-minded people to gather and discuss pertinent issues in our society, on this campus, and for themselves in greater depth. Only by exploring these areas will we experience our potential, and ultimately our personal power, for decision and influence in this world. It starts as a small flickering within an individual's soul, but can grow to illuminate an entire culture. This desire to "illuminate" and find a connection, while encouraging growth, was the primary source of motivation behind beginning the Group in the Fall of 1991.

The Women's Issues Discussion Group has served to heighten awareness and provide an avenue for people to discover more about themselves and their personal philosophies over the year. Through a variety of activities: a panel discussion, a film series, lectures, and weekly meetings, the Group explored a variety of areas, including the female body image, sexuality, substance abuse, relationships, gender differences, balancing the masculine and feminine, and other important issues.

The mailing list currently consists of between twenty to thirty members, including interested men—although the ratio is sadly unequal. Though in the fall of 1991 the discussions were usually limited to women (this was largely because the group was in transition from an all-female support group formed in 1990) the spring semester expanded to include men as well.

Following the success of this academic school year, in the fall of 1992 the Women's Issues Discussion Group will explore such topics as Women & the Legal System, Women & Politics and Women in Business, and on a more personal level, Addictive Relationships and Sexuality & Communication, and may include speakers from Emily's List, The Women's Campaign Fund, The American Civil Liberties Union, and more. The discussions coordinated by the Women's Issues Group will be covering issues pertaining to everyone, not just the women of our society, and will therefore be open to anyone with an interest, regardless of their gender. In fact, I encourage men to come; do not fear—we don't burn bras or brandish clubs, but would in fact truly appreciate the balance your input would promote.

Washington College has experienced a great deal of growth over the short '91-'92 school term with the introduction of G.A.L.A., the renewed efforts of the Margaret Horsley Society, the Dale Adams Heritage Exchange, and the activities the 100th Anniversary of Co-Education brought to this campus, bringing an increased awareness for the need of human rights in this world.

To receive a calendar of events and/or to be included on the mailing list for the fall semester of the Women's Issues Discussion Group, or if you are simply interested in more information, please contact Lynn Clifford at 778-2160 or through campus mail. Any issues you feel are important? Please let me know.

The Board of Publications is now accepting applications for the position of

for the '92-'93 Washington College ELM. All letters of intent should be addressed to Chairman Richard DeProspo by April 29.

Sexism and Plagiarism in Recent Flyer

in our society. They are impersonal, dehumanizing and degrading. I personally couldn't care less if there were buck naked models in beer commercials on TV every evening, as long as they were presented as human beings rather than playthings for men. Moreover there must be some correlation between the sexist portrayal of women in the American media and the high incidence of violent crimes against women. This past Monday's Baltimore Sun reported that the rate for rape and attempted rape skyrocketed by 59% last year. I don't know how we as a society can eliminate rape, but I do know that eliminating the practice of depicting women as objects cannot help but improve the situation.

Matters of taste and personal preference aside, however, the ad was also offensive in that it was a blatant example of plagiarism. The Washington College community is in the process of trying to address this problem on our campus, and it does not help in that effort to allow outside commercial interests to display plagiarized ad copy on campus grounds. Moreover, the ad itself was possibly illegal. Commercial free speech is protected so long as it is not pornographic or an infringement of copyright law. The Newt's ad may be seen as both. It is a criminal offence in the state of Maryland to distribute material for commercial purposes if that material has been copyrighted and the copyright is held by another individual or corporate entity. I'd shed no tears if someone informed Calvin Klein of this possible copyright violation and their lawyers brought a case against Newt's. If whoever did the ads for Newt's cannot come up with something original, they should ask one of the many talented artists on this campus to lend a hand.

S. Ross Koon

Sexism and Education in the Age of AIDS

12 million people are infected with the AIDS virus. One positive trait of the disease: it doesn't discriminate. (Kramer 1992)

A little over two years ago, 100,000 cases were reported in just 26 months. The trend continues, and the time span between the next reported 100,000 cases shortens. (Kramer 1992)

The cases from a year ago are not the same as the cases being reported now; these new and undiscovered strains are equally lethal.

Don't like those facts? You just wanted to be closer, or "didn't feel like ruining the moment?" We all make mistakes, but there's a point when we shouldn't have to "learn from experience" anymore. That 'moment' could mean your life.

These pictures not only violate my sense of dignity as a self-respecting human being, concerned for the health and welfare of the people on this planet, but as a female in a world which too often does not take my gender seriously enough as it is.

This brings me to my second point: the depiction of a female, as represented only by her body, is an insult. With the progress women and men have made over the years to gain equality in this imbalanced system of ours, we merely negate what we have achieved by subjecting ourselves to these demoralizing messages. Sexuality is fine, but as with all things, should be presented in its entirety. We have a very dim idea of what a healthy relationship consists of as it is; a bare-assed woman in a black leather jacket is far from ideal. And don't tell me she was a chemist with a PhD in law who merely wanted to "express" herself.

It is a scientifically proven fact that exposure to images such as the two mentioned above lessen a woman's perception of what sexual violence is, i.e. rape, and makes "men trivialize the severity of the violence they see against women." (Wolf 1991) Pornography is a 7 billion dollar a year enterprise; it doesn't need any assistance. (MacKinnon 1987)

Not only do images like this make it difficult for females to maintain their self-respect, but the effects on our personal and professional lives are detrimental. This is not freedom; it is an assault which takes away our sexual individuality.

Hunger Awareness Apathy

To the Editor:

The Hunger Awareness Day arranged jointly by Maria Jerardi, a name synonymous with charity work on this campus, and Food Service Director Dave Knowles has shed considerable light on the differences between good intent and stark reality.

Held in Hodson Hall on Wednesday, April 25, the event was advertised for over a week. During that time, Maria sent individual invitations to thirty faculty members and placed a sign up sheet in the faculty lounge. The joint efforts of Dave and Maria resulted in seventy students signing up to participate in this event (approximately 12% of the 595 Board Plan students).

Even though seventy people registered for the Hunger Awareness event, only seventeen students actually participated. Obviously the need for awareness did not encompass the faculty or staff of this institution. Further, the number of "no-shows" on behalf of the students represented an unfortunate level of apathy.

This seems an appalling lack of concern on the part of those that advocate an increase of cultural diversity as a way to remain competitive in the liberal arts and sciences college market. It also mirrors the current political situation in this country that has prompted us to seek cultural diversity on this campus.

It would not have taken very much effort for anyone to stop in Hodson Hall and thank Maria and Dave for staging this event, if not to participate in it. Maybe we should look closer at how we spend money on salaries and make it relative to the contribution that each person makes toward the goals of this college. To quote ex-C.E.O. of Chrysler Lee Iococca, "You lead, follow, or get out of the way." There is a lot of pertinent wisdom in that statement.

SGA Report

The final Senate meeting of the 1991-92 academic year was held on Tuesday, April 21, 1992 in the basement of Minta Martin. The next meeting will be held on Tuesday, September 22, 1992 at 9 p.m. in the Casey Academic Center Forum.

Constitutional Amendments

Student Academic Board

The selection process for Student Academic Board representatives was amended in order to reflect actual practice. Currently, the SGA Constitution states that SAB representatives will be elected by the academic majors. This was amended to state that department chairs will nominate three majors, with the final selection to be made by the SAB Chair.

Elections

The section of the SGA Constitution dealing with petitions for elections was amended to state that in the event two persons seek the position of Social Chair together, they should return a single petition of fifteen signatures with both their signatures on it.

Changes Made on Eval. Form

Senators Whitney Myrus and John Phoebus met with Dean Taylor and the Committee on Appointments & Tenure to discuss changes to the evaluation forms. The instructions will now state that the form will not be typed and students may wish to alter their handwriting. The identification portion of the form, which asks for a student's class and reason for taking the course, will be moved to the end of the form.

May Day Motion

A motion to require all members of the 1992-93 SGA Executive Board to go naked on May Day was proposed. It was amended to include the outgoing 1991-92 Exec. Board members as well. This motion was not voted on.

Class Officer Elections

Results for Class Officer Elections will be announced in next week's issue of the ELM. Errors on the Junior Class ballot resulted in a new vote yesterday and counting for all elections was not completed by press time.

Modify Alchohol Policy to Move Parties Back on Campus

Julie Greene & Troy Petenbrink

Over the last four years at Washington College, the college community has seen a marked change in the school's social atmosphere due to the administration's stronger position concerning the alcohol policy.

It would be difficult for a freshman to imagine a large portion of the student body gathering on-campus for an enjoyable evening. They are more likely to recall in future years the fun they had at an off-campus weekend event such as a "Farm Party."

Within the last year on-campus weekend events have become as dead as Latin. While the language and the parties still exist, the number of participants they draw are minimal.

What is the reason for such a quick turnaround? The quick and easy answer is the difficulty in obtaining, and the apparent absence of, alcohol on-campus. Unfortunately, the quick and easy answer seems the most realistic.

Forty-four percent of the student body is of legal drinking age, and the national trend is toward students entering college at older ages. With such a large portion legal, common sense would tell you that drinking at on-campus events should be an option, which it is. Registered parties are allowed to serve alcoholic beverages and must serve non-alcoholic beverages as well. However, the option seems to have been mishandled.

Evidence of this has been the shift of parties from on-campus to off-campus locations. One of the town-gown issues has been the noise caused by students at parties off-campus. Some students have pointed to the tighter alcohol policy on-campus as a reason for moving off-campus.

The alcohol restrictions have had the effect of shifting the problem from the administration's jurisdiction to the responsibility of the Chestertown Neighborhood Association.

It cannot be denied that we live in a drinking society. Alcohol is served at events attended by both faculty and students, not all of which are of legal drinking age. While some students drink responsibly, assigning designated drivers, many still do not. Transportation may be provided to "Farm Parties," but not all students take that option and may drive back intoxicated.

There is serious doubt the faculty and administration meant to encourage this type of behavior, and we know some professors who have expressed concern about the possible misdirection of the alcohol policy. Students who want to drink, will, and we would rather have them drink on-campus than drink off-campus and take the risk of someone getting hurt because a student drove home drunk. So far there have been no serious injuries due to alcohol; however, students have been involved in alcohol related accidents and arrests. The policy should be updated to prevent future accidents and arrests. Even when students walk back to campus after such an event, they are not safe. Walking back alone and intoxicated has obvious cause for alarm. Besides being susceptible to attack, some students may pass out before reaching campus.

Besides individual and student organizations practicing and encouraging each student's individual responsibility to act sensibly concerning alcohol and getting home safely, more steps should be taken by the administration to encourage safe drinking on-campus. Offering free sodas may lower the amount of alcoholic drinks students consume at events. It would also encourage athletes to attend weekend events, since they would be provided with a non-alcoholic option. Another recommendation would be to discuss responsible drinking during a freshman orientation workshop or during Freshman Common Seminar.

Most students' parents realize their sons and daughters are going to drink, but how are they going to feel knowing they will be doing most of their drinking off-campus, outside the reach of supervising students, who are responsible for the on-campus events they sponsor?

Student Profile: Deidre Riegel

Deidre Riegel is a graduating senior Drama major. She has performed every function possible in the Washington College Drama Department, from actor to director, from scenic painter to master electrician, from stage manager to props master. Dei has acted in two plays, Men Without Shadows and Cyrano de Bergerac, but Dei's main field of accomplishment is in scenic design.

She has studied independently in scenic design with Professor Jason Rubin, who often designs the sets for the shows which are directed by professors, such as Antigone and Waiting for Godot. In addition to designing the set for her senior thesis project, A Dream Play, Dei has designed four other sets for senior shows. Ten Little Indians, Seascape with Sharks and Dancer, Cyrano de Bergerac, and this weekend's Pippin all got their look from Dei's drawing board.

After graduation, Dei will be taking a job at The Hill School, an all-boys' private high school in Pottstown, Pennsylvania. Hers will be a faculty position; as Technical Director and Designer for the school's enormous theatre, Dei will work on every production and teach the Tech classes. She will be provided with board, housing, and salary; yes, she will actually be making a living by doing drama.

Dei says that drama is her life, but when she came to WC, she was a Political Science major, interested in working in Latin America. She still holds an interest in Latin American history and culture, but finds her time consumed by the Drama Department. While free time is scarce for a major which requires eleven courses and a technical or acting role in every department production, Dei enjoys playing for the Drama softball team, dancing, and relaxing (ha!) with friends. Deidre lives in Birdsboro, PA, with her parents.

ART BEAT

Senior Reading

The annual Senior Reading will take place this Sunday in Norman James Theatre at 6:00 p.m. The reading is a showcase of senior writers of poetry and prose, from a variety of people, some of whom are completing creative writing theses, and some of whom are not even English majors. As the deadline for submitting material for the prestigious Sophie Kerr Prize approaches, seniors continue to complete and edit their works for consideration. The reading is an opportunity for some seniors to give one last reading of their work before both the Sophie Kerr Deadline and graduation.

The list of readers includes Kate Absher, Patrick Attenasio, John Blakelock, Amy Caddle, Jenifer Grindle, Bruce Hamilton, Raphael Koster, Troy Petenbrink. Attenasio, Grindle, and Koster are graduating creative writing theses; Grindle has a double major of English and History, and Koster double majors in English and Spanish. Hamilton is an English major; Absher a History major; Blakelock is Music; Caddle, French and Humanities; and Petenbrink is a Political Science major.

The Senior Reading is free and open to the public, and a reception will follow in the O'Neill Literary House.

Asimov Remembered

By Raphael R. Koster
Editor, OtherWorlds

A memorial reading will be held this Tuesday, April 28th, at the O'Neill Literary House, for Isaac Asimov, 1920-1992, at 7:30 p.m. A reception will follow.

Asimov was one of the foremost science-fiction authors of all time, and was the most prolific author in the world at the time of his death. His books total nearly 500, in all the Dewey library classifications. His classic SF novels include The Foundation Trilogy; I, Robot; and The Caves of Steel. He was known as "The Good Doctor" for his extraordinary amount of expertise in so many fields and for his degree in biochemistry.

Asimov was also the foremost science popularizer of the 1950's and '60's. He coined the word "robotics" and developed the rules for robotic programming that are used today. Among his other works are annotations of classics of literature (Don Juan, Shakespeare, and Paradise Lost), numerous mystery novels and stories, and several books of limericks and humor.

He held the title of Grandmaster of Science Fiction and also of Mystery, honors given by the Writer's Associations of each genre. He had won the Hugo, the highest prize of the science-fiction field, several times, notably for best all-time series for Foundation, beating out Tolkien's Lord of the Rings.

Dr. Beverly Wolff of the English Dept.; T. Michael Kaylor, Director of the Literary House Press; and Rachael Fink and Raph Koster, students, will be reading from various short stories and talking briefly about Asimov.

Vandalism Strikes WC

On April 19, the day after the Queen Anne damage, a window of one of the college's athletic vans was broken by a golf ball from a student who confused the Hodson parking lot for Pebble Beach. Damage to the window totals $420. Roderick stated a suspect has been found in this case, and a follow-up investigation is currently underway.

Two incidents of student vandalism to the college's physical plant have occurred over the past three weeks, beginning with the Literary House Slingshot Bandit. Two weeks ago, student writers began noticing several pellet-size holes in the building's front porch windows. They were apparently shot from a wrist-rocket or slingshot from the direction of the Kent dormitory across the street. Roderick expects the case to be cleared soon, but is not yet prepared to release any suspects. According to Raudenbush, replacement of the windows will cost $300. Frustrated that the Literary House's otherwise serene atmosphere has been the target of some student's unwarranted vengeance, Bob Day, Director of the Lit House, commented, "Son of a bitch is shooting out windows, what madness is that?" When asked to comment on why the suspect's name has yet to be released by Security, Day responded, "That's because they're afraid I'd tie him to a tree in front of the Lit House and read Rod McCuen poetry to him all day. That would be appropriate punishment. But then again," Day added, "he [the suspect] probably wouldn't understand it anyway."

The final act of student vandalism, the one that has Baer especially frustrated, has been the recent attacks on tree saplings around the Dorchester dormitory, across from the Casey Academic Center, where an entire row of five October Glory Maples have either been pulled out or bent to a point beyond repair.

"This [vandalism to trees] is especially frustrating, because they were just at the point of establishing themselves in the soil." The cost to replace the damaged trees, located in such a strategic viewing area along the college's new front entrance, will total $500 per tree. Baer stated that none of the college's recently planted landscaping, designed by local landscape architect John Gutting, were funded from student tuition, but from private donations. However, once they are planted they become the financial responsibility of the college. The replacement of these trees will come directly from Maintenance's budget.

"If you look at one of the aerial maps of Washington College in the library," Baer stated, "you'll notice that up until fifty years ago, there were no trees on campus. It was just barren, flat grounds. These trees need to be continually replenished." Baer stated the college has an aggressive policy towards such vandalism, but feels something still needs be done to curtail such unwarranted damage.

Not counting the recent damages, Raudenbush stated that $4400 worth of student damage to the college's dormitories has happened from August 1991 to March 1992, a figure which is actually down from last year. "We've seen everything from graffiti on the freshly painted walls of Kent to smashed windows and exit signs on the second floor of Caroline," Raudenbush stated.

When individuals are found guilty of such destruction they are personally fined. However, when no one person comes forward, the entire hall shares in financing the damage, a move that irritates innocent bystanders and unsuspecting parents. In the case of the Queen Anne sink, although the residents of the building were not responsible for the damage, the repair costs will still come out of their building's operating budget. "When we must take money out of the building's budgets," Raudenbush said, "other things that could be done with it must be sacrificed."

GEORGE BUSH HAS GOT TO GO
TO EARTH SUMMIT '92

Global warming. Destruction of the rain forests. Toxic waste. These aren't the legacies we wanted from the "environmental" President. Urge George Bush to attend the U.N. Earth Summit in Brazil in June. Right now, the United States is the only major industrial power refusing to do its part. Ask the President to stop America's role as leading producer of greenhouse gases. Tell him to support the global treaty for reducing carbon dioxide emissions, ban the exportation of toxic waste, and save the world's rain forests. The President is the only person who can effectively lead the struggle for our planet's future.

Netters May Not Net Nationals

Netters Hope for Nationals Bid

By Doug Hoffberger
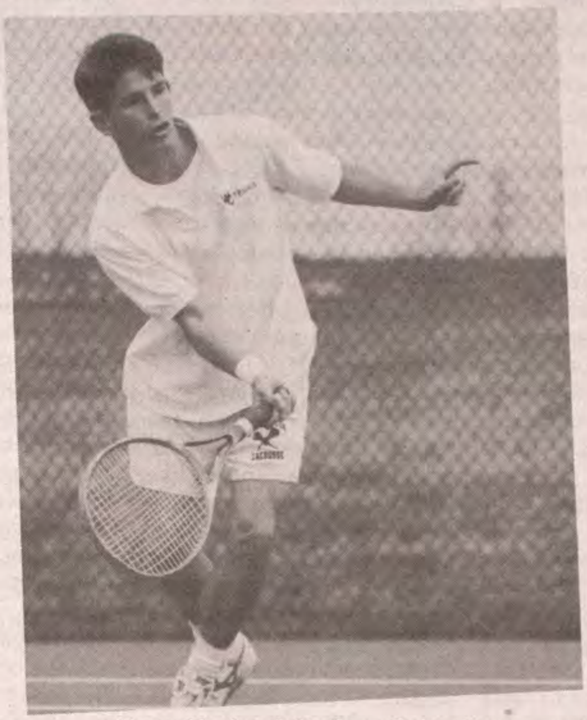
Staff Writer

Last week the Shoremen rounded out their season and etched their record in stone at 17-3, with wins over Millersville, Trenton State, and St. Mary's. The Netters go into the final stretch with a perfect 3-0 mark within the Southest MAC conference. Leading the way for the Shoremen was Trevor Hurd, remaining undefeated all season in singles, and Alberto Diaz, who also had a strong year, dropping only one match. Hartwig, Bogato, Nuno, Bohutinsky, and Rexford all had winning records as well, aiding in yet another successful outing for WC's tennis program. Meanwhile, newcomers Reardon, Raja, and Alexander all gained the experience they will need to further help the team in the future.

Last year the Netters came away from nationals with a fourth place ranking, however, in the first rankings of this season the Shoremen were spotted a disappointing 16th in the nation among Division III schools. "We didn't do quite as well as we had expected this season," Coach Tim Gray remarked. As a team, The Netters still have about a 50-50 chance of making nationals but, these chances are hampered by a 5-4 loss to Skidmore College earlier in the season. And due to that loss the question remains as to whether or not the team will visit Emory University, in Atlanta Georgia, the location of this year's nationals competition. The NCAA ranking officials choose the top twelve teams to go, and if Trinity, Amherst, and Williams, the three teams ahead of Washington College, don't participate in nationals for one reason or another they will go. Thus, if the Shoremen are to make it this season it would be on the coat-tails of another team.



Trevor Hurd curls his lips, calls his shot, and slices it down the line

Individually, the Shoremen will send Frank Hartwig, Trevor Hurd, and Alberto Diaz to compete in the 64 draw singles tournament, which is single elimination. In doubles Trevor Hurd and Alberto Diaz will enter the tournament as the 26th seed in the nation while the pair of Frank Hartwig and Emilio Bogato will enter the tournament as the 28th seed.

Yet, before the nationals tournament comes into view, the Shoremen have their eyes set upon repeating as MAC conference champions. The Netters have already won their Mid-Atlantic Southeast conference and in the first round of the championships, will play the winner of the Southwest MAC conference. Once the Shoremen tame the Southwest, they shall host the winner of the MAC Northeast and Northwest conference for the overall MAC championship.

Next Year looks promising for the Shoremen in terms of recruiting. Tim Gray has been in close contact with a top ranked Swedish junior player as well as a top notch JUCO player. The Shoremen will lose the leadership and athletic ability of the '92 captains Jeff Rexford and Andy Bohutinsky, but the recruits should help the netters retain a solid roster.

Good Luck to the Shoremen venturing to nationals this year, and, to the rest of the Shoremen, you've had a great season!

Women Netters Spank Opposition

By Rachael Rice
Staff Writer

The wins keep coming for the women's tennis team. This past Monday, they captured a third consecutive Middle Atlantic Conference Southwest sectional championship by defeating the Johns Hopkins University Blue Jays, 9-0. This convincing victory puts the women in contention for a repeat MAC title. In 1991, Washington College history was made when the team brought home the first women's MAC championship.

Miriam Ditman waves "HI" while hammering yet another "ACE"

The women found themselves a long way from the quiet fields of the Eastern Shore and on top of the Charles Street traffic in Baltimore. While emergency vehicles flew by, the team proved its ability to play hard under difficult circumstances. Tracy Peel, at #1, defeated Tamar Hausman 6-4, 6-2, while Pam Hendrickson handled Amy Dodrill at #2, 6-2, 6-0. Miriam Dittmann, at #3, lost only three games on her way to victory over Heidi Puchner, and Jen Sloan had little difficulty putting away Katie Stein at #4, 6-3, 6-1. Rachael Rice notched a Shoreman win at #5 against Margarita Rasca, 6-2, 6-3, and Kristy Karns handed Michelle Porterfield a 6-0, 6-2 loss at #6. Diana Clausen added a win at #7, 6-1, 6-0.

The women were equally devastating in the doubles, reeling off three straight-set victories. Peel and Hendrickson paired at #1 to win 7-5,6-0. Sloan and Karns came from behind in the second set to polish off their #2 opponents, 7-6 (5), 6-4. And Dittmann and Rice rounded out the win with a 6-2, 6-0 roll over Rasca and Porterfield. According to freshman Diana Clausen, "We knew we would have to play every point as if it was 4-all in the third set. Although Trenton State is just around the corner, and it is a really big match, everyone really focused, looking no further than today."

The women also faced St. Mary's this past Saturday, and came away with a 9-0 win. St. Mary's arrived one player short; thus, the Shoremen jumped ahead to 2-0 before play commenced. Peel, Hendrickson, Sloan, Karns, and Rice won at #1-5, respectively. The tandems of Peel and Hendrickson and Sloan and Karns had little difficulty in doubles. Dittmann, who was on injured reserve due to surgery of the wisdom tooth, withstood the pain to cheer from the sidelines. When asked about her probable return to the lineup, she displayed her stitches and replied, somewhat painfully, "I'll be back!"

The team now boasts a 13-4 record. The coming week holds in store Trenton State, at Trenton, on Wednesday. A victory over this top-ten (preseason national ranking) opponent will bolster hopes for a trip to the Division III national tournament. Today (Friday) at 3pm, the Shoremen fight for the MAC Southern crown. As of press-time, their opponent was undetermined, but home-court advantage was established. Come out and support the team!

Future Looking Up for Soccer

By Charlie Linehan
Co-Sports Editor

Last week, I dreamed we won our first soccer game next season. It was a good dream. Okay, it was a great dream. To tell the truth, it was one of those dreams where you wake up and realize it was only a dream and spend the rest of the day pissed off about the fact that it was only a dream.. I mean, let's face it, if it were to come true, it would be our second win since the end of the 1990 season and for the first time in I don't know how long, we'd be starting off the season on the right foot.

The game was being played on Kibler Field on an overcast Fall day late in the afternoon. We were playing Lancaster Bible and they were defending the northernmost goal in the first half. We took the field for the start of the game and as I looked around me my adrenaline was pumping—there were 11 guys on the field who were really psyched to play some soccer. Better still, the bench was packed with equally eager subs, a far cry from last season's bench—not that they weren't eager, it was just that we only had five of them during our healthiest week of the years. Good thoughts were flying through my head. It occurred to me that we might finally have a group of players who all had one thing in mind, winning soccer games. There wasn't one player out there who was more concerned with being a superstar than with making his contribution to the team's success. It also occurred to me that we didn't all have to run until our lungs collapsed and then suck it up and play out the last ten minutes of the game—we had a bench now, we could take a breather, thank God for small favors.

Then something even more amazing than having a bench happened. About five minutes into the game, we scored the first goal. We brought the ball up the left side, crossed it to the eighteen, passed it to the six, and fired it just under the diving goalie. Amazing. Last season we rarely scored, much less in the first five minutes of the game. The team was ecstatic but confident at the same time and I knew then that we would win that game. And when the buzzer went off at the end of the second half, it was 3-1 Washington.

WC Soccer has struggled for the past three years. I don't know what the problem was in '89—I decided to sit out my Freshman year, so I only heard it second hand. In '90, Peter Allen faced the impossible task of coaching a soccer team and trying to run a business at the same time. In addition, Mike Bishop was such an incredible soccer player that we depended on him too much—I know I used to pass the ball to him and watch, dumbstruck, as he dribbled past defenders like they were so many children. And then there was last year. Things started off on the right track—we got a new head coach, Todd Helbling, who, although a little inexperienced, displayed the care and determination which should help make his teams successful in the future. Unfortunately, last season we had very few recruits which made it difficult to stay in any given game for 90 minutes—not that that's an excuse, there were certainly a number of problems with the team itself which contributed to the poor record. However, at the end of the season, team morale was still in pretty good shape . . . that's something for WC Soccer, believe me.

So, where do we stand for next season. Without jinxing ourselves or getting anyone's hopes up—we've got near to twenty recruits, maybe more, and a core of returning players who aren't concerned about being superstars, just about winning games. In addition, Coach Helbling is already planning the season, a kind of preparation which has been sorely missed in seasons past. Finally, we've got a competitive but feasible schedule set up with enough games to give us the experience we need as a team.

Who knows how things will work out. To be successful, we'll need to work hard and play the season one game at a time and maybe . . . just maybe . . . we'll do alright. I don't know, I'm just tired of dreaming.

CLUB LAX LOSES TO DELMARVA

By Brandon White
Staff Writer

Last Thursday the WC Lacrosse Club went out under the lights at Worton Park to face the Delmarva Lacrosse Club. WC took control early but, the Delmarvans rallied, tied it up, and eventually took the lead. By the end of the first half WC was down by 4 goals and as the Worton mist rolled in and the minutes ticked off the clock it only got worse. WC lost its edge as Delmarva capitalized, taking a commanding lead and holding on to it for the win.

Team cohesiveness may have been lacking but Paul Obrecht managed to see his way through the mist with an outstanding performance as did John Nunn, who was excellent in the net.

This unfortunately was the WC Clubmen's last game of the year, as the rest of the scheduled teams had to cancel due to insufficient funds. The Clubmen had a record of 3-2 on the year—not bad for the club's first season. They would like to thank all of the fans for their support and Scott Bramble for his superior coaching.

Lax Sticks 1 and Drops 2

Washington's women's lacrosse team took on three teams last week: Dickinson, Salisbury State, and Gettysburg. After a powerful win over Dickinson (9-7), the Shorewomen lost to Salisbury State (11-20), and to Gettysburg (7-15).

The increasing drive and skill of Washington's defense was more than apparent against a strong Dickinson attack. Eleanor Shriver led the team on ground ball control followed by Cristin "Haircut" Albert. Shriver also stood out defensively around the crease and accompanied by Jen "J. B." Bornfriend, was a key connector at mid-field. Bornfriend's amazing speed was a great offensive asset in addition to her constant recovery of stray balls on defense. Goalie Nancy Millhouser played her most aggressive game to date, stepping out of the goal to attack her opponents and recording yet another double-digit save total.

Scoring for the Shorewomen were Amy McCleary with three goals and two assists, Margaret Doyle with two goals and one assist, Kirsten Lucas with two goals, and Brigid DeVries and Kristy Hilgartner each with one goal.

Again, the Shorewomen defense stood out in their contest against a very physical Salisbury State team. Four yellow cards were distributed, each to a different player, during the course of the game. Jen Bornfriend raced continuously from one end of the field to the next, connecting with such individuals as Amy McCleary who beat the odds of rain and numerous illegal checks to her head to score five of Washington's seven goals in the first period. But when Salisbury's defense seemed to shut McCleary out of shooting range in the second half, allowing her just a single additional goal, Margaret Doyle emerged to score a total of four goals followed by Cristin Albert with one.

Perhaps a more disappointing game for the Shorewomen was last Saturday's loss to Gettysburg. At half time, the scoreboard read an even 5-5 with Washington dominating over Gettysburg in shots as well as in overall field play. The second period, however, proved to be less successful as Gettysburg acquired ten additional goals. Kirsten Lucas commented on the outcome of the game: "We wanted the win really badly, but Gettysburg was undefeated in their region and there was no way they were going to let us take that away from them. We're definitely a first half team, and our drive in the second half just wasn't as strong as Gettysburg's team."

On the positive side, Amy McCleary recorded three more goals and two assists giving her the team lead with thirty-four goals and ten assists. A close second is Margaret Doyle with thirty-three goals and twelve assists (two goals from the Gettysburg game), followed by Kristy Hilgartner with twelve goals and four assists (two goals from Gettysburg). Way to go ladies!

Next week's issue will cover the Shorewomen's final game against Haverford in addition to a season wrap-up. Don't miss it!

The Men's Lacrosse team may be headed to the Division III Tournament on May 9 after two consecutive victories on the road. They improved their record to 9-2, placing them eighth in the rankings, after crushing Widener and Washington and Lee this past week. If the team wins against Haverford on Wednesday they would take the top spot in the MAC Eastern Division and it would put them in the conference championship which is to be played here at The Kibmeister on May 2.

Last Wednesday, the rampage began when the Shoremen crushed MAC Eastern Division opponent Widener, 31-6. Sixteen of the WAC players netted goals; Jason Paige tallied five, Matt Zarinko had four goals and two assists, Sophomore Stu Warner scored three with two assists, and Dave Lipinski also scored a hat trick that helped secure their win over the Pioneers. Peter Greene, Giles Beale, Greg Lawler, and Harris Murphy all netted two goals apiece while Brad Harris and Curtis Campbell had their first goals of their career at Washington College.

But the real test came this past Saturday as Jason Paige and Greg Lawler took the stage and answered the call against the W&L Generals by displaying their incredible offensive ability as they both scored five goals apiece and greatly contributed to the 16-10 victory. Harris Murphy, who has not played in the past six match-ups due to injury, came into the game in the second half to score two key goals that helped Washington break away from an 11-10 margin. Chris Sanchez contributed two goals of his own while Chris Cote and Ted "RADO Zinger" Greeley each netted one. At mid-field Blair Muneses proved to be a contributing factor in the win by controlling ten of the eleven face-offs.

Once again, the Shoremen showed how explosive they can be in this one and that they are strong if not stronger in the fourth quarter. While Washington netted five goals during the final and decisive period, Goalie Bill Griffin had six of his fifteen saves during this period as the defense kept the Generals scoreless.

With a win against Haverford on Wednesday and a win Saturday, the Shoremen will have a definite spot in the MAC Eastern Division championship. The game Saturday versus third ranked Salisbury State University, traditionally a huge game, will be a real test as the Sho'men buckle down and prepare for what is historically referred to as "The War on the Shore." So bring your parents and anyone else you can grab and come out to cheer the Shoremen to victory!

"Ball boy, BALL BOY?" the Vaughnster said, laughing, "Get out 'a here kid. Here's a quarter. Go get a cream soda or something."

Now. . . Let's get busy. This week's Newt's POW is. . . Amy "Big MAC Attack" McCleary. This class of '93 St. Paul's graduate is the ultimate example of an offensive juggernaut. This season alone, in just 11 games, she's tallied 35 goals and 10 assists for a total of 45 points on the year. Not only can she do the job at any given moment but she can strike just as hard when hurt. She's played the last two games of the season with an injured hand and still made her presence felt as a force to be reckoned with. Nice Job BIG MAC, LARGE FRY, & LARGE DR. PEPPER!!

With the rowers crammed into three school vans, The WC crew teams set off to spend Easter Weekend down south. Sunny Oakridge, Tennessee was the site of the Southern Invitational Rowing Association Regatta, where crews from all over gathered along the grassy banks of the river.

The Women's Varsity four started off the day's competition by placing 5th in their heat. The Novice men's Four placed 3rd in their heat with a very fast time but were not fast enough as they were unable to make it to the finals. The Lightweight Varsity Four cruised in at 2nd place in their heat and took the silver medal in the finals. The Novice Women's Four tore through their competition with a 1st place in their heat. This boat, made up of Stroke-Tonya Howell, Mary Clay Thomas, Jen Dougherty, bow-Alexandra Geller and coxswain-Amy Bortmes, finished 2nd in the finals and brought home another silver medal. The Men also raced a Varsity Pair With Cox and finished 2nd in their final. The Varsity Women's Pair Without took 5th place in the final.

This weekend will be the Washington College Invitational Regatta. Races down on the Chester start at 10:00, so come catch the WC rowers as they row against crews such as Georgetown, Trinity, Johns Hopkins, and St. Johns University.

Also at the invitational, there will be WC crew Tee shirts for sale and of course the biggest attraction, the Hot Washington College crew team (Now that's the way to spice up an article, Laura).

Be there . . . . .

May Day Tradition Still Strong At W.C.

By John Griep
News Editor

The Washington College May Day tradition began in the late 1960's with poetry readings and dancing around a Maypole. These celebrations were originally suggested by Professor Bennett Lamond. "Professor . . . Lamond's freshman English class was discussing Gerard Manley Hopkins' poem Spring, the traditions of May Day and how its rituals demonstrate that 'Nothing is so beautiful as Spring.' Caught up in the spirit of the poetry, Professor Lamond suggested to his class that they go beyond simply reading about May Day and hold a celebration of their own. On the morning of May 1, the class met outside, erected a Maypole, and welcomed in spring with wine, cookies, strawberries, and dancing. When the festivities ended, the Maypole was taken down."[1] "[A]fter a couple of years . . . [t]here was the May Pole that went astray. . . . [T]he streamer-covered contraption was left upon the campus lawn overnight. . . . Some students . . . relocated the pole to the front of Hodson Hall. . . . It was this rogue Maypole that kicked off the unlikely tradition that has had WC students stripping ever since."[2]

"In 1978 the naked May hordes of WC had reached a new level of audacity. . . . No longer content just to show themselves off to each other, [the streakers] . . . attempted to capture a new audience - the passing motorists on Rt. 213. . . . [A] mattress was tossed into the roadway to slow down the cars enough to allow groups of students to rush out into the roadway and put on a show for the visibly horrified drivers. . . . Students swarmed over the stopped cars, grabbing the hoods and shaking themselves for the benefit of those inside. One woman complained and Sheriff's Deputy LaMonte Cooke responded by driving slowly past the college on 213. . . ."[3]

Cooke's unmarked car was also surrounded, but the streakers fled when they realized a police officer was inside. Cooke hid behind a hedge and managed to grab Peter "Miami" Abronski. Students marched on the jail, chanting "Free Miami!" "By this time Cooke had called for a State Police backup and troopers from four counties had surrounded the jailhouse to keep the mob of students from attempting to breakout Abronski who was inside being escorted to a holding cell in nothing but sneakers and a sweater that someone had given him. 'So here I was,' Abronski was quoted as saying, 'going up there where all the inmates are. Boy did they love me. They loved it. They could hear all the people out on the street yelling for me.' The crowd was finally dispersed after Dean Ed Maxcy promised the group that he would get the partially clothed Abronski out of the clink if they would all go back home. . . . The deputies were more than happy to hand Abronski over to Maxcy."[4]

In recent years, poetry readings have been held in the O'Neill Literary House and nude volleyball and golf has taken place on campus. Streaking (through dorms, the library, etc.) also remains a favorite activity. "When asked his thoughts on what May Day has become, Professor Lamond responded, 'It's gross and disgusting... and I'm delighted.'"[5] Two years ago, the Chestertown Police "interrupted the annual May Day reading on charges that it was 'too loud.' They threatened that a second visit would enable them to press charges. . . . According to Director of Security, Jerry Roderick, Security then visited the Literary House after 'the noise level went up again. Security attempted to intervene before the police would have to come back, but students were not cooperative.' Roderick stated that subsequently several nude students crossed the road at the crosswalk. . . ."[6]

Phi Delta Theta Frat Receives National Charter

By Patrick Attenasio
Editor-in-Chief

After two years of existence as a probationary colony, brothers of Phi Delta Theta, a recently formed fraternity at Washington College, celebrated their final accomplishment of achieving national chapter status last Friday, April 25, in a private ceremony. The occasion took place at the First United Methodist Church in Chesterown with members from the fraternity's national headquarters and Western Maryland, WC Phi Delt's brother chapter, in attendance. A public ceremony was held at the same location the following morning for friends and parents.

What this national charter means to the Phi Delts, according to Maureen McIntire, Dean of Student Affairs, is that the fraternity now ranks equally with the college's other two official national charters, Kappa Alpha and Theta Chi. "Besides the fact that they are no longer on a probationary status," McIntire stated, "not much else changes from when they were a colony." Since their beginning as an interest group, the Phi Delts have been permitted the right to stage parties, group housing, and participate in the Greek games under their fraternity's name.

Phi Delta Theta's presence at Washington College can be traced back to the Fall of 1989, when freshman Chris Kleberg, founding member of the fraternity, was unsatisfied with the selection of Greek organizations. Said Kleberg, "My father was a Phi Delt at Texas Tech, and many of my friends were fraternity members at the University of Virginia. So I had seen first hand how organized, functional fraternities operated."

Chris Vaughn, another founding member of the fraternity along with Kleberg and Sorry Charlie Linehan, was also concerned with the condition of Greek organizations at WC in 1989. "A lot of us were afraid to join the Lambdas," Vaughn stated, "and back then the Thetas were split between the older guys, accustomed to traditional methods of initiation, and the younger guys who are in charge now...the ones who turned that frat around. And then there were the Sigs, who had just lost their charter." Both Phi Delts were concerned about joining fraternities that were not close-knit, lacked organization, or existed mainly as a drinking club. That's when the idea to start their own fraternity began.

"We [the Phi Delts] really arrived on campus at the right time," Kleberg stated. Both Kleberg and Vaughn agree the fraternity scene at WC has dramatically changed for the better since 1989. "Our presence," said Kleberg, "Along with positive changes in some of the other frats, like the Thetas, brought stability, and a new facet to the Greek system."

The founding members got the ball rolling when Kleberg's mother called the Phi Delt national headquarters, founded in 1840 at the University of Miami in Oxford, Ohio. Bob Fitzpatrick, Phi Delta chapter consultant, visited Washington College to ensure it properly represented the three ideals of the fraternity; (1) rectitude, (2) sound learning, and (3) friendship. On March 30, 1990, Fitzpatrick inducted the WC group as an official colony of Phi Delta Theta.

I would like the public to know that I am a poet first and a would-be assassin last.

-John W. Hinckley, Jr.

Well, that's all for me folks! As much as I'd like to stay in Chestertown the rest of my life and write editorials, it's time to move on to the big leagues (NOTE: I haven't exactly been called up to the majors yet, so if you own a newspaper, and are looking for a young loudmouthed editor willing to work 36 hours shifts for a reasonable salary- I'm thinking in the six figure range - then I'm your man).

At this point in the year, past editors of the ELM have often utilized their editorial space to apologize or justify their tenure's shortcomings. I, on the other hand, feel no such need for any retractions. I accomplished everything I set out to with this newspaper, but in no way accept the credit. Credit goes to where credit is due, and my illustrious staff deserves it all. As former Washington Post editor Ben Bradlee explained to me several weeks ago, hire the best people available to do the work for you. I did just that.

The roots of my staff date back to the Fall of 1990, when, unsatisfied with the current status of the WC ELM, I conjured several of my friends into launching an independent paper, This Is Not The Elm. You know the rest of the story. Griep just sort of showed up and started writing articles. I dug Justin out from underneath a pile of D & D games, and told him I needed someone who could do more with a computer than play Tetris. Pretty soon, even back then, I had Tarin doing some A&E stuff. You think she's feisty now, you should have seen her back then in Justin's dorm room at 4 am. Goebel's also been taking pictures for us since the This Is Not...days, that is when he's not stealing rocks from Route 50.

Fast forward a bit to December 1991 when I finally received the legitimate job as official ELM editor. I basked in the glory for all of two seconds before realizing that after two years of mocking the institution, I suddenly was the institution, and had better put up some impressive numbers or fear the triumphant return of Laura Hopper.

I already had Adriane, Trish, and Julie from the previous ELM staff, three women who till this day I'm not quite sure what they do, but I know they do it damn well. Adriane tells me not to worry about the budget. Trish delivers the paper on Friday mornings long before I ever wake up, and Julie, despite being an Orioles fan, takes care of everything else. I considered Tarin perfect for the A&E job, and Justin "Font-zy" Cann (un)willingly agreed to sign up as Layout Editor. Both have done a splendid job. Along with Griepy, who again just sort of showed up and started writing articles, they are in the office most of the night, and make the calls when I'm at hope writing my thesis and editorials.

Next I needed some Sports editors. For a person whose sports interest begins and ends with the New York Yankees and Jets, I could have cared less what was happening with WAC Athletics. That's why I made sure I hired probably the two largest fans of Washington College sports that ever sat in the bleachers of Cardinal Yards. I am of course referring to the Bleacher Creatures - Oh, IN YER FACE! - Spiderman and the Vaughnster, otherwise known to their mothers as Charlie Linehan and Chris Vaughn. I got to tell you, I was hesitant with this one. Vaughn's application contained the phrase "Far out!" like 17 times, and Charlie...well, he came up to me one day and -burp- said he wanted to help the Vaughnster out. Believe me, I was nervous. But they have turned out to be an absolute smash, improving probably the paper's worst section until this semester, into a weekly power-packed four page section! They're always the first ones done (hussling it on over to Newt's for a little POW payola), and are probably the most read section besides my beloved editorials!

All of us, of course, would be nothing without our writers. Each section editor had their own little clique - I think the Sports guys have something like 87 people writing for them - that continually got the job done. One thing I did not want to do with the ELM was do all the writing myself. I think through the semester we've had a total of maybe 35 to 40 students writing for us at one time or another. Of those - and you were all terrific - let me just mention the ones I worked most closely with: Amanda Burt-without a doubt, the ace of our staff. She was our most consistent news reporter, and the staff rebel. Never needed help on a story, rode everywhere on horseback, and refused pay. A week without a Burt article was like a July afternoon without sunshine; Sabrina Kenny-our very own Bricks and Mortar and Sports reporter!; Doug Smith and Chris Mihavetz-the guys we looked to in a crunch. Sure, they might be a little scary looking, but these two could deliver the goods; Mike Sapp and Smilin' Erin Page-the people who filled your days with humor and glee!; and to those who visited us every Wednesday night-Amy, Deb, Shields, Blakey, and of course, Gehrett (happy now?).

Other people I'd quickly like to thank include President Charles Trout-he took a lot of heat from me this semester, some of it deserved, but has been a great promoter of the paper, and a terrific administrator; Dr. Anderson and Dr. Brien of the Philosophy department-two of the smartest men I have ever met, and respect dearly. Get them to run for office in November; Bob Day-who will someday explain all of this to my mother; the English department-for all their collected assistance and understanding (Chaucer!); Richard Harwood-having this journalistic giant critique the ELM for me every Monday was like having sunshine on a July afternoon; and finally, Stu Neiman-for those of you who'll understand this-the man who truly gave me my start in journalism.

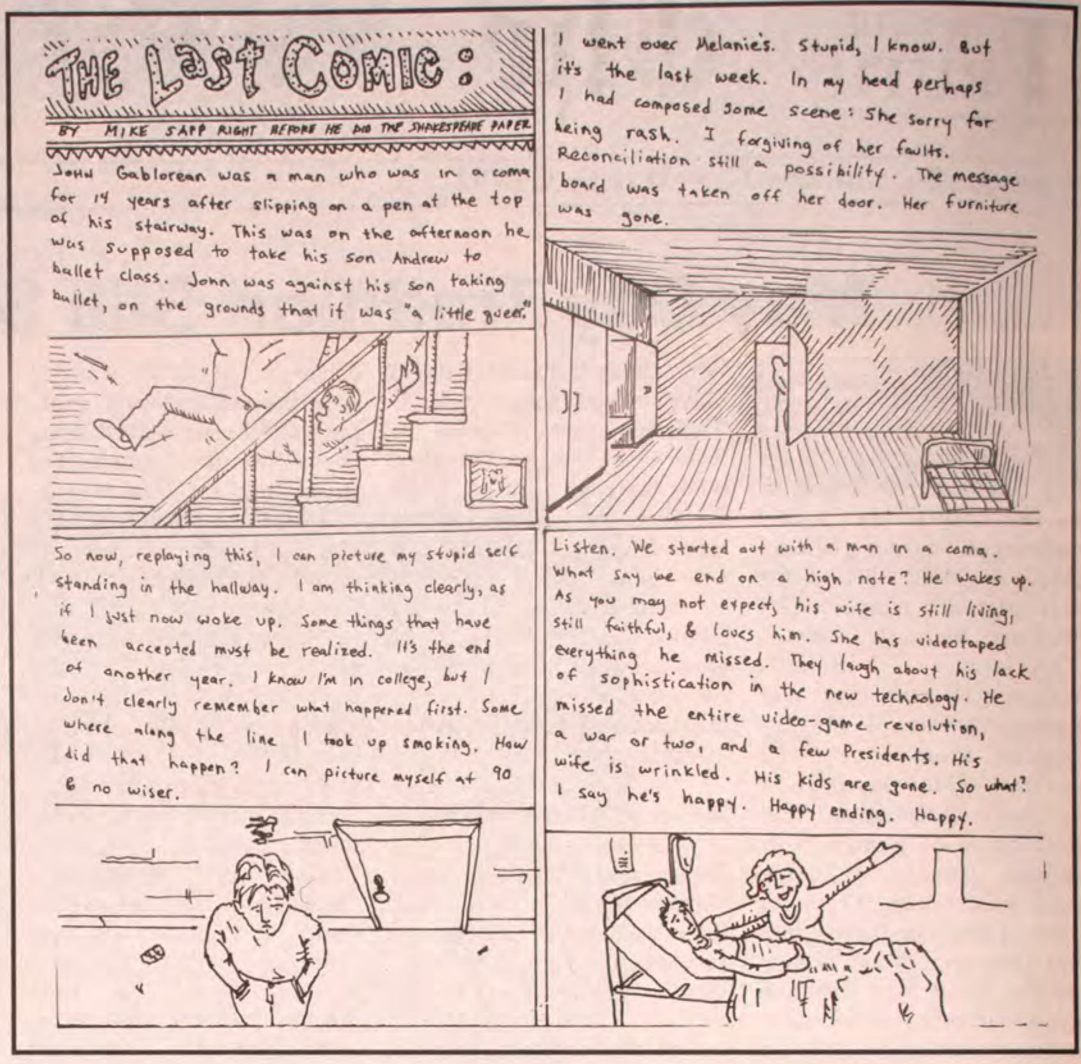
I feel like I should say one last controversial thing before I leave, so here it goes:

Congratulations to J. Tarin Towers - ELM Editor-in-Chief 92-93

I say this because, as a soon to be WC alumni, I look forward to reading Tarin's editorials next year. Watch out President Trout, she's got one heck of a backbone, and knows how to use it.

I'd also like to thank all the readers out there who have supported us over the past 14 weeks. From the get-go I understood the enormous communication value a newspaper can have on such a small college community. A quality paper could truly unite such a place, rather than alienate. You deserve a campus calendar, an SGA report, intelligent, timely reporting, fulls sports coverage, and most important, an arena to voice your opinion. For at such a place like WC, the individual's voice is still supposed to count for something. I'd like to think I did my best to reaffirm this point by resurrecting the near-dead ELM. I'd like to think my tenure will only be the beginning, a foot in the door, for the future success of the Washington College ELM. Sure This Is Not... was great fun, but this last semester has been much more satisfying.

That's about it for me. I've got tons more to say, but the red light's blinking, and so I must be going. So my friends, goodbye. Adios. Farewell. One last thing, can I keep the key to Reid Hall?



THE LAST COMIC:
BY MIKE SAPP RIGHT BEFORE HE DID THE SHAKESPEARE PAPER
JOHN Gablorean was a man who was in a coma for 14 years after slipping on a pen at the top of his stairway. This was on the afternoon he was supposed to take his son Andrew to ballet class. John was against his son taking ballet, on the grounds that it was "a little queer."
I went over Melanie's. Stupid, I know. But it's the last week. In my head perhaps I had composed some scene: She sorry for being rash. I forgiving of her faults. Reconciliation still a possibility. The message board was taken off her door. Her furniture was gone.
So now, replaying this, I can picture my stupid self standing in the hallway. I am thinking clearly, as if I just now woke up. Some things that have been accepted must be realized. It's the end of another year. I know I'm in college, but I don't clearly remember what happened first. Some where along the line I took up smoking. How did that happen? I can picture myself at 90 & no wiser.
Listen. We started out with a man in a coma. What say we end on a high note? He wakes up. As you may not expect, his wife is still living, still faithful, & loves him. She has videotaped everything he missed. They laugh about his lack of sophistication in the new technology. He missed the entire video-game revolution, a war or two, and a few Presidents. His wife is wrinkled. His kids are gone. So what? I say he's happy. Happy ending. Happy.

Letters to the Editor

Dr. Wolff on Sr. Reading

To the Editor:

The Senior Reading this year was a very fine thing. But the tone of the poetry, fiction, and prose was more pensive, more concerned with problems and weaknesses in the fabric of the world than what I remembered of the works read last year. Perhaps, as Troy suggested, this is because the outlook for this Senior Class is not especially hopeful: the arts, the economy, the environment—all seem threatened, all are threatened. I would rather believe that the literature reflects unusual awareness of the world condition—the kind of awareness that leads to action and to effective change. The Class of '92 is the first one I've seen through all four years at Washington College; what I know of some of its members helps me to be hopeful.

Criticism of Evaluation Forms

Dear Editor,

As the end of the semester draws near, faculty is beginning to hand out evaluation forms. This is the one time in the school year that I feel that I am able to contribute to the quality of the courses offered at Washington College. Also, these evaluation forms enable the students to express opinions and offer suggestions to the faculty anonymously, without fear of repurcussions.

This year, things seem to be different. On the top of the current evaluation forms is a sentence stating: "Responses are not retyped and students concerned about anonymity may wish to consider the form of their handwriting." This potentially causes a grave problem not only for the student filling out the evaluations, but for the teacher recieving them.

First, as much as the faculty and the students would hope that grades are purely objective, in reality there is a subjective influence that can not be ignored. Professors have access to a student's handwriting throughout the semester via quizzes, homework assignments, exams, etc. Professors usually recollect these assignments in order to prevent plagiarism, and therefore have an unofficial record of an individual's handwriting. Although I realize that there are sometimes hundreds of these handwritten documents in a professor's possession, handwriting is a distinctive stamp of an individual and there is that chance it would be recognized on the evaluation form by the professor. Don't try and attempt to persuade that a negative evaluation would not effect my grade marginally if I took another class by this professor. I suppose since I am right

Faculty Provide Insight on Sophie Kerr Prize

By Amanda Burt
Staff Writer

Graduation this year at WC will mark the twenty-fifth anniversary of the presentation of the Sophie Kerr Prize, the largest known undergraduate literary award in the United States. Established in 1968, the prize is given to the graduating senior who displays the most potential for pursuing literary endeavors. While there are currently no plans for a reunion of past winners, Professor Bennett Lamond, Chair of the Department of English, says that there may be a reunion organized for next year.

The ELM asked several members of the Sophie Kerr Committee to reflect on their experience with the award and found, with the exception of one, that there was a remarkable unanimity in favor of the prize and the literary opportunities that Kerr's endowment has created for WC.

Lamond has been teaching at WC since the prize was first awarded, and he explains that Kerr, a native of Denton, Maryland, was a struggling writer in the early twentieth century. Through perseverence and sacrifice, she succeeded in her writing career and continued to publish novels and short stories. When she died in 1965, her will specified that half of the interest on her bequest to WC be used for the Sophie Kerr Prize, while the other half should be allocated for scholarships, purchases of library books, and other honorable literary activities.

Lamond says that Kerr "has made the literary possibilities at WC, and we owe her a great deal." He claims that the prize only symbolizes the larger endowment, and the press often fails to recognize that her bequest is responsible for other events on campus such as workshops.

He believes that the Sophie Kerr Committee, which consists of the President of the College and the faculty of the English department, must broadly interpret what "literary endeavors" means. "We believe that the prize was meant to save writers from pragmatic difficulties. She was a struggling writer wanting to prevent others from the early days of struggling," he says. But Lamond also notes that the prize is available to any graduating senior with no stipulation as to how the money is to be used by the winner.

The amount of the prize grew to be as much as $35,000 but has recently balanced at approximately $25,000. Lamond does not feel as if the amount is excessive. "Although some people do think its excessive, I don't think so," he states. "I believe that Sophie Kerr wanted to relieve the recipient of the award of financial difficulty." He feels there is no need to split the money into several pieces so that it is available to more than one person. He claims that such an act is not feasible according to the specifications of the will. "It is not what she intended."

Dr. Nancy Tatum, a member of the department of English, was also here when the tradition of the Sophie Kerr Prize began. She also claims that while some people find the amount of money to be appalling, she finds that the prize is not excessive given the cost of graduate education today. "They worry that there are no strings attached, but Sophie Kerr didn't make any," she says. Because Kerr sympathized with what it means to have to write and provide for oneself, Tatum admits that the benefactor of the prize is given an opportunity to realize his or her literary possibilities.

She also acknowledges that Kerr's will sets wide goals. "'Literary endeavors' has to be broad in interpretation without breaking the intent of the prize," she says. Tatum notes that the money was first used to pay off undergraduate debts, while others invested the money. She claims that some recent winners were disappointed that they did not use the money more wisely and felt that it is difficult to be entirely "sane" about the prize. Tatum believes that the money is better used to advance degrees.

She is careful to say that one should not expect immediate success from the recipient of the prize. "Success comes at different times and different ways. That's a real tribute to the Sophie Kerr Prize. Generosity is when you don't tie strings." Tatum adds that Kerr's endowment has done "wonderful things" for WC, as it makes the college more attractive to potential students.

Professor Robert Day, the Director of the Creative Writing Program in the Department of English, believes that the "real prize" is the half of Kerr's bequest that benefits literary activities for the other students at WC. He lists the Sophie Kerr Scholarships enabling exceptional students to come to the college, library books, grants to the Writer's Union for literary magazines, and scholar/writer lecture series and workshops as the primary profits of Kerr's endowment.

Day arrived at WC in 1970 and claims that the Sophie Kerr Prize has consistently sought out good students and enhanced the literary program at the college. "My impression is that the prize has helped virtually all of its recipients and done exactly what Kerr intended," he says. Day notes that the prize has been imitated by "no less a philanthropic luminary than James Michener." The Michener Awards at the University of Iowa were modeled on the Sophie Kerr Prize.

"Students who don't win the prize form an honor roll of students who are successful in literary endeavors," he says. "Students who have been active finalists in the past have gone on to be publishers and editors, and scholars in Universities. It is to the credit of the other half of the prize that this happens."

Dr. Thomas Cousineau is among the faculty of the English Department, and he admits that the Sophie Kerr Prize together with the other half of the endowment is important for WC. However, he does believe that the Sophie Kerr Prize is an award based upon an expectation of an achievement. He notes that an award is usually given either in recognition of or in expectation of an achievement. "Students don't feel obligated to fulfill that expectation. The award has been most useful for students going on to graduate work which is not necessarily in the field of creative writing."

Though he does not have personal experience with students, his impression is that there is a lot of competition among students for the prize that breeds enmity and anger. "I really do believe that anyone who has any real talent doesn't care about external awards. A real writer will be indifferent to winning or losing the prize. In the past when I've heard that a student was angry at not winning, I've taken that response as a sign of lack of talent," he says.

Because he does not think that anyone deserves the excessive amount of money, he feels that a terrible injustice is not done if one of his candidates was not the recipient of the prize. He admits that the committee work is extremely difficult, as he is unfamiliar with the emotional impact of the competition on the students. Whenever he has disagreed with a decision in the past, he believes that the decision was justified on the basis of objective merit and not for political reasons.

As a new member of the Sophie Kerr Committee, President Trout understands

1991 Sophie Kerr Prize Winner Tells What It's Really Like

Rob Thompson

When President Trout handed me the envelope at graduation last year, he said, "Congratulations." I took the envelope with my left hand, shook his hand with my right and I said, "holy shit," which isn't very eloquent at all. Nobody heard me except for him. I did not write $24,950 worth of short stories and articles in my four years at Washington College, but thanks anyway. I'll take it.

Few seniors seem to care enough about the prize to submit a portfolio. Why, on this task (reading portfolios) do we suddenly decide to give the English department a break? Why aren't there more portfolios for them to read? Is everyone at W.C. already so rich that a large sum of money is not worth the effort? Is everyone so clairvoyant that they know for sure, at age 21, that they will never write anything worth reading? Don't be stupid. Make something up. That's what fiction is all about.

Just as the prize shouldn't change your outlook on life before you win it, it shouldn't change your outlook after you win it either. It is a pat on the back from some professors - a finite pile of money - but your writing does not magically change.

To tell you the truth, nothing bores me more than talking about the Sophie Kerr Prize. No, I have not published anything yet, but I will. Don't you worry about it. Yes, I have done a good bit of writing, and I'll go back to school when I'm good and ready to do so.

Here's how I spent what I spent so far:

1 St. Croix 9 weight fly fishing outfit.

1 cap for my pick up truck.

Taxes. ($5,500)

Happy Meals.

2 plants. Both plants are legal. Their names are Marcy and Kevin.

1 Hoover Double Duty 300 Wet Dry Mini-Vac. This is actually a glorified dust buster. It takes 16 hours to charge, but it loses that charge after five minutes of actual busting. I empathize.

Rain gear for Alaska. Alaska is the noisiest place in the world. It is full of loud float planes, and chain saws, and all manner of very loud boats. Don't go there for peace and quiet. I was almost run over by "The Love Boat" there.

I bought other stuff, too. Jonathan Newell wants to sell me the rest of his CD's to support his rafting habit. Well, that's enough of that. Hey! Would you be interested in a subscription to the Maryland Gazettte. . .

Faculty Reflect on Sophie Kerr Prize that the faculty of the English department takes the Sophie Kerr competition with "the greatest seriousness." Last year was the first time that Trout participated in the evaluation process of the committee. "Reading the Sophie Kerr Prize submissions was incontrovertable evidence that a great deal of positive activities are happening on campus," he says.

Trout admits he was impressed with the quality of observations made by the committee and found the whole process reassured him that WC has valuable faculty and students. "The work of the leading contenders was staggering in its excellence. I came away with feelings of great pride about student's accomplishments," he says.

He adds that the prize is very peculiar and unique to WC and that the college should showcase the competition more than it does. "I don't think the money is too excessive," he notes and explains that the money is important, as it provides recipients with an important freedom from financial responsibility.

"The prize says something symbolically about what we think is important for young people to be doing," he says. "It's a symbol of one's intellectual growth and attainment beyond WC's years."

Dr. Richard C. DeProspo, Associate Professor for the Department of English and Chair of American Studies, is the one dissenting voice among members of the Sophie Kerr Committee. DeProspo says he will attend the committee selection meeting but will neither participate nor vote for any candidate. He is concerned with the effect of the competition on those who do not win and claims that the entire process is extremely harmful for students.

"Students are encouraged to turn into servile sheep in their relations with the English faculty. They are encouraged to be cut-throat competitors with other students, and the English faculty turn into smug, pompous authoritarians to students,"he says.

DeProspo cites a Mark Twain quotation stating that "nobody with a weak stomach should be forced to watch either a sausage or laws being made." Similarly, he believes that no one should be forced to watch Sophie Kerr winners being made. "It poisons all relationships between students and English faculty," he states.

Three years ago DeProspo suggested altering the prize in order to make it less of a contest and more of an award, or scholarship. His idea was to distribute three ten thousand dollar grants that would require the English department to supplement the income. While DeProspo says he is aware that this would require Kerr's will to be broken, he claims that numerous other wills have been broken. "How could we be accused of breaking the will with a malign interest? If the English department is worried that some 31st cousin in Denton is going to sue for breaking the will, I think that cousin has more to sue about now considering the damage the prize has done," he says.

When he presented his alternative idea, DeProspo claims that the Chair of the English department threatened him with serious reprisals. "I agreed to continue to pretend to be clairvoyant and determine what single graduating student had the most literary potential even though I had become increasingly convinced after fifteen years that the prize and its aura did harm to students, encouraged the worst kind of elitism and philistinism and was against literary endeavors," he states.

DeProspo admits that he is hesitant to speak openly with the ELM. "The situation is so injurious to students that I'm reluctant to talk to the ELM. I fear reprisals to students who carry my message and people who report what I say. I feel as if talking candidly exposes students to retribution."

He conveys to all Sophie Kerr Prize contenders that he has removed himself from the process. "I want all aspirants to know that I have nothing to do with annointing the Sophie Kerr winner anymore because I don't want my relations with the students I value most to continue to be corrupted."

Evaluation Forms

"Forms," from 2

handed, I could fill out the evaluation form with my left. In this case, there is no reason to worry, as the professor wouldn't be able to read my comments.

Secondly, as in other professional areas, evaluations are used to determine promotions, raises, and possible changes that would improve performance. As students, we are the most qualified to make these evaluations and the fear of being identified may influence the honesty placed in the comments. Therefore, the faculty may not be recieving accurate feedback and ultimately the level of academic professionalism may be compromised.

I hope that hand written evaluation forms will not become standard at Washington College. An alternative solution may be to install a folder on the computer network with a standardized class evaluation form. Students then could type their comments. This would protect anonymity, while omitting the work of retyping the forms.

Sincerely,
Tanya L. Cunic

WC Officials Discuss May Day

marked, "From the Middle Ages and the Renaissance to the present, the Feast of the May has been a time to celebrate regeneration. With so many positive developments at Washington College, it seems appropriate that we jubilantly commemorate rebirth. At the same time, the average person in town will not understand the more picturesque aspects of this moment. I would implore one and all to be sensitive to tasteful conduct."

Dean Maureen McIntire commented, "The risk, obviously, has to do with the institution's proximity to 213 and the concern about students crossing 213 and traffic hazards, etc., as well as some almost parental-type concerns that have to do with numbers of students on the campus with not just bare feet. In the past, we have had kids who've gotten caught and one thing or the other, so there is that concern about a certain safety concern involved.

May Day is one of those funny events on this campus . . . it probably comes as close to being a traditional activity . . . there have been May Day activities on this campus since I came to the institution. They have taken on a different character almost every year, from things that were purely rooted in an academic tradition to things that were very unpleasant in nature . . . years in which large numbers of naked students were running down 213 and really making both traffic hazards and very poor relationships with the community . . . where students have been arrested as a result of their participation in May Day. Those represent the two extremes. Basically, the May Day celebration has fallen somewhere in between those two extremes. By and large, students have stayed on the campus and it's been a kind of student event without much institutional sanction or disapproval.

My concern this year, specifically, as it relates to May Day, would be the same concern that I would have about the potential for any large event is that it falls between the two days of senior comprehensives. I see that as the issue here, that for many of our seniors their chance at graduating depends on their success on their senior comprehensives. I would hate to think that anything would be more important to our student body than that."

Washington College Security Director Jerry Roderick stated, "One thing about May Day that everyone should understand is that running around naked is against the law and is subject to arrest by local police jurisdictions. What we want students to understand is that they should limit such activity to nighttime hours. Often we get complaints from motorists about students running around during the day and that gives the college a bad image and isn't good for town-gown relations.

May Day activities causes me a lot of concern because of often careless behavior by students. It is well known in this community that this event occurs every year and therefore if attracts some local people. And we've had problems every year with these people on campus. With the student body mixing with a group of observers . . . often tempers flare and some assaults take place.

We understand that it is May Day and students want to carry on their traditional activities, however, we're more concerned about students who are under a lot of pressure preparing for senior comps and final exams. Obviously, May Day activities become noisy and disruptive to those students preparing for their end of semester obligations. We are not going to allow activities to carry into the wee hours of the night this year. We're asking for everyone's cooperation in keeping the event within reason. . . . After midnight, we'll come in and say it's time to break it up and quiet the campus again. Certainly we don't condone this behavior nor do we support it. It is risky behavior and we ask that everyone act with extreme caution."

Phi Delts Get National Charter

bers, the fraternity faced many obstacles at first as a brand new organization. Said Kleberg, "We had a three year period to write our chapter's by-laws. In other words, we had three years to figure out what we wanted these to be." Added Vaughn, "We lacked consulting with other fraternities on campus about their by-laws. We went mostly on the hearsay of others...other Phi Delta chapters in the country."

"We didn't know anything at first," Kleberg stated. "We didn't have any alumni support, we were on our own. All we had was just our consultants."

The Phi Delts encountered further difficulties when of their original fourteen members, four dropped out, either for financial reasons, or to transfer to other colleges. However, the fraternity had the strongest pledge class of the Spring Rush 1991, with thirty members. "We were then on track to becoming a strong colony," Vaughn stated. "That first pledge class was a big obstacle for us, considering we had never done it before," said Vaughn, adding, "We had to decide what we wanted as far as an initiation went...how we were going to eliminate the traditional form of hazing. So, we decided that whatever a pledge does, so too does his big brother."

"Of the fraternities three ideals," Vaughn added, "We really stress friendship." Kleberg agreed, stating, "All of us are good friends. But that doesn't mean we come from just one element of the campus population. We are looking for well-rounded individuals, a good mix of guys, to continue on with the Phi Delt tradition."

The Phi Delts received their national charter this past weekend by successfully proving they could operate to headquarter's standards, while keeping their finances in order. To accomplish these goals, the fraternity had to complete the draft of their by-laws.

"Our main concern now that we have reached our original goal," said Vaughn, "Is not to fade away. We want to keep the same ideals, the same pledge standards, impress our new members of what this fraternity was formed for." Kleberg agreed, adding he is confident the Phi Delts will continue to

Are we ready?

> "If you feel you have both feet planted on level ground, then the university has failed you."
> - Robert F. Goheen

Julie Greene

Many seniors have reached a point of internal conflict where they cannot decide whether they are glad to be out of here or they feel they are not yet ready for the real world. These fears and doubts are not unlike the ones which plagued us as freshmen.

We all know to expect to survive the period of readjustment; we are just hoping it will be as painless as possible. Our real concerns are whether or not the education and experiences we have had at Washington College will support our future endeavors. We may be experiencing feelings of inadequacy, insecurity, and unpreparedness as we wonder if we will remember all we learned. We are leaving college with more questions than answers. But that's okay. It's expected.

Like entering adulthood, joining reality does not mean automatic stability. The human race is still evolving, due largely to its undying curiosity. Along with this curiosity comes the ability to adapt. As freshmen, we were beginning our own personal era of independence. Wondering how we would discover our self identities, we learned that the values taught to us by our parents were not left at home; they shape our futures. Like those values, our education and experiences at WC will influence our futures, in whichever direction we choose.

Hopefully we also learned that no one is infallible or omnipotent. We found all too often that professors and administrators are people with their own deadlines and goals. Students must learn to represent themselves actively if they want to see the goals they envisioned completed. The experiences we have had negotiating with the faculty and administration should serve us well when we try to deal with our contemporaries and superiors in our careers.

Most importantly, we should remember the friendships that were created and maintained through our undergraduate years, especially the unexpected ones. Too many times people make character judgements quickly without an objective basis. It will serve us well to remember that not every situation is merely black or white, and to allow some degree of time and tolerance when we confront our conflicts. Without the support of our friends, as well as our families, the tasks at hand would never have been accomplished.

Gerard Manley Hopkins

Moonpile

Hey freshmen! Do you remember when you didn't want to go to the prom, because it was going to be so lame, but your mom (or your 'significant other') talked you into it by saying, "If you don't go you'll regret it." So you went, and you had a really bad time anyway. I mean people were lined up at the doors to get out of there, that's how bad it was. Mostly people just wanted to get to the after-prom party at the house of some poor schlep whose folks left for prom week (duh). This immediately prompted all of his friends to plan a party in the house with seven kegs and two hundred people, all of them experimenting with cigarettes an beer, and only finding out that the cherry makes a neat hole in anything made of polyester.

Well, I kind of understand where your mom was coming from. She'd been to her own prom, and it had been a blast for her, but that was in those innocent(?) days when the dance was most of the fun. She genuinely did not want you to miss so much fun. She just didn't realize that dances like that, or the Birthday Ball, really bite.

And you did it again, you said, this time to yourself, "If I don't go to the Birthday Ball, I'll really regret it." And you did regret going, and your tux or dress cost you umpteen hundred bucks that could have just as easily gone to cigarettes and beer, and didn't fit anyway, causing you to fidget, or convincing you that you were fat.

So I'm going to say it to you, even though by now you've probably learned the lesson, "Come to May Day, and come nekked, or you'll really regret it. Besides, this time the suit is free, it fits perfectly, and it will last a lifetime." And you won't come, because you know what "you'll regret it" means (but if you will come, stop reading now, take off your clothes and join me in some vollyball).

Now me, I'm stupid. By May Day of my freshman year I still hadn't learned the lesson. I found myself in the showers of First Floor Caroline, thinking, "If I don't strip, I'm going to regret it."

Of course I was already nekked, being in the shower and all, so I stepped out of the shower, and dryed myself off with my towel. Instead of wrapping that towel around my waist, as was my usual practice, I simply strode proudly out of the showers and back to my room. On the way, I passed a girl who lived on my hall, who I was not particularly embarrassed to be nekked in front of (She'd tucked me into bed a few times when I was so drunk I could not move). She laughed at me, of course, and I closed the door in my room.

I was caught in a quandary. Embarrassment had set in, yet I still wanted to participate. I decided on a transitional stage; I borrowed a miniskirt from another girl on my hall. Clad in that, and nothing else, I ventured forth into the evening.

I arrived at the Lit House theater deck and began to dance with the many non-nekked people there. I was mildly confused. Why weren't these people nekked? Apparently, it was just not late enough. One person was nekked however, and everybody laughed at my miniskirt get up. Other people that didn't notice thought that I was wearing a brown towel.

So we start some reading, and the cops came because we were being to loud in cheering on the readers. People formed a human wall around the nekked person and me. I think I'd rather be nekked and in jail, than in jail in a miniskirt and nothing else. The cops went away, and eventually I doffed the skirt entirely, just as other people were beginning to become nekked. Other craziness ensued.

I was forever a different person after that night. I am a firm believer in what your mom told you. Many of you will not take off all of your clothes and prance around today. When you are forty, you will regret it. Since you have learned your lesson from the Birthday Ball and your mom, I will put it so that you can understand it, "Don't strip for May Day, or you'll regret it."

Four Years of the ELM

Julie Greene

The past four years of journalism at Washington College have culminated into what looks and reads like a real campus newspaper. Besides surviving five editorships and three underground rivals, in its attempt to serve the changing interests of the student body the ELM has accepted considerable criticism and has returned to its first degree caliber of journalism.

Small newspapers tend to reflect the style of the editors, mainly the editor-in-chief, and this has been especially true of the ELM. This may be considered an issue of criticism by some readers, but for such an intimate operation it is necessary to set the tone and succeed with a cooperative effort from all.

Four years ago, Jennifer Harrison had the monumental task of succeeding Andrea Kehoe in the editorship of this paper. Harrison maintained the ELM's respectability, with the content continuing to be a good mix of campus, national, and international news.

When Susan DiLeo took over the reins in the fall of 1989, the paper added a new regular beat, the police report. While it received considerable criticism, it was also seen by many as a positive reinforcement to student responsibility. As the Cater administration faded out, and the new president prepared to move in, the staff hoped for a greater give and take relationship with the President's Office.

The next academic year was a good year for journalism on campus. Although the ELM was bombarded for criticism concerning its poor grammar and layout, the weak features, the cut and paste art, and the increasing amount of syndicated articles in its pages, journalism on-campus was thriving. At the time it may not have been seen by the members of the staff as positive, but the birth of This Is Not The Elm was the best thing that could have happened to the ELM.

This Is Not The Elm, and later OffSET, showed the potential a student newspaper could have on this campus. Besides carrying real campus news (The ELM that year was a puppet of the SGA presidency), for the first time in years format became a newly discovered tool of journalism.

After a dismal year, the Board of Publications decided not to hand the editorship to another senior, since they feared a senior's heavy workload would interfere with the quality of the ELM. The truth is it is usually the other way around, with the paper controlling the editor's life and study schedule. Sophomore Sherry Menton joined the ELM staff and proceeded to shape it into a once again respectable publication. The additions of the Weekly Absurdity and Josephine the Fly columns added some editorial flair to the paper.

This semester witnessed a turning point in the ELM's history as Patrick Attenasio changed the direction of the campus paper while bringing a fresh look to the ELM. Besides experimenting with the banner and occasionally adding color, fewer jumps between pages were necessary to read through an article.

While abandoning national and international news unless it was relevant to student life and campus activities, Attenasio focused the ELM on campus news. News which had been present all along, but which had not been covered thoroughly in the past. Beats were assigned and regular news features included SGA and faculty meetings, and in-depth interviews with students and faculty.

Opinion editorials once again were potent, contrary to the weak featuresques of the past year. ELM staffers were not only reporting accurate facts and interviewing multiple sources, but interpreting the news for the campus community.

The Sports section has seen many dramatic changes over the years. This year marks the return of the Player of the Week, reminiscent of the Athlete of the Week during 1988-89. Not since Carter Boatner's supervision has the ELM seen such a strong sports section. Sports now dominates the back page with energetic photos of powerful athletic campus characters.

To counterbalance the Player of the Week, the Arts & Entertainment section has begun recognizing students with academic and artistic talents, who are featured in the Student Profile. Meanwhile, the campus calendar has changed over the years from a descriptive article to an accurate and brief listing of events related to the campus.

With the new appearance as well as solid content the ELM has featured this year, the revival of journalism on-campus could be considered by many to be at its peak. The hope is that it has only begun and that the future editors will continue to explore and improve upon the ELM's stature and the quality of news it represents.

The one consistency among the editors of the ELM over the last four years has been the complaint on deadline night, "Where are the letters to the editor?" Let's hope the new consistency is accuracy and integrity.

This Is Not A Commentary

John Griep

The last commentary I wrote (OffSET, Feb. 14,1991) probably cost me the election for SGA Treasurer (which was undoubtedly for the best since I have enough trouble balancing my own checkbook).

On our wall in the ELM office, we have a quote from Hippolyte de Villemessant, which states: "A journalist whose writing does not stir up either a lawsuit or a duel is a bad journalist." I am afraid we let ol' Hippolyte (and my mother) down. My mother told Pat and me that she liked our underground newspapers better. She feels that we have been less aggressive - less controversial - since we joined "the system." I like to think that we didn't become less aggressive, but that we did become more responsible. In our journalism course, we spent several sessions discussing objectivity. This Is Not The Elm and OffSET were not objective. I'm not sure if underground college papers should be. However, I do think that the official college newspaper must be. This is not to say that we should cater (no pun intended) to the administration's wishes. And I think it is clear that we have not been a mouthpiece for the administration. Mail delays, handicapped access, tuition increases, Native American artifacts (what do you mean, it's not newsworthy?), and the KKK debate all come to mind.

Objectivity and Budgets

I have been responsible for writing articles about the budget this semester. Last week I discussed the budget "freeze." During my interview with Gene Hessey for that article, he mentioned that the ELM's budget is the one that is in real trouble. Unfortunately, this is very true.

The last figure I saw had us about $17,000 in the red. I am not sure how long the ELM has been operating with a deficit; however, I recall that one of Laura Hopper's goals in 1990-1991 was to reduce it, so it's been around for several years at least. And probably longer. Professor Wright (Business Department) has been asked to work with next year's staff and Hessey to develop a plan to eliminate the deficit and put the paper on a sound financial footing.

I see several reasons why the deficit may have increased this year. First, the paper has been consistently 12 pages, with one 8-pager and four 16-pagers. In the past, the majority of the issues have been 8 pages. Second, in addition to increased printing costs as the result of a larger paper, printing costs in general have also risen.

One solution would be to increase the amount of the student activity fee which goes to the newspaper. The SGA recently doubled its budget for next year, with more moderate increases planned for the next two years. How long has it been since the ELM budget has increased? And should it be increased in a period of economic recession? These are the questions which Wright, Hessey, and others must ask.

I also want to take this space to thank all the writers who have made my job a lot easier:

Amanda Burt, who never failed to amaze us with her ability to get more from a story than we ever thought possible; Doug Smith, for whatever it was he did; Chris Mihavetz, who came on late but came on strong; Sabrina Kenny, who got stuck writing about bricks and mortar and managed to do it with pizazz; Jenn Reddish, who gave us articles (with photos) out of the blue and who (to my knowledge) has never set foot in the ELM office; Scott Koon, for his guest commentaries; Chris Spezio and Adria Nesberg, for their collaborative and individual pieces; and whoever I may have missed. And I especially want to thank Martha Kimura. Careful readers of the ELM may have noticed that Martha, who covered the neighborhood beat for us at the beginning of the semester, has not written for the paper for several months now. Martha took a leave of absence from school at the end of February and is currently residing in Texas with her sister. We all have missed her greatly. The rest of the semester has not been as fun without her. (Smile, Martha.)

Beastie Boys Are Back to Check Your Head

By Doug Smith
Staff Reviewer

Anyone who listened to Paul's Boutique more than twice and realized the true genius contained within it can skip ahead to the top of the third paragraph. Anyone who didn't, or anyone who played it once and filed it among the records they bought when they were in junior high and never listen to anymore, or records they bought because the cover looked cool but the music was lame, or because the band used to be really good but isn't anymore: this part is for you. "The Beastie Boys? Yeah, 'Fight for Your Right' is cool. That other album they did, that kinda sucked though."

The musical progression from License to Ill to Paul's Boutique is one as distinct and as great as the one from Meet the Beatles to Abbey Road,[1] or for that matter, the one from Beethoven's first noodlings on the piano to the Ninth Symphony. Paul's Boutique easily eclipses anything else released in the 1980s, and its dense wall-to-wall samples summed up the rest of rock and roll history and provided a running commentary on popular culture.[2] And yet the album barely went gold. Great art is never appreciated in its own time. The best kept secret in music today is the fact that the B-Boys are the most innovative and "progressive" band around, simply because they were unable to shake the stigma of their first album.[3] Many of License to Ill's fans were unable to adjust to the subtlety of Paul's Boutique, and many listeners who would have otherwise appreciated the album blew it off because they couldn't believe that kind of album could come from that kind of band. These two disparate groups of people have two things in common, however: they missed out on the greatest record ever made, and they are idiots.

The general consensus these days is that the funkiest band around is the Red Hot Chili Peppers. This is a gross misconception: with the exception of Flea, the Peppers don't have enough funk to fill a thimble. Between them. Anthony Kiedis, especially. He can't sing; he can't rap. He tries to do both. Vocally weak, lyrically crippled,[4] but he's a founding member. They can't kick him out. Sorta like that thing with Def Leppard and their drummer.[5] The rest of the Chili Peppers, I guess I got no real beef with them. Personally, I say, get rid of Fishboy and bring in "Diamond" David Lee Roth, but that's just my opinion, you know?

To get back on track, the point I was trying to make was that the Beastie Boys are back after three years to claim their rightful title as the funkiest rock band around, and send Anthony Kiedis running home to his mother. "Yeah, right," you might be saying. "They're rappers, man. They ain't no rock band. They don't even play their own instruments. And don't be dissin' on my man Anthony." Bullshit. Before they put out License to Ill, the B-Boys were a hardcore band. And on Check Your Head, the new album, they actually play.[6] And they're a tight band. They don't have the ass-so-tight-they-shit-diamonds bland precision of the Chili Peppers, but so what? Check Your Head's grooves are looser, funkier, a garage band Funkadelic. They sure ain't no Body Count.[7]

As Adam Brown, noted Beasties fan and critic, pointed out, the direct link to Check Your Head is Paul's Boutique's "Looking Down the Barrel of a Gun". Expect a fuller exploration of that sound when you pop the new album in. The songs range from heavy raps like "Pass the Mic" (the single) and "The Maestro", whose opening is reminiscent of hardcore rap acts, to hardcore grunge like "Gratitude" and "Time For Livin'", with a handful of originals like "Pow" and "In 3's", the latter of which borrows its bass line from a section of Paul's Boutique's "B-Boy Bouillabaise". Instrumentals? On a rap album? Yeah. And Anthony Kiedis wouldn't paint himself silver until his mother said it was alright.

Check Your Head is remarkably sample free. Aside from an occasional lift from Jimmy Walker or Cheap Trick, most of the sounds are generated by the band, and easily played live.[8] Instead of trying to identifying riffs, listeners can relax a little and enjoy the music.[9] Any samples, musically, are self-conscious allusions to rock and roll history. "Lighten Up" is reminiscent of the mellow organ-heavy songs on the second half of Exile on Main Street, and "Mark on the Bus"'s opening is an updating of the intro to Hendrix's "Rainy Day, Dream Away". The record sounds like a cross between the soundtrack to an unreleased Cheech and Chong movie and the lost demo tapes of the band who wrote the theme songs to all those early seventies TV shows like "Sanford and Son" and "Barney Miller".

The question on the lips of all the hardcore Beastie fans is, of course, "What about the raps, man?" Lyrically, the album is stupendous. Rappers since the Sugar Hill Gang (remember them?) have been attempting to outdo each other boasting about themselves, and comparing themselves to everything from Oreo cookies to Captain Kirk. On "Pass the Mic", Ad-Rock ends the debate. "So whatcha got to say that I don't know already?/ I'm like God, and I'm rockin' steady," replaces Big Daddy Kane's "So full of action, my name should be a verb" as my vote for the lyrical high point of rap. Until now, nobody's had the balls to compare themselves with the Big G; then again, nobody until now could get away with it.

Another classic is, "You got the boomin' system but it's slicing out doo-doo/ You think it's chocolate milk, but it's watered-down Yoo-Hoo," from "Professor Booty".[10] The B-Boys even allude to their own work: "The Blue Nun" seems to be a little something to wash down Paul's Boutique's "5-Piece Chicken Dinner".[11] And no album is complete without Ted Nugent squaring off with Biz Markie ("The Biz Vs. The Nuge").

This is not a critique: it is merely a review. The verdict? Buy, beg, borrow, steal a copy of Check Your Head. Drag out your dusty unlistened-to copies of Paul's Boutique. Hell, even License to Ill is a good place to start. The Beasties are one of the few bands that consistently puts out great albums, and probably the only band versatile enough to make such incredible leaps in style and pull it off. Each record demonstrates the ability to embrace and master a completely different area of music.[12] However, there isn't enough room to provide more than a rough overview of the Beastie Boys' chef d'oeuvre here, and it's time to put the needle back in the groove for the twelfth time today. If you wrote off the B-Boys, you oughta get your head checked. Here's your chance. So what are you waiting for? Get the fuck outta here.

[1] NOTE: "Sounds of Science" on Paul's Boutique samples the guitar riff from Abbey Road's "The End", and the last song, "B-Boy Bouillabaise", is actually ten or so songs seamlessly stitched together à la the McCartney medley at the end of Abbey Road's second side. It is almost impossible to improve on the Beatles. Repeat: almost.

[2] Somebody somewhere wrote that James Joyce's Finnegan's Wake contains parodies of sentences that haven't been written yet. I propose that Paul's Boutique samples songs that haven't been recorded yet.

Sick & Twisted Festival of Animation

By Andrew Stone
Staff "Sick & Twisted" Reviewer

Now I myself can be said to have a rather twisted sense of humor, and I may be known to ramble on about some topic which may not be particularly enjoyable to some. But when I saw the "Festival of Animation: All Extra Sick & Twisted" in Georgetown late last week, I finally realized "Hey! Maybe I will get a job after college!" I mean, I don't know how much these animators make a year, but I'll be damned if they aren't enjoying it!

The Animation Festival was held at the Key Theatre in N.W. Washington D.C., right in the heart of Georgetown, and contained some of the most graphically strange, erotic, bizarre and downright gross short films I have ever seen. And while in some cases the artistic value went from hauntingly beautiful to strangely unique to incredibly simple, none of them dropped a beat in imagination. About twenty films were shown, ranging from one to ten minutes, and each had a uniquely bizarre plot.

Striking films that stick in my mind were such films as "Deadsey", created by David Anderson. This short film seemed hauntingly strange with combinations of computer-like graphics as well as actual drawings. "Lullaby" by Ken Bruce was more of a sick vision of a young child tormented by a stuffed giraffe which tries to eat him. "Pink Komkommer (Swedish for cucumber)" was a joint between eight different artists, all with their own bizarre, sexual perversities and all to the same soundtrack.

But by far the most disgusting films were by Mike Grimshaw, whose "Quiet Please" and "Deep Sympathy" were rivalled only by each other. The first, which consisted of a loud guy who screams profanities and does various disgusting things, was probably surpassed by the second, which had to do with a fake priest who takes perverted liberties with a dead woman. In general, the entire festival had to do with the dangers of inbreeding, questioning the sexual persuasion of the Lone Ranger, and the maiming of children, animals, and just about anyone in the vicinity.

If I could, I'd say "Hey, a must see!!" But unfortunately, the last night was last Thursday. Too bad, it was great! But don't worry, just look in the papers for the Key Theatre, or the Biograph, both of which occasionally show animation festivals of different types. Both are located in Georgetown. To quote one of the film credits: "To those who disapprove but continue to watch."

Beastie Endnotes

noises, and they don't call themselves "Live", who incidentally are about to go on the road with a band called "In Concert". Basically, "progressive" music seems to be split between the equally stagnant Cure, a bunch of guys who have been churning out the same riff for ten years while Robert Smith (no relation) waxes melancholy over the stupid haircut he can't seem to shake, and REM, a bunch of redneck art-school dropouts fronted by the vapid Sassy pretty boy Michael Snipe and who are lauded by people who think playing three chord songs, mumbling lyrics into intelligibility, and ripping off the Byrds' guitar sound is being original. Recycle this, buddy.

[4] The Beastie Boys kick lines like "You're all mixed up, like pasta primavera/ Yo, why'd you throw that chair at Geraldo Rivera?" ("What Comes Around") or "Long distance from my girl, and I'm talking on the cellular/ She said that she was sorry, and I said, "Yeah, the hell you were"" ("High Plains Drifter"), while Kiedis has to consult a rhyming dictionary to get "Under the bridge downtown is where I drew some blood/ Under the bridge downtown, I could not get enough" ("Under the Bridge"), and even that's a weak rhyme.

[5] Brion Gysin said that the novel was fifty years behind painting, and adapted the collage into the cut-up. Forty years later, the cut-up technique has been filtered through fiction into the aural montage of rap music. It is ironic to note that, at the end of "Give It Away", the first single off the last Chili Pepper's album, the guitar plays the riff from Black Sabbath's "Sweet Leaf". The first song on 1986's License to Ill, "Rhymin' and Stealin'", samples the same riff. Oh yeah, and Rick Rubin, who produced Blood Sugar Sex Magik, got his start working with the Beasties. So it appears that the Chili Peppers are only now arriving at the point the B-Boys embarked from, six-and-a-half years ago. Somebody want to give these guys directions?

[6] Ad-Rock plays guitar, MCA plays bass, and Mike D's on drums. Somewhere between this album and the last one they picked up a keyboardist/carpenter, too. An interesting sidelight: the first single off of Check Your Head was supposed to be a cover of Queen's "Bohemian Rhapsody". It seems the B-Boys are big Queen fans, and were struck pretty hard by AIDS poster-boy Freddie Mercury's untimely death. But don't look for the song on Check Your Head. Somewhere between recording and mixing the album, liking Queen and doing Queen covers became trendy. Not wanting to compromise their artistic integrity, they shelved the single indefinitely and dropped "Bohemian Rhapsody" from the new album's lineup.

[7] You know, Ice-T trying to do hardcore. "Who gave those black boys... those big guitars?" Interesting concept, but then again, the AMC Pacer probably looked good on paper, too.

[8] The B-Boys didn't tour for Paul's Boutique. Neither did the Beatles when Sergeant Pepper came out. Both records were impossible to reproduce live at the time. However, the Beasties are touring for Check Your Head, which is more than I can say for the Beatles. I've got my ticket.

[9] My roommate swore that he heard the sound of the intercom from the old "Star Trek" TV show somewhere in the middle of "Finger Lickin' Good". Needless to say, we spent half an hour of painfully close listening trying to find it again, unsuccessfully. Sort of like cold fusion.

[10] Adam's personal favorite. He was supposed to tag-team this review with me. It's 12:15 in the AM, Wednesday. Where the hell were you, dude?

[11] Jim Seeley's personal favorite on Paul's Boutique. Said it reminded him of south Jersey.

[12] Basically, the only two acts in rap worth following these days are the B-Boys and Public Enemy, and the Beasties are the only band breaking any sort of musical ground. While I respect PE, and they do put out consistently good work, they haven't really moved musically since 1987, and Nation of Millions. This is not a bad thing, since most bands can't even see that far ahead into the future of sound. Sorta like Beefheart's Trout Mask Replica: when you redefine the concept of music on your second album, it's difficult to do anything but follow through with your new definition. PE seems to be caught in a stylistic sandtrap.

Lambadamen Spank KA

By Dan Kretzer
Staff Writer

On Wednesday afternoon, April 29, the Lambadamen (the Forbidden Team) knew they were up against their toughest opponent in the best one out of one REC Sports Softball Coed League Championship series. In their two previous games, the Lambadamen tied and just barely beat the brothers of Kappa Alpha B team. The Team That Sets The Night On Fire (the Lambadamen) went into the game with an undefeated record to defend... and that's just what they did.

Leadoff batter Dan Kretzer ripped the first pitch down the third base line. Somewhat unwisely he tried to stretch the triple into a home run and the throw beat him home. But the Lambadamen would not be denied. Kretzer put his head down and knocked the KA catcher and the ball in two completely different directions for a home run. Pat Attenasio (4 for 4, 4 RBI) followed Kretzer with a double. He scored after being batted to third by Chris "Pike" Mihavetz and knocked home by Dan "the Man" Dutton. In the bottom of the first, the KA's answered with two runs of their own, but after that it was all Lambadamen.

Offensively, the Lambadamen were red hot. Dutton's two home runs (one being a grand slam) broke the will of the opposing team, and every Lambadaman hit well. Mike "Catch" Sapp, Nate "the Snake" Harned and Rod "the Bod" Benson all were impressive at the plate. "Lightnin" Ramsey Bigham arrived late, but just in time to tear a single up the middle of the infield. It was an offensive orgy that resulted in eighteen runs in four innings, but it was the defense of Team Lambada that stole the show.

Behind pitcher Sally "Fireball" Hayensworth, the Lambada fielders shut the KA's completely down. Chris "Pike" Mihavetz at shortstop, Benson at second and Harned at third teamed up with John "W" Blakelock at first for a tight infield game. Kretzer, Dutton and Attenasio shut down every KA shot into the outfield. It was Chris "Beetle" Griep who picked up a hit in right field and threw home to Sapp, gunning down a KA runner like a fat duck. The second and third innings were hitless for the KAs. In the bottom of the fourth, with runners on first and second with two out, Mihavetz scooped a grounder, fired to Harned at third for the force and the ten run mercy killing rule came into play, ending the game.

The Lambadamen would also like to recognize outfielder Pat "Red Lova" Lebowitz who missed the game due to lacrosse practice. This game, more than any other was a total team effort by the Lambadamen. It seemed that things might go against them when Dennis Berry made them censor their battle cry of "F YEAH!" to "SHUCKS YEAH!" But the Lambadamen pulled together and watched their language. The Forbidden Team danced their way to an undefeated season this year. Said Attenasio: "We came, we saw, we parked it over their heads. Now all that's left is a certain bunch of no-names who will soon be owing us a keg... ."

However, the brothers of Kappa Alpha did not go home complete losers for the day. In the championship game for the REC Sports Hi-comp Softball League, the Kappa Alpha A Team managed to squeak out a 15-13 win over the Theta Mo'Fo's. This game came down to the wire, with two outs and the bases loaded with Thetas in the bottom of the ninth. Unfortunately, the Mo'Fo's were unable to capitalize and the Kappa Alphas walked away with the win.

In other softball news, the Vaughnster and Spiderman, after seeing the powerful Lambadamen destroy KA-B, decided not to try their luck against the Forbidden Team. According to ELM sources, Linehan was quoted as saying, "I wouldn't dare get on the field with those Lambadamen." Anyone wishing to buy a glove can probably get one cheap from Chris Vaughn or Charlie "Brown" Linehan at Phi Delt Headquarters.

Women Netters Fall to #1 Swarthmore

By Rachael Rice
Staff Writer

The Women's tennis team suffered a devastating loss last Saturday, putting a halt to their effort for a repeat MAC title. Despite being bested by Swarthmore in the Southern division contest, as of press-time, Division III Nationals hopes were still alive.

The women travelled to Swarthmore on Saturday with Coach Todd Helbling. Swarthmore entered the match both undefeated and ranked #1 in the East region. The Shoremen squad, tied for #2 in the East, knew they would be in for a battle. Tracy Peel justified her #3 national ranking with a crisp 6-3, 6-2 victory over nemesis Julie Shapiaro. Pam Hendrickson, Rachael Rice, and Kristy Karns, playing at #2, 5, and 6, each forced a third set but not the victory. Suffering her first singles defeat of the season, Hendrickson went down 6-1,3-6,4-6. Rice lost her first set 3-6, came back in the second, 7-6 (4), but earned only 1 game in the third. Miriam Dittmann, another key player throughout the season, was unable to come through at #3, losing 2-6,1-6. Sloan was defeated at #4, 0-6,4-6.

The Shoremen were slated to play Trenton State this past Thursday. As Washington is currently tied with Trenton at #2 in the East region, a victory could give the women a shot at attending the national tournament in Kalamazoo, Michigan.

In other tennis action, the MAC individual tournament begins today at Gettysburg, the home of the Bullets. Hendrickson and Sloan will represent the team in singles; Rice and Peel will pair for doubles. A strong showing for Hendrickson will greatly enhance her chances for an individual bid to the Division III national tournament. As for the doubles, Peel claims, "Rachael and I are anxious to defend the YMCA title we earned this past fall. The teams we will face should be tough, but we are a veteran team." The tournament runs today and tomorrow, pending rain delays.

The women would like to thank their many supporters throughout the season, as well as those members of the faculty and staff who helped to make this season possible. In addition, they extend a special thanks to Coaches Finnegan, Gray, and Helbling whose hard work and motivation have made the season a success.

It has been a real turn around for the Shorewomen netters and their program. Gray looks towards the '92-'93 season with great hopes and aspirations, seeking only improvement and furthered success for the squad. Good Luck and cheers to a great season!!

Crew Places Well On The Chester

By Laura Green
Staff Writer

Saturday was a record day for the rowing team, with Washington winning a phenomenal six out of eleven events (What is it about being on our home turf?). The banks of the Chester were packed with fans, alumni, and parents screaming for the sleek boats filled with determined athletes.

Amazingly enough, the races began at 10:00 as opposed to the usual break of dawn type stuff the crew team is so familiar with. The Varsity Women's Pair took first place with the power of Theresa Lerch and Sue Czechowski. John McCarthy and Darryl Calloway took 2nd in the very competitive, Varsity Men's Pair. WC raced Rod Benson and Lance Mrecereau as a Pair, this duo came in 4th. The Men's Pair With Coxswain raced in this event as well, and finished 5th overall despite the fact that they were racing against the Pairs Without.

The Varsity Women's Four, with coxswain Karen Wright, stroke-Laura Green, Mary Bird, Kara Weisenbaugh, and bow-Conci Pope, broke through the competition of five other boats and stole the gold.

The Novice Men's Four came in 2nd in a strong race. The Novice Men's Eight also rowed hard and finished 3rd in their race.

The Novice Women's Eight sliced through the somewhat choppy water and took first place beating out the crews in their path for the gold medal. The Novice Four that made such a big splash down south continued to show their potential by finishing 2nd.

The Varsity Men's Lightweight Four, true to form, raced an incredible race taking 2nd place by 9/10ths of a second. The Men's Varsity four won their race and took home another gold medal for Washington.

The WC Varsity Women's Eight dazzled the crowd by winning 1st place and redeeming the Betsy Beard Cup from last year's winners. The Men's Varsity Eight followed suit by dominating this outrageously competitive event and bringing home the winning cup.

The crew teams celebrated their victories at a party at the Country Club. New members were inducted into the Washington College Rowing Association (WCRA): Ari Kodek, Rod Benson, Mary Bird, Laura Green, Sue Czechowski, Kara Weisenbaugh, Cindi DeWaters, Amy Osborne, Darryl Calloway, Glenn Warner, Conci Pope, Theresa Lerch, Lance Mercereau, Ray Herndon, Tim Stoltzfus. The Oarsmen-of-the-Year awards were presented to Darryl Calloway and Laura Green. Fine food and good company completed the evening for the elated rowers.

The WC crewsters had Sunday to bask in their glory and then it was back to the drawing board. The team will be racing on the Potomic River at the Cadle Cup Regatta this weekend; come out and enjoy the great weather as WC beats up on a few more crews.

But the really big news is the fact that four of the five men's boats, the fifth is waiting on the rowing committee's decision, will be participating in the national championships, otherwise known as the Dad Vails held in Philadelphia PA. This means WC has placed in the top 18 in the country according to the committee. The women's team will know within the next 24 hours (as of Thursday). Congratulations Crew crew!!!

Washington College Will Join Centennial Conference for Athletic Competition in 1993

By Gary Brown
Sports Information Director

Washington College will change its athletic conference affiliation in 1993, moving from the Middle Atlantic States Collegiate Athletic Conference (MAC) to the Centennial Conference, President Charles H. Trout announced today.

President Trout expressed his "immense satisfaction" with this new athletics arrangement. "All who care about the destiny of Washington College," he commented, "should be jubilant to be part of this outstanding group of schools. I look forward to spirited athletic and academic competition in the years to come."

At a press conference today in Lancaster, PA, Gettysburg College President Gordon A. Haaland announced that the Centennial Football Conference was expanding to an all-sports conference and would include Washington College as a charter member.

The original CFC institutions include Dickinson College, Franklin and Marshall College, Gettysburg College, Johns Hopkins University, Muhlenberg College, Swarthmore College, Ursinus College and Western Maryland College. Haaland, the acting chairman of a committee of presidents representing the eight member institutions, also announced that besides Washington College, Bryn Mawr College and Haverford College would be extended charter membership in the Centennial Conference.

A purpose and mission statement adopted by the presidents states: "Recognizing that our fundamental purpose is the academic mission of our institutions, we agree to establish an all-sports conference in the spirit of rationalizing our competition by controlling travel, schedule, and costs. The Conference will be controlled by the presidents of the member institutions."

The Centennial Conference will encourage athletic competition among national liberal arts colleges and universities that share similar academic aspirations and a commitment to the importance of the total educational experience of students engaged in sports. Intercollegiate athletics programs are an integral part of life of member institutions and flow from their educational objectives. Each member institution provides a comprehensive, broad-based athletics program. All varsity sports are treated equitably, and every sport is important. The Centennial name will be retained because all the institutions are more than 100 years old.

Ten of the eleven schools (with Bryn Mawr as the exception) have held membership in the Middle Atlantic Conference almost since the conference's inception in 1912. Those schools will continue to participate in the MAC through the 1992-93 athletic year.

The MAC has a current membership of 26 institutions with diverse philosophies. For that reason, on June 4, 1981, Keith Spalding, then president of Franklin and Marshall College, made the announcement that, "eight private colleges found it timely and appropriate to form a round-robin football schedule among institutions with similar attitudes and practices in intercollegiate football competition." With that statement the present Centennial Football Conference was born.

Because of their success in operating the CFC, the presidents formed an ad hoc committee early in 1991 to study the possibility of an all-sports conference involving the original eight schools. On Thursday, March 26, 1992, the presidents received a positive report from the committee, with the additional recommendation that three schools — Haverford College, Bryn Mawr College and Washington College — be invited to join as charter members.

The Centennial Conference member institutions will have the latitude to maintain relationships with other institutions for scheduling and the perpetuation of traditional rivalries.

Among the major points agreed upon by the presidents were the following:

- The conference schedules will be implemented for the 1993-94 academic year.
- The Charter Members will establish a presidential committee to review the bylaws and present them for approval by June 15, 1992.
- The criteria for membership include the following provisions:
  - a) all members will be NCAA Division III members
  - b) all members will be able to demonstrate agreement with the purpose and mission of the conference.

The presidents approved the establishment of a search committeee to advertise immediately for an executive secretary. They have set January 1, 1993, as the target date for closure and for deciding administrative logistics of an office and support services.

WC Trounces Haverford, Gets Stung by Salisbury

Sanchez makes his move

The Sho'men stomped on Haverford at Kibler Field last Wednesday, but the roles were reversed on a rainy Saturday afternoon as the Shoremen fell to the visiting Salisbury Sea Gulls 22-8. Washington was 10-2 as they went into Saturday's game and even though they lost, their winning record will take them into the MAC Championship game this Friday afternoon.

The Shoremen got off to a great start in Wednesday's game against the Fords. Chris Sanchez scored his first of four goals in the first :40 seconds of the game. Sanchez's goal began the scoring brigade that lead to an eight goal lead after the first five minutes of the second quarter. Harris Murphy started a second scoring streak when he scored off a pass from Jason Paige. The Shoremen scored twelve more goals before the Fords put another one into the net. Twelve players scored for the Shoremen with twenty-eight more shots on goal than the Fords. Washington also controlled the face-offs, 31-9. Bill Griffin proved exceptional in the goal for both of the games. He saved 10 shots in the game against Haverford and tallied six saves in the Salisbury game.

Only five players scored for the Shoremen against Salisbury, with Chris Cote leading the team at five goals and one assist. Washington's first goal did not come until the last three minutes of the first quarter. Although the Shoremen had 27 shots on goal, it did not compare with the Gulls 49 attempted shots. Washington had the advantage over the Gulls in faceoffs, but it did not prove to be enough. Jason Paige, Chris Jones and Harris Murphy added to Chris Cote's five goals to give Washington their eight goals of the game. Andy Manos stepped into the goal and tallied six saves, adding to Griffin's six saves earlier in the game. The match-up against Salisbury State University has proved to be very challenging the past two years and let's hope next year proves to be more successful.

The team's next game is the MAC Championship game at Kibler Field against seventh ranked Gettysburg College. If they beat Gettysburg, the Shoremen will have another go at Salisbury the following weekend in the opening of the DIII playoffs. Good Luck!

RUGBY TEAM TAKES THIRD IN SECOND ANNUAL PRESIDENTS CUP!!!

By Brandon White
Staff Writer

The second annual President's Cup was held last Saturday featuring four teams: WC, Salisbury State, St. Marys, and the President Cup defending champions, Severn River Men's Club. The first match featured WC going against the much experienced Severn River Men's Club. The match started out pretty evenly matched, but as the match progressed Severn River's experience took over. The final score was 19-0. The second match featured Salisbury State against St. Marys. This turned out to be the most uneven match of the day. Salisbury took the early lead and continued to build on their lead resulting in the final score being 53-3.

The consolation game featured WC going against St. Marys. This was the third time this year that the two clubs had gone head to head, with WC already winning the first two handily. The game started out looking as if it was going to be a real grudge match. Shawn "The Ham" Hamill struck first with an outstanding tri. Then Peter "Stein" Hagen kicked the extra point to make it 6-0. St. Marys then converted on a penalty kick to get their only score of the match making it 6-3. Dave Snyder then retaliated with a tri to make it 10-3. WC then struck with a third tri in the second half to make the final 14-3.

The championship game featured Severn River against Salisbury State. This match was very evenly matched. Both squads had a successful first half, but Salisbury turned it on in the second half and captured the Presidents Cup with a 17-10 victory. The final results of the day were: Salisbury first, Severn River second, WC third, and St. Marys forth. The WC Rugby Club would like to thank all of the fans for their support this year and they look forward to seeing you all next year.

Women's Lax Ends Rough Season with High Hopes for Next Year

She may be faceless in this one, but Margaret Doyle performs her trademark here, scoring goals high, hard, and often

By Renee Guckert
Staff Writer

Women's lacrosse completed their season last Wednesday with a battle against Haverford. Amy McCleary scored the Shorewomen's very first goal in the first minute and a half of the game. Haverford came back to score five goals, making the score 6-1, when Margaret Doyle fired it up, scoring five goals in a row, two of which were assisted by McCleary. Washington dominated on both draw and ground ball control, and when the first period ended, the scoreboard read 7-6 with the Shorewomen down by one. The second period, however, was less successful in the scoring category for the lady laxers as Haverford pulled out a 14-7 victory.

At the season's end, Margaret Doyle recorded a total of thirty-nine goals and twelve assists, giving her the lead scorer position for the 1992 season. Followed by Doyle was Amy McCleary with thirty-five goals, twelve assists and Kristy Hilgartner with twelve goals and four assists. But beyond the number of goals, shots, saves and overall record (3-8), there stands a victorious women's athletic team.

Going into the season, the team knew their fight would be long and difficult as they faced the odds of inexperience and a grueling game schedule. This schedule included approximately three squads which were ranked among the top fifteen teams in the nation. Washington's women's lacrosse team, however, faced each of their opponents with "dignity and pride," according to Coach Diane Guinan. "This could easily have been the type of season where the players gave up and felt sorry for themselves after a number of losses, but the team stuck together, learned from each other, and worked game to game."

With each contest and each practice, Washington's squad grew stronger, holding their own against teams such as Gettysburg, ranked fifteenth nationally. (The score at the half in that contest read an even 5-5.) "People think we should have regrets about the season," said Guinan, "but I don't have any negative feelings. Success is: did we do everything we were capable of doing, did the team progress and work well together, and did they learn from each other? I can answer yes to all of those questions." Freshman Julie Klein shares her coach's view of the season: "I feel that it was a successful season because we were a close team, we learned how to work together, and that's what mattered over anything else."

Although the Shorewomen must say good-bye to two of their strongest players, captains Margaret Doyle and Kristy Hilgartner, the team will undoubtedly take what they have learned from the 1992 lacrosse season, put it to good use, and walk away victorious in 1993.

Baseball Ends Early

WAC baseball swept Widener in a double header on Parents Day, improving the Shoremen league record to 6-4. Sophomore Keith Whiteford earned his eighth win of the season while Dan Coker and Rory Conway, in the extra innings, helped to pull out a 3-2 victory. Joe Boan pitched a 4-1 win in the second game.

The Shoremen were not as fortunate in a doubleheader against Wesley College, Tuesday afternoon. Whiteford put in a strong effort on the mound, but Wesley took the first game 6-1 after a few controversial calls.

With the first game loss behind them, the Shoremen got on the board early in game two, scoring four runs in the first inning. Joe Boan held Wesley to one run until the fourth inning when, once again, Wesley took a formidable lead, scoring six more runs and winning 8-4.

The Shoremen ended their season with an overall record of 12-16. Senior John Morrall finished his WAC career with a fine performance and a team leading batting average of .360, while teammate Keith Whiteford finished the season with a 2.22 ERA. Good Job!

Mens' Tennis Still Hoping

By Tim "Bird" Reardon
Responsible Staff Writer

On Saturday, Washington College's tennis team captured their seventh straight MAC title. On Friday they won the southeast title by beating Dickinson at Dickinson, 6-0. Coach Gray chose not to play the doubles because of the long drive back to school. Then on Saturday, the team captured their seventh straight title in as many years. They beat Kings College (PA.), 6-0, after sweeping every singles match. At this point, the King's coach, apparently wowed by WC's stealth on the court, decided his team had had enough and didn't want to play the doubles. The singles play belonged to WC after 55 minutes. The top six seeds had no trouble winning their matches.

The team finds out Sunday night if they make it to the national tournament. The chances have become better with last week's Suny Binghampton loss to the University of Rochester. Suny Binghampton, ranked thirteenth, beat U. C. San Diego, ranked fourth in the nation. Washington beat Rochester 7-2 so there is still a chance to make the tournament.
